Of XVIII. The campaign in Italy was unprospective to the Queen of Hungary and the King of Sardinia. Count Gages passed the Arno, and entered the State of Lucca; from thence he proceeded by the eastern coast of Genoa to Lestrade-Levante. The junction of the two armies was thus accomplished, and reinforced with ten thousand men; meanwhile Prince Lobkowitz detached with a thousand men from Modena. The Duke of Parma was so speedily succeeded by Count Schuylenberg, and sent to command the Austrians to Bohemia. The Spaniards entered the Milanese without further opposition. Count Gages, with thirty thousand men, took possession of Genoa; and advancing towards Placentia, obliged the Austrians to retire under the cannon of Tortona; but when Don Philip, at the head of forty thousand troops, made a determined attack, the Austrians were defeated. The French, and the Austrian general, unable to stem the torrent, retreated behind the Tanaro. The strong citadel of Tortona was taken by the Spaniards, who likewise reduced Parma and Placentia; and foreseeing the passage of the Tanaro, compelled his Sardinian majesty to take shelter on the other side of the Po. Then Pavia was won by Scalade; and the city of Milan submitted to the infamy, though the Austrian garrison still maintained the citadel; all Piedmont, on both sides of the Po, as far as Turin, was reduced, and even that capital threatened with a siege; so that by the month of October the territories belonging to the house of Austria, in Italy, were wholly subdued; and the Kingdom of Sardinia was free. After having slain Genoa, the commodore Barnett, in the East Indies, made prize of several French ships, richly laden; and Commodore Townsend, in the latitude of Martinique, took about thirty merchantmen near the isle of St. Christopher. The capture of four ships of war, two of which were destroyed. The English privateers likewise met with uncommon success. But the most important achievement was the conquest of Louisbourg on the isle of Cape Breton, in North America; a place of great consequence, which the French had fortified at a prodigious expense. The scheme of reducing this fortress was planned in Boston, recommended by the general assembly, and approved by his majesty, who sent instructions to Commodore Warren, stationed off the Looe-

Water Islands, to sail for the northern parts of America, and cooperate with the forces of New England in this expedition. A body of six thousand men was formed under the command of Mr. Peleg Phipps, with an English fleet of Placentia, whose influence was extensive in that country: though he was a man of little or no education, and utterly unacquainted with military operations. In April Mr. Warren arrived at Cape with ten ships of war; and the troops were landed at New York, then engaged in an advantageous situation at Losnes. The garrison of Tournay, though now deprived of all hope of succour, maintained the place to the twenty-first day of June, when the governor obtained an honourable capitulation. After the conquest of this frontier, which was dismanted, the Duke of Cumberland, apprehending the enemy had a design upon Ghent, sent a detachment of four thousand men to reinforce the garrison of that city; but they fell into an ambuscade at Pass-dumelle; and were killed or taken, except a few deviators that escaped to Ostend: on that very night, which was the tenth of June, Ghent was surprised by a detachment of the French army. Then they invested Ostend, which, though defended by an English garrison, and open to the sea, was, after a short siege, surrendered by capitulation on the fourteenth day of August. Dendermonde, Oudearde, Newport, and Aeth, underwent the same fate: while the city of Ghent, as it was evacuated by the French, was captured by the Antwerp. The French king having subdued the greatest part of the Austrian Netherlands, returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph.

Of XVIII. The campaign in Italy was unprospective to the Queen of Hungary and the King of Sardinia. Count Gages passed the Arno, and entered the State of Lucca; from thence he proceeded by the eastern coast of Britain or her allies; and being embarked in fourteen carted ships, were transported to Rochefort. In a few days after the surrender of Louisbourg, two French East India ships, and another from Peru, laden with treasure, sailed into this port, and are still belonged to France, and were taken by the English squadron. § XXV. The news of this conquest being transmitted to England, Mr. Pepperell was preferred to the dignity of a baronet of Great Britain, and congratulatory addresses were presented to the King as signifying his majesty's pleasure.

The possession of Cape Breton was doubtless a valuable acquisition to Great Britain. It not only distressed the French in their fishery and navigation, but removed all fear of enemy's ships in the harbours of New England. The French fishermen on the banks of Newfoundlans, in France, and at Rochefort, and few of their ships have ventured into those harbours, and perhaps they would not have embarked in the undertaking, though he was stimulated to the attempt by many concouring motives. Certain it is, he was engaged by the sanguine misrepresentations of a few adventurers, who hoped to profit by the expedition. They assured him, that the whole nation was disaffected to the reigning family; that the people could no longer bear the immense load of taxes, which was daily increasing; and that the most considerable persons of the kingdom would gladly seize this opportunity of crowning his standard. On the other hand, he knew the British government had taken some effectual steps to alienate the friends of his house from the principles they had adopted; and, that the adherents of the Pretender and accepted posts and pensions: others were preferred in the army; and the parliament were so attached to the reigning family that he had nothing to hope from their deliberations. He expected no material success from the court of France; he foresaw that delay would diminish the number of his adherents in Great Britain; and, therefore, resolved to seize the present occasion, which in many respects was propitious to his design. Without doubt, had he been possessed of proper support, he could have formed a more formidable opportunity of exciting an intestine commotion in Great Britain: for Scotland was quite unfurnished with troops; King George was in Germany; the Duke of Cumberland, at the head of the British army, was employed in Flanders, and a great part of the highlanders were keen for insurrection. Their natural principles were on this occasion stimulated by the suggestions of revenge. At the beginning of the war, a regiment of those people had been formed, and transported with the rest of the British troops to Flanders. Before they were embarked a number of them deserted with their arms, on pretence that they had been decoyed into the service, by promises and assurances that they should not be sent to the field; and, as they were. They were overtaken by a body of horse, persuaded to submit, brought back to London pinnioned like malefactors, and tried for desertion. Three were shot to death in court parade; and three were sentenced to transportation. Those who suffered were persons of some consequence in their own country; and their fate was deeply resented by the clans to which they belonged. It was considered as a national outrage; and the highlanders, who are naturally vindictive, waited impatiently for an opportunity of vengeance.

§ XXVII. The young pretender being furnished with a sum of money, and a supply of arms, on his private credit, without the knowledge of the French court, wrote letters to his friends in Scotland, explaining his design and situation, intimating the place where he intended to land, communicating a private signal, and assuring them he should be with them by the middle of June. These precautions being taken, he embarked on board of a small frigate at Port St. Nazaire, accompanied by the Marquis of Tallard, Sir Thomas Sheridan, Sir John Macloud, with a few Irish and Scottish adventurers. He sailed from the island of St. Michael, on the fourteenth of July was joined off Bellisire by the Elizabeth, a French ship of war, mounted with sixty guns, as his convoy. Their design was to sail round Ireland, and land in the western part of Scotland; but falling in with the Lighthouses guarded by the English, they were obstructed and bloody action ensued. The Elizabeth was so disabled that she could not prosecute the voyage, and with difficulty reached the harbour of Brest; but the Lion French young gentlemen embarked as volunteers.

2 The Elizabeth, a king's ship, was purchased as a convoy, by the interest of Mr. Walsh, an Irish merchant at Norwich, and on board of her fifty was shattered to such a degree, that she floated like a wreck upon the water. The disaster of the Elizabeth was a great misfortune to the adventurer, as by her being disabled he lost a great quantity of arms, and about nine hundred able officers, who were already living beneath the protection of his majesty's ex pounded. Had this ship arrived in Scotland, she could easily have reduced Fort William, situate in the midst of the clans attached to the Stuart family. Such a conquest, by giving lustre to the prince's arms, would have allured many to his standard, who were indifferent in point of principle; and encouraged a great number of highlanders to join him, who were restricted by the apprehension, that their wives and families would be subject to imprisonment and the loss of their goods. By the command of Charles, in the frigate, continued his course to the western isles of Scotland. After a voyage of eighteen days he landed on a little island between Isara and South Is, two of the Hebrides; then re-embarked, and in a few days arrived at Borrowdale in Argyll, on the confines of Loch- ranach, where he was in a little time joined by a considerable number of hardy mountaineers, under their respective chiefs or leaders. On the sixteenth day of August, the Marquis of Tullibardine erected the pretender's standard at Glentannan. Some of those, however, on whom Charles principally depended, now stood aloof, either fluctuating in their principles, astonished at the boldness of their master, or directing their steps to the interests of the friends, who did not fail to represent, in aggravated colours, all the dangers of embarking in such a desperate enterprise. Had the government acted with proper vigour when they received intelligence of his arrival, he would have been wholly crushed in the spring of the year; but before any considerable number of his adherents could have been brought together; but the lords of the regency seemed to slight the information, and even to suspect the integrity of those by whom it was conveyed. They were soon convinced of their mistake. Prince Charles having assembled about twelve hundred men, encamped in the neighbourhood of Fort William; and immediately hostilities were commenced. A handful of Kepoch's clans, commanded by Major Donald Macdonald, even before they joined the pretender, attacked two companies of new raised soldiers, who, with their officer, were disarmed after an obstinate dispute; another captain of the king's forces, falling into their hands, was courteously dismissed with one of the pretender's manufactures, and a passport for his personal safety. The administration was now effectually alarmed. The lords of the regency issued a proclamation, offering a reward of five hundred pounds sterling to any person who should apprehend the prince adventurer. The same price was set upon the head of the Elector of Hanover, in a proclamation published by the pretender. A courier was despatched to Hовер, and returned with his majesty's commission, which was translated into French, and published at the court of London, to give notice to the inhabitants of the approach of Prince Charles. The king's army was divided into four divisions, the rear of which consisted of four thousand English. The vanguard was composed of a strong body of horse, all well armed, under the command of General Guest, an old officer of experience and capacity.

§ XXIX. During these transactions, Sir John Cope marched with a strong force from Inverness to Aberdeen, where he embarked with his troops, and on the seventeenth day of September landed at Dunbar, about twenty miles to the eastward of Edinburgh. Here he was joined by two regiments of dragoons, which had retired with precipitation from the capital at the approach of the highland army. With this reinforcement, his troops amounted to near three thousand men; and he began his march to Edinburgh, in order to give battle to the enemy. On the twentieth day of the month, he encamped in the neighbourhood of Preston Pans, having the village of Tranent in his front, and the sea in his rear. Early next morning he was attacked by the young pretender, at the head of about two thousand four hundred highlanders half armed, who charged him in such a manner as to impetuous, that in less than ten minutes after the battle began, the king's troops were broken and totally routed. The dragoons fled in the utmost confusion at the first onset; and the king, having made some unsuccessful efforts to rally them, thought proper to consult their own safety by an expedient retreat towards Coldstream on the Tweed. All the infantry were either killed or taken; and the colours, artillery, tents, baggage, and all manner of chest, fell into the hands of the victor, who returned triumph to Edinburgh. Never was victory more complete, or obtained at a smaller expense; for not above fifty of the rebels lost their lives in the engagement. Five hundred of the dragoons were killed on the field of battle; and among those Colonel Gardiner, a gallant officer, who disdained to save his life at the expense of his honour. When abandoned by his own regiment of dragoons, he alighted from his horse, joined the infantry, and fought on foot, until he fell covered with wounds, in sight of his own threshold. Prince Charles endeavored to dissuade him. He replied:

"It was my part to guard the road, and to make the enemy suffer as much as possible; I have done this several times, and this I will do now."

He exhibited all rejoicings for the victory he had obtained: the wounded soldiers were treated with humanity; and the officers were sent into Fife and Angus, where they were liberally entertained, and a portion of the spoil was given, or contributed to his own ruin. While Charles resided at Edinburgh, the Marquis de Guilles arrived at Montrose, as envoy from the French king, with several officers, some canons, and a considerable quantity of small arms for the use of that adventurer.1

§ XXXI. While the young pretender endeavored to improve the advantages he had gained, the ministry of Great Britain took every possible measure to retard his progress. Several powers in Europe were attached to the government, and exerted themselves in its defence. The Duke of Argyle began to arm his vassals; but not before he had obtained the sanction of the legislature. Twelve hundred men were raised by the Earl of Sutherland; the Lord Rae brought a considerable number to the field; the Grants and Monroes appeared under their respective leaders for the service of his majesty: Sir Alexander Macdonald declared for King George, and the Land of Lead sent two thousand hardy islanders from Skye, to strengthen the same interest. These gentlemen, supposed to be otherwise affected, were governed and directed by the advice of Dr. Sancton Forbes, president of the University of Edinburgh, and possessed of a strong mind, agreeable manners, and unblemished integrity. He procured commissions for raising twenty independent companies, and some of these lie bestowed upon individuals who were either attached by principle, or engaged by promise, to the pretender. He acted with indefatigable zeal for the interest of the reigning family; and greatly injurecl an opulent fortune in their service. He confirmed several colonels in their commissions; and the princely men were actually converted by the energy of his arguments, and brought over to the assistance of the government which they had determined to oppose: others he persuaded to remain quiet without taking any care in the present troubles.

Certain it is, this gentleman, by his industry and address, prevented the insurrection of ten thousand highlanders, who would otherwise have joined the pretender; and, therefore, he may be said to have been one great cause of that adventurer's misfortune. The Earl of Loudon repaired to Inverness, where he completed his regiment of highlanders; directed the conduct of the clans who had taken arms in behalf of his majesty; and, by his vigilance, overawed the disaffected chiefs. He procured several detachments of men to be openly engaged in the rebellion immediately after the defeat of Cope, six thousand Dutch troops arrived in England, and three battalions of guards, with seven regiments of infantry, were detailed for the service of the government. They forthwith began their march to the north, under the command of General Wade, who received orders to assemble an army, which proceeded to Newcastle. The parliament meeting on the sixteenth day of October, his majesty gave them to understand that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland, towards the suppression of which he craved their advice and assistance. He found both Houses cordial in their addresses, and zealous in their attachment to his person and government. The Commons forthwith suspended the habeas corpus act; and several persons were apprehended on suspicion of treasonable practices. Immediately after the defeated Dutch army had retired from the Netherlands, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry. The train-bands of London were reviewed by his majesty: the country regiments were completed; the volunteers, in different parts of the kingdom, employed themselves industriously in the exercise of arms; and the whole English nation seemed to rise up as one man against this formidable invader. The government being apprehensive of a descent from France, appointed

1 He solicited, and is said to have obtained of the Chevalier de St. flour the parade of prisoners and some of the most prominent of all the highlanders. They were composed of the men who had been in garrison at Tournay and DeLandernau when those places were taken, and engaged by re-Admiral Vernon to command a squadron in the Downs, to observe the motions of the enemy by sea, especially in the harbours of Dunkirk and Boulogne; and his cruisers took several ships laden with soldiers, officers, and ammunition, destined for the service of the pretender in Scotland.

§ XXXII. This enterprising youth, having collected about five thousand men, resolved to make an irruption into England, which he accomplished by the west boundary of Scotland on the eleventh day of November. His men were not experienced officers, and intelligence was greatly wanting. He had no naval preparations and no experience in the art of war; his men were not used to arms, and he was badly provided with provisions and money. He was accompanied only by a small body of French soldiers, the greater part of whom had been sent upon service in the Low Countries, but had been repulsed by General Wade. He was reinforced by some Scotch volunteers from the north, but his army was recruited so imperfectly that it was not formidable. He was not accompanied by any sick persons, and his army was entirely without any provisions for the sick.

He entered the kingdom by the south-western coast, and marched to London, where he was joined by a considerable number of French soldiers, who had been collected from various parts of the kingdom. He was joined also by some Scotch volunteers from the north, who had been collected on his request. He was not accompanied by any naval preparations, and his army was entirely without any provisions for the sick.

tigue to which they must have been exposed, they left behind no sick, and lost a few very stragglers; but retired with deliberation, and carried off their cannon in the face of their enemies. Having fallen back into Aberdeenshire, the King sent his young son, Prince Charles, to raise a regiment of nine hundred men under the command of the Earl of Kinnoull. When this skillful movement was discovered, the Duke of Richmond moved two of his regiments to meet it and routed all the Scottish troops. The shattered rebel army made a gallant stand; but the loss of men did not exceed a hundred, including Sir Robert Monro, Colonel Whittey, and some other officers of distinction. It was at this period, that the officers who had been taken at the battle of Preston Pans, and convicted of treason at Edinburgh, finding themselves unbowed, broke their parole, and returned to Edinburgh, no pretence of their having been forcibly released by the inhabitants of those parts.

§ XXXIV. General Hawley, who had boasted that, with two regiments of dragoons, he would drive the rebel army from one end of the kingdom to the other, incurred abundance of censure for the disposition he made, as well for his conduct before and after the action; but he found means to vindicate himself to the satisfaction of his sovereign. Nevertheless, it was judged necessary that the army in Scotland should be commanded by a general in whom the soldiers might have some confidence; and the Duke of Cumberland was chosen for this purpose. He proceeded to London, and above his being beloved by the army, it was suggested, that the appearance of a prince of the blood in Scotland might have a favourable effect upon the minds of the people in that maritime province. By his order, the 3rd regiment, consisting of two thousand Highlanders, was detached from the 1st regiment. Meanwhile the French minister at the Hague represented to the States-general, that the auxiliaries which they had sent into Great Britain were part of the garrisons of Tournay and Dendermonde, and restricted by the capitulation from bearing arms against France for a certain term, the States thought proper to recall them, rather than come to an open rupture with this most Christian nation. In the room of those troops six thousand Hessians were transported from Flanders to Leith, where they arrived in the beginning of February, under the command of their prince, Frederic of Hesse, son-in-law to his Britannic majesty. By this time the Duke of Cumberland had put himself at the head of the troops in Edinburgh, consisting of fourteen regiments of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and twelve hundred highlanders from Argyllshire, under the command of Colonel Campbell.

On the last day of January, the royal highness began his march to Linlithgow; and the enemy, who had renewed the siege of Stirling castle, not only abandoned it, but retired, after losing eight hundred men, and some of their officers, by an engagement. The Prince of Wales, having received fresh supplies and reinforcement from Flanders, and from the troops in France, was determined to attack him with all the forces at his command. The Prince of Wales's body of men consisted of four regiments of步兵, a detachment of King's horse, and about seventy Argyllshire highlanders, under the command of the Earl of Grant, the Laird of Grant, and the Earl of Fife, with a few other gentlemen, suffered piously at their parole, and their conduct was approved by his majesty. strange from the clans, who declined leaving their families at the mercy of the king's garrison in Fort William, he resolved previously to reduce that fortress, the siege of which was undertaken by Braggard Stapleton, an engineer in the army, but this enterprise was so vigorous and so vigorously maintained by Captain Scot, that in the beginning of April they thought proper to relinquish the enterprise. The Earl of Loudon had retired into Sutherland, and taking refuge at Monrose, where he lived in great security, was attacked by a strong detachment of the rebels, commanded by the Duke of Perth; a major and sixty men were taken prisoners; and the earl was obliged to take shelter in the last degree. Very little check was put to the rebellion by any advantages which its majesty's arms obtained. The sloop which the rebels had surprised at Montrose was retaken in Sutherland, with a considerable sum of money, and a great quantity of arms on board, which she had brought from France for the use of the pretender. In the same county the Earl of Cromartie fell into an ambuscade, and was taken by the militia of Sutherland, who likewise defeated a body of the rebels at Goldspie. This action happened on the very day which has been rendered famous by the victory obtained at Culloden.

A. D. 1746. I. The beginning of April, the Duke of Cumberland began his march from Aberdeen, and on the twelfth passed the deep and rapid river Spey, without opposition from the rebels, though a detachment of them appeared on the opposite side. Why they did not cross is not easy to conceive; but after all, indeed, from this instance of neglect, and their subsequent conduct, we may conclude they were under a total infinitation. His royal highness proceeded to Naum, where he received intelligence, that the enemy had advanced from Inverness to Culloden, about the distance of nine miles from the royal army, with intention to give him battle. The design of Charles was to march in the night from Culloden, and surprise the duke's army at day-break; for this purpose the English camp had been reconnoitred; and on the night of the fifteenth the highland army began to march in two columns. Their design was to surround the enemy, and attack them at once on all quarters; but the length of the columns embarrassed the march, so that the army was obliged to make many halts: the men had been under arms during the whole preceding night, were fatigued and hungry, and many of them were overpowered with sleep. Some were unable to proceed; others dropped off unperceived in the dark; and the march was retarded in such a manner, that it would have been impossible for the duke's camp to be carried. The design being thus frustrated, the prince pretender was with great reluctance prevailed upon by his general officers to measure back his way to Culloden; at which place he laid no spencer arrived, than great numbers of his followers dispersed in quest of provi; and many, overcome with weariness and sleep, threw themselves down on the heath, and along the park walls. Their repose, however, was soon interrupted in a very disagreeable manner. Their princes, receiving intelligence that his enemies were in full march to attack him, resolved to hazard an engagement, and ordered his troops to be formed for that purpose. On the sixteenth day of April, the Duke of Cumberland having made the proper dispositions descended from Naum, and early in the evening sent a body of horse to raise the camp of highlanders drawn up in order of battle, to the number of four thousand men, in thirteen divisions, supplied with some pieces of artillery. The royal army, which was reduced to a few thousand armed men, was drawn up into three lines, disposed in excellent order; and about one o'clock in the afternoon the cannonading began. The artillery of the rebels was ill served, and did very little damage; but that of the king's troops made a great noise, and after a very short time, the dragons under the command of Argyles and his lorrus, pulled down a park wall that covered their right flank, and the cavalry falling in among the rebels sword in hand, completed their confusion. The French and Spanish followed their left covering the retreat of the highlanders by a close and regular fire; and then retired to Inverness, where they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. An entire body of the rebels marched off the field in order, with their pipes playing, and the pretender's standard on a handkerchief. The French then debouched into a PIECE the soldiers of the army of the allies of the rebels, the French and Spanish, a great number of people, who, from motives of curiosity, had come to see the battle, were sacrificed to the undistinguished vengeance of the victors. Twelve hundred rebels were slain on the field, and in the pursuit. The Earl of Kilmarnock was taken; and in a few days Lord Kelmerino surrendered to a country gentleman, at whose house he presented himself for this purpose. The glory of the victors was subdued by the laudations of the soldiers. They had been provoked by their former disgrace to the most savage thirst of revenge. Not content with the blood which was so profusely shed in the field of battle, they traversed the country, and butchered and massacred those miserable wretches who lay maimed and expiring: now, some officers acted a part in this cruel scene of assassination, the triumph of low illiberal minds unshamed by sentiment, unshackled by humanity. The victors, roused to unbridled fury and lust of revenge, went to the Duke of Perth, Lord Elcho, and a few horsemen; he crossed the water to Naum, and retired to the house of a gentleman in Strathbutt, where he conferred with old Lord Lovat; then dismissed his followers, and wandered, abed, with a wretched and solitary fugitive, among the islands and mountains for the space of five months, during which he underwent such a series of dangers, hardships, and misery, no other person ever outlived. Thus, in one short hour all his hope vanished, and the rebellion was entirely extinguished. One would almost imagine, the conductors of this desperate enterprise had conspired their own destruction, as they certainly neglected every step that might have contributed to their safety or success. They might have opposed the Duke of Cumberland at the passage of the Spey; they might, by proper conduct, have afterwards taken the advantage that the victors might have had in a good prospect of success. As they were greatly inferior to him in number, and weakened with hunger and fatigue, they might have retired to the hills and fastnesses, where they would have found plenty of live cattle for provision, re- cruited their men, and been in a state of prepared and acknowledged forment, which was actually in full march to their assistance. But they were distracted by dissensions and jealousies; they obeyed the dictates of despair, and wil- lfully devoted themselves to ruin and death. When the news of the battle arrived in England, the nation was transported with joy, and extolled the Duke of Cumberland as a hero and deliverer. Both Houses of parliament supported and majesty on the suspensive conduct. The decree, in the most solemn manner, their public thanks to his royal highness, which were transmitted to him by the speakers; and the Commons, by bill, added five-and-twenty thousand pounds ye annual salaries to former revenue.

§ II. Immediately after the decisive action at Culloden, the duke took possession of Inverness, where six-and-threey desirers, convicted by a court-martial, were ordered to be executed; and two others, who had been condemned to run the gantlet, were sent to the north of the country. One of these apprehended the Lady Mackintosh, who was sent prisoner to Inverness. They did not plunder her house, but drove away her cattle, though her husband was actually in the service of government. The castle of Lord Lovat was destroyed. The French prisoners were sent to Carlisle and Perth: Kilmarrock, Ballmerino, Cromartie, and his son the Lord Nicleod, were conveyed by sea to London; and those of an inferior rank were confined in different prisons. The Marquis of Tullibardine, together with a brother of the Earl of Dunmore, were seized and transported to the Tower of London, to which the Earl of Traquair had been committed on suspicion of being a Jacobite. At the same time, Murray, the pretender's secretary, was apprehended; and the eldest son of Lord Lovat having surrendered himself, was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh. In a word, all the goals of Great Britain, from the capital northwards, were filled with persons of all sorts, and great numbers of them were crowded together in the holds of ships, where they perished in the most deplorable manner, for want of necessaries, air, and exercise. Some rebel chiefs escaped in two French frigates, which had arrived on the coast of Lochaber about the end of April, and engaged three vessels belonging to his Britannic majesty, which they obliged to retire. Others embarked on board of a ship on this coast, Buochary, and conveyed to Norway, from thence they travelled to Sweden. In the month of May, the Duke of Cumberland advanced with the army into the highlands, as far as Fort Augustus, where he encamped; and sent off detachments on all hands, to hunt down the fugitives, and lay waste the country with fire and sword. The castles of Glengary and Lochiel were plundered and burned; every house, hut, or habitation, met with the same fate, without distinction: all the cattle and provision were carried off; the men were either shot upon the mountains, like wild beasts, or put to death in cold blood, without form of trial: the women, after having seen their husbands and fathers murdered, were left to the mercy of the cabinet, and were either burnt in the open air, or turned out naked, with their children, to starve on the barren heaths. One whole family was enclosed in a barn, and consumed to ashes. Those ministers of vengeance who were so alert in the execution of their tyrannical power, a few days after, there was neither house, cottage, man, nor beast, to be seen in the compass of fifty miles; all was ruin, silence, and desolation.

§ III. The humane reader cannot reflect upon such a scene without grief and horror: what thou must have been the sensation of the frightful prince, when he beheld these spectacles of woe, the dismal fruit of his ambition? He was now surrounded by armed troops, that chased him from his house, his castle, and his cushion to cavern, and from shore to shore. Sometimes he lurked in caves and cottages, without attendants, or any other support but that which the poorest peasant could supply. Sometimes he was rowed in a boat, by the execution of their tyrannical power, a few days after, there was neither house, cottage, man, nor beast, to be seen in the compass of fifty miles; all was ruin, silence, and desolation.

§ II. Immediately after the decisive action at Culloden, the duke took possession of Inverness, where six-and-threey desirers, convicted by a court-martial, were ordered to be executed; and two others, who had been condemned to run the gantlet, were sent to the north of the country. One of these apprehended the Lady Mackintosh, who was sent prisoner to Inverness. They did not plunder her house, but drove away her cattle, though her husband was actually in the service of government. The castle of Lord Lovat was destroyed. The French prisoners were sent to Carlisle and Perth: Kilmarrock, Ballmerino, Cromartie, and his son the Lord Nicleod, were conveyed by sea to London; and those of an inferior rank were confined in different prisons. The Marquis of Tullibardine, together with a brother of the Earl of Dunmore, were seized and transported to the Tower of London, to which the Earl of Traquair had been committed on suspicion of being a Jacobite. At the same time, Murray, the pretender's secretary, was apprehended; and the eldest son of Lord Lovat having surrendered himself, was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh. In a word, all the goals of Great Britain, from the capital northwards, were filled with persons of all sorts, and great numbers of them were crowded together in the holds of ships, where they perished in the most deplorable manner, for want of necessaries, air, and exercise. Some rebel chiefs escaped in two French frigates, which had arrived on the coast of Lochaber about the end of April, and engaged three vessels belonging to his Britannic majesty, which they obliged to retire. Others embarked on board of a ship on this coast, Buochary, and conveyed to Norway, from thence they travelled to Sweden. In the month of May, the Duke of Cumberland advanced with the army into the highlands, as far as Fort Augustus, where he encamped; and sent off detachments on all hands, to hunt down the fugitives, and lay waste the country with fire and sword. The castles of Glengary and Lochiel were plundered and burned; every house, hut, or habitation, met with the same fate, without distinction: all the cattle and provision were carried off; the men were either shot upon the mountains, like wild beasts, or put to death in cold blood, without form of trial: the women, after having seen their husbands and fathers murdered, were left to the mercy of the cabinet, and were either burnt in the open air, or turned out naked, with their children, to starve on the barren heaths. One whole family was enclosed in a barn, and consumed to ashes. Those ministers of vengeance who were so alert in the execution of their tyrannical power, a few days after, there was neither house, cottage, man, nor beast, to be seen in the compass of fifty miles; all was ruin, silence, and desolation.

barely qualified to be elected member of parliament, when he obtained a seat in the House of Commons, where he soon outshone all his contemporaries. He displayed a surprising command of facts and general knowledge, peculiar energy of argument, and such power of eloution, as struck his hearers with astonishment and admiration. He flashed like the lightning of heaven against the ministers and sons of corruption, blasting at the roots that support the great tree of rebellion. He inspired the hopes of opposition at his most stanch praise was founded upon his disinterested integrity, his incorruptible heart, his unconquerable spirit of independence, and his invariable attachment to the interest and happiness of his country.

§ V. The quiet of the ministry being re-established, the House of Commons provided for forty thousand seamen, nearly the same number of land forces, besides fifteen regiments raised by the nobility, on account of the rebellion, and about twelve thousand marines. They settled funds for the maintenance of the Dutch and Hessian troops that were in England, as well for the subsidy to the landgrave. They granted three hundred thousand pounds to the King of Sardinia; four hundred thousand pounds to the Queen of Hungary; three hundred and ten thousand pounds to defray the expense of eighteen thousand Hanoverians; about three-and-thirty thousand pounds in subsistence of Maitre and about five hundred thousand pounds in a vote of credit and confidence to his majesty. The whole charge of the current year amounted to seven millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which was raised by land and malt taxes, annuities on the additional duties imposed on glass and spirituous liquors, a lottery, a deduction from the sinking fund, and exchequer bills, chargeable on the first aids that should be granted in the next session of parliament.

§ VI. The rebellion being quelled, the legislature resolved to make examples of those who had been concerned in disturbing the peace of their country. In June, an act of attainder was passed against the principal persons who had wounded the public tranquility; courts of enquiry were opened in different parts of England, for the trial of the prisoners. Seventeen persons who had borne arms in the rebel army were executed at Kennington-common, in the neighbourhood of London, and suffered with great constancy under the dreadful terrors which their sentence prescribed: nine were put to death, in the same manner, at Carlisle; six at Brumpton, seven at Penrith, eleven at York; of these a considerable number were gentlemen, and landed as such; about fifty had been executed as deserters in different parts of Scotland; eighty-one suffered the pains of the law as traitors. A few obtained pardons, and a considerable number were transported to the piedmont of France. The authorities of indemnity found by the county of Surry against the Earls of Kilmarrock and Cromartie, and Lord Balmerino. These noblemen were tried by their peers in Westminster-hall, the lord chancellor presiding as lord high-steward for the occasion. The two earls confessed their crimes, and in pathetic speeches recommended themselves to his majesty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded not guilty; he denied his having been at Carlisle at the time specified in the indictment, but this exception was overruled; then he moved a point of law in arrest of judgment, and was allowed to be heard by his counsel. They might have expatiated on the hardship of being tried by an ex post facto law, and on the course and actions of the allies already in the country, where the act of treason was said to have been committed. The same hardship was imposed upon all the imprisoned rebels: they were dragged in captivity to a strange country, far from their friends and connexions, destitute of means to produce evidence in their favour, even if they had been innocent of the charge. Balmerino wavered this plea, and submitted to the court, which pronounced sentence of death upon him and his two associates. Cromartie's life was spared, on the other two pretending to his majesty, that the fault lay with the government, on his being deprived of a pension which he had for some time enjoyed. He was convinced of his having acted criminally, and died with marks of penceutice and contion. Balmerino had been bred up to arms, and acted upon principles of politics, for which he was pardoned; he shed the implements of death with the most careless familiarity, and seemed to triumph in his sufferings. In November, Mr. Hadsell, the titular Earl of Derwentwater, who had been in a ship bound to Seamen's Island, was arraigned on a former sentence, passed against him in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixteen: he refused to acknowledge the authority of the court, and pleaded that he was a subject of France, honoured with a commission to the service of his nation and country. The identity of his person being proved, a rule was made for his execution; and on the eighth day of December he suffered decapitation, with the most perfect composure and serenity. Lord Lovat, now turned of fourscore, was impeached by the Commons, and tried in Westminster-hall before the lord high-steward. John Murray, secretary to the prince pretender, and some of his own domestics, appearing against him, he was convicted of treason and condemned. Notwithstanding his age, infirmities, and the recollection of his conscience, which was supposed to be not altogether void of offence, he died like an old Roman, exclaiming, "plus ci je tourne est plus patria mori." He suffered on the 18th of January, and was beheaded after the executioner, and laid his head upon the block with the utmost indifference. From this last scene of his life, one would have concluded, that he had approved himself to the nation from his youth, and never deviated from the paths of virtue.

§ VII. The flame of war on the continent did not expire at the election of an emperor, and the re-establishment of peace among the princes of the empire. On the contrary, it raged with double violence in consequence of these events; for the force that was before divided being now united to one body, exerted itself with great vigour and rapidity. The States-general were overwhelmed with controversies and squabbles. The French were joined by all the nations of Europe; they had soothed and supplicated the French monarch in repeated embassies and memorials, they saw themselves stripped of their banner, and once more in danger of being overwhelmed by that ambitious nation. The city of Brussels had been reduced during the winter; so that the enemy were in possession of all the Austrian Netherlands, except a few fortresses. Great part of the forces belonging to the republic were intrusted from action by capitulations to which they had subscribed. The States were divided in their councils between the two factions which had long subsisted. They trembled at the prospect of seeing Zealand invaded and reduced. All nations in Europe saw the great necessity that was felt for an augmentation of their forces by sea and land, that they might prosecute the war with vigour. The common people, fired with novelty, dazzled by the splendid of greatness, and the seditious disposition of the populace. An ambassador was sent to London with representations of the imminent dangers which threatened the republic, and he was ordered to solicit in the most pressing terms the assistance of Britannic majesty. Britannic majesty could have a supremacy in the Netherlands by the beginning of the campaign. The king was very well disposed to comply with their request; but the rebellion in his kingdom, and the domestic inquisitions in his cabinet, had retarded the supplies, and embarrassed him so much, that he found it impossible to make those early preparations that were necessary to check the career of the enemy.

§ VIII. The King of France, with his general, the Count de Saxe, took the field in the latter end of April, at the head of one hundred and twenty thousand men, and advanced towards the allies, who, to the number of four-and-thirty thousand, were entrenched behind the Deine, under the care of the count of his forces and the count of the dukes who retired before them, and took post in the neighbourhood of Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant. Mareschal Saxe immediately invested Antwerp, which in a few days was surrendered. Then he appeared before the strong town of Mous in Hainault, with an irresistible train of artillery, an immense quantity of bombs and warlike implements towards the town. At the same time, the French officers of the day began to dispatch detachments of their garrison, in the order of the Emperor, to the places they had newly conquered.

The French king found it much more expeditious and effectual to bring into the field a prodigious train of battering cannon, than to attempt investing the town. The garrison could sustain, and discharged such an incessant hail of bombs and bullets, as in a very little time reduced to ruins the place, with all its fortifications. St. Ghaulan and Charleroy met with the fate of Mons and Antwerp, so that by the middle of July the French king was absolute master of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault.

§ IX. Prince Charles of Lorraine had by this time assumed the command of the confederate army at Terheyde, which being reinforced by the Hessian troops from Scotland, and a fresh body of Austrians under Count Paoli, amounted to eighty-seven thousand men, including the Dutch forces commanded by the Prince of Waldeck. The garrison of Namur, under General de Beaufort, marched towards that place, and took post in an advantageous situation on the eighteenth day of July, in sight of the French army, which was encamped at Gemblours. Here they remained till the eighth day of August, when they determined to move towards the town of Lowenau, where he found a large magazine belonging to the confederates; and their communication with Maestricht was cut off. Mareschal Saxe, on the other side, took his measures so well, that they were utterly deprived of all subsistence. Then Prince Charles, retiring across the Meuse, abanoned Namur to the efforts of the enemy, by whom it was immediately invested. On the seventeen thousand men and two thousand seven hundred and fifty men of the garrison, consisting of seven thousand Austrians, defended themselves with equal skill and resolution; but the cannonading and bombardment were so terrible, that in a few days the place was converted into a heap of rubbish; and on the twenty-third day of the month the French monarch took possession of this strong fortress, which had formerly sustained such dreadful attacks. Meanwhile the allied army encamped at Maestricht, and were reinforced by some British battalions, and Bavarian battalions; and Prince Charles resolved to give the enemy battle. With this view he passed the Meuse on the thirteenth day of September, and advanced towards the garrison, which was unexpectedly posted at Tongres, that he thought proper to march back to Maestricht. On the twenty-sixth day of September he crossed the Jaar in his retreat; and his rear was attacked by the enemy, who were repulsed. But Count Saxe being reinforced by a body of troops, under the Count de Clermont, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement. On the thirteenth day of the month he passed the Jaar; while he took possession of the villages of Liern, Warem, and Roucoux, they drew up their forces in order of battle, and made preparations for giving him a warm reception. On the first day of October the enemy advanced in three columns; and a terrible cannonade began. At this time Prince Charles, who had been on the left charged with great fury; and after an obsti- nate defence was overpowered by numbers. The villages were attacked in columns, and as one brigade was repulsed another succeeded; so that the allies were obliged to abandon these posts, and retreat towards Maestricht, with the loss of five thousand men, and thirty pieces of artillery. The victory, however, cost the French general a much greater number of lives; and was attended with no solid advantage. Sir John Ligonier, the Earls of Crawford and Robies, Brigadier Douglas, and other commanding officers of the French army, were killed or wounded in their gallantry and conduct on this occasion. This action terminated the campaign. The allies passing the Meuse, took up their winter-quarters in the ditches of Limbourg and Luxembourg, while the French continued their troops to the places which they had newly conquered.

§ X. The campaign in Italy was altogether unfavourable to the French and Spaniards. The house of Austria being no longer possessed of the Silesian provinces, was not capable of making the stronger efforts in this country; and the British subsidy encouraged the King of Sardinia to act with redoubled vivacity. Mareschal Mallebois occupied the greater part of Piedmont with about thirty thousand men. Don Philip and the Count de Cages were at the head of a greater number in the neighbourhood of Milan; and the Duke of Modena, with eight thousand, secured his own dominions. The King of Sardinia augmented his forces to six-and-thirty thousand; and the Austrian army, under the Prince of Lichtenstein, amounted to a much greater number; so that the enemy were reduced to the necessity of acting on the defensive, and retired towards the Mantua. In February, Lord Lecester, the Duke of Savoy, invested and took the strong fortress of Asti. He afterwards relieved the citadel of Alexandria, which the Spaniards had blocked up in the winter, reduced Casal, recovered Valenza, and obliged Maille-Bois to retire to the confines of the Venetian state. The King of Austria and Count Gages abandoned Milan, Pavia, and Parma, retreating before the Austrians with the utmost precipitation to Placentia, where they were joined on the third of June by the French forces under Mallebois. All this:

§ XI. Before this junction was effected, the Spanish general, Pegnatielli, had passed the river Po in the night with a strong detachment, and beaten up the quarters of the French, under the Duke of Saxe. The latter, discovering his error, fell down upon the rear of the French, and made the enemy retire. They were prepared for the attack, which they conducted with great vigour till morn. They then quoted their entrenchments, and charged the enemy in their turn with such fury, that after an obstinate resistance the combined army was broken, and retired with great confusion. On the next day five thousand men killed, wounded, and taken, together with forty colours, and ten pieces of artillery. In a few weeks the Austrians were joined by the Piedmontese: the King of Sardinia assumed the chief command; and Prince Lichtenstein being indisposed, his place was supplied by the Marquis de Botta. Don Philip retired to the other side of the Po, and extended his conquests in the open country of the Milanese. The King of Sardinia called a council of war, in which it was determined that he should pass the river with a strong body of troops, in order to straiten the enemy on one side: while the Marquis de Botta should march up the Tidone, to cut off their communica- tions. They pursued with great vigour till night; they had occupied between the Lambro and the Adda, resolv- ing to repass the Po, and retreat to Tortona. With this view they threw bridges of boats over that river, and began to pass on the ninth day of August in the evening. They were attacked at Biotto Frodito by a division of Austrians, under General Serbelloni, who maintained the engagement till tea in the morning, when Botta arrived: the battle was renewed with redoubled rage, and lasted till four in the afternoon, when the enemy retired in great disorder to Genoa, with the loss of 3,000 killed and wounded, and a good number of colours and standards, and eighteen pieces of cannon. This victory cost the Austrians four thousand men killed upon the spot, including the gallant General Beaulieu. The victory immediately summoned Placentia to surrender; and the garrison, consisting of nine thousand men, were made prisoners of war: Don Philip continued his retreat, and of all his forces brought six-and-twenty thousand into the territories of Genoa.

§ XIII. The Peronneenses and Antibras, rejoining in the neighbourhood of Pavia, advanced to Tortona, of which they took possession without resistance, while the enemy sheltered themselves under the cannon of Genoa. They did not long continue in this situation: for on the twenty-second day of August they were again in motion, and retired into Provence. The court of Madrid imputing the bad success of this campaign to the misconduct of Count Cages, recalled that general, and sent the Marquis de las Minas to resume the command of the forces. In the meantime, the victorious confederates appeared before Genoa on the fourth day of December; and the senate of that city thinking it incapable of defence, submitted to a very moderate extortation, by which four hundred and sixty vessels were delivered up to the Austrians, together with all their arms, artillery, and ammunition; and the city was subjected to the most cruel contributions. The Marquis de Botta being left in command, the King of Sardinia resolved to pass the Var, and pursue the French and Spaniards into Provence; but, that monarch being seized with the small-pox, the conduct of this expedition was intrusted to Count Brown, an Austrian general of Irish extract, who had given repeated proofs of uncommon valour and capacity. He was on this occasion assisted by Vice-Admiral Medley, who commanded the British squadron in the Mediterm. The French forces had fortified the post of the pass of the Var, under the command of General Bellesle, who thought proper to abandon his post at the approach of Count Brown; and this general, at the head of fifty thousand men, passed the river, without opposition, on the ninth day of November. While he advanced as far as Dragouman, laying the open country under contribution, Baron Roth, with four-and-twenty battalions, invested Antiles, which was at the same time bombarded on the side of the sea by the British squadron. The trenches were opened on the twentieth day of September; but Bellesle having assembled a numerous army, superior to that of the confederates, and the Genoese having expelled their Austrian guests, Count Brown abandoned the enterprise, and passed the Var, not without some damage from the enemy.

§ XIV. The court of Vienna, which has always patronized oppression, exacted such heavy contributions from the Genoese, and its executions were so rigorously put into execution, that the people were reduced to despair; and resolved to make a last effort for the recovery of their liberty and independence. Accordingly, they took arms in secret, seized several important posts of the city; surprised some battalions of the Austrians; surprised others, and cut them in pieces; and, in a word, drove them out with great slaughter. The Marquis de Botta neted with caution and spirit; but being overpowered by numbers, and apprehensive of the peasants in the country, who were in arms, he retraced to the pass of the Brochetta on the side of Lombardy, where he secured himself in an advantageous situation, until he could receive reinforcements. The loss he had sustained at Genoa did not hinder him from reducing Sarona, a sea-port town belonging to that republic; and he afterwards made himself master of Gavi. The Genoese, on the contrary, exerted themselves with wonderful industry in fortifying their city, raising troops, and in taking other measures to carry on a vigorous defence in case they should again be insulted.

§ XV. The naval transactions of this year reflected very little honour on the British nation. Commodore Penrose, on the 29th of April, having proceeded with six ships of the line, inquired to the articles of the treaty agreed upon by the British and French, regarding the indemnity in case of war. The British admiral, under the command of Lord St. Vincent, in his squadron of fifteen ships, thought it his duty to submit to the terms of the treaty, on account of the disaster which had happened to the British fleet in the month of January, and the injury sustained by Admiral Keppel. The British admiral proceeded, however, to the translation of the squadron to the Spanish coast. He was, however, not without the appearance of good reason for this transaction. The British squadron was reduced to a very small number of men, from the capture of the squadron of Rear-Admiral Keppel, Commodore of the squadron. The British squadron, which, at the beginning of the year, consisted of seventeen ships of the line, nine frigates, and four sloops, now consisted of only eight ships of the line, six frigates, and four sloops, commanded by Commodore Horne, and Admiral Knowles. The British admiral, however, after having proceeded to the translation of the squadron to the Spanish coast, went to Cadiz, which was not far from the place of his arrival. expose the ships on an open coast at such a season of the year, General Sucnar abandoned the siege. Having caused the two iron pieces of cannon and the mortars to be melted, the French began to burn, however, the works where his troops were re-embarked, having sustained very inconsiderable damage since their first landing. He expected reformations from England, and was resolved to wait a little longer for their completion, thoughts being alive to annoy the enemy more effectuantly. In the beginning of October the fleet sailed to Quiberon bay, where they destroyed the Ardent, a French ship of war of sixty-four guns :
and a detachment of the forces being landed, took possession of Brest, and madey':'round the little islands of Illot and Heydic reduced by the sailors.
In this situation the Admiral and general continued till the seventeenth day of the month, when the forts being dismantled, and the troops re-embarked, the fleets sailed from the French coast: the admiral returned to England, and the transports with the soldiers proceeded to Ireland, where they arrived in safety.
§ XVI. This expedition, weak and frivolous as it may seem, was resented by the French nation as one of the greatest insults they had ever sustained; and demonstrated the possibility of hurting France in her tenderest parts by means of an armament of this nature, well-timed, and conducted with the greatest prudence. But it was more absurd or precipitate than an attempt to distress the enemy by landing a hundred of troops, without draft horses, tents, or artillery, from a fleet of ships lying on an open beach; or to raise with one hundred and fifty thousand pounds in the most tempestuous season of the year, so as to render the retreat and re-embarkation altogether precarious. The British squadrons in the West Indies performed no exploit of consequence in the course of the year. The commerce was but indifferently protected. Commander Lee, stationed off Martinico, allowed a French fleet of merchant ships, and their convoy, to pass by his squadron unmomented; and Commander Mitchell behaved scandalously in a encounter with the French, France, and Holland–in a hundred of his ships lying on the coast of Martinique; and the French, in return to England took the Severn, an English ship of fifty guns. The the cruisers on all sides, English, French, and Spaniards, were extremely alert; and though the English lost the greater number of ships, this difference was more than overbalanced by the superior value of the prizes taken from the enemy. In the course of this year two-and-twenty Spanish privateers, and sixty-six merchant vessels, including ten register ships, fell into the hands of the British cruisers; from the French they took seven ships of war, nineteen privateers, and about three hundred ships of commerce. The new king of Spain being supposed well afflicted with economic manias, fell a prey to the dehun from the interest of France, by means of the Marquis de Taberniera, who had formerly been his favourite, and resided many years as a refugee in England. This nobleman proceeded to Lisbon, where a negotiation was set on foot with the court of Madrid. But his efforts miscarried; and the influence of the queen-mother continued to predominate in the Spanish councils. The States-general had for some years endeavored to promote a pacification by remembrances, and even entreaties, at the court of Versailles: the French king at length discovered an inclination to peace, and in September a congress was opened at Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, where the plenipotentiaries of the emperor of Germany, the king of Spain, Holland, and France were assembled: but the French were so insolent in their demands, that the conferences were soon interrupted.
§ XVII. The parliament of Great Britain meeting in November, the king exerted them to concert with all possible expedition the proper measures for pursuing the war with vigour, that the confederate army in the Netherlands might be seasonably augmented; he, likewise, gave them to understand, that he expected of the minister of state of his civil government had for some years past fallen short of the revenue intended and granted by parliament; and said he relied on their known affection to find out some method to make good this deficiency. As all those who had conducted the opposition were now concerned in the administration, little or no objection was made to any demand or proposal of the government; and its members, having considered the estimates, voted forty thousand seamen for the service of the ensuing year, and about sixty thousand land-forces, including eleven thousand five hundred privateers, four hundred and thirty-three thousand pounds to the Empress Queen of Hungary; three hundred thousand pounds to the King of Sardina; four hundred and ten thousand pounds for the maintenance of eighteen thousand Hanoverian auxiliaries; one hundred and sixty-two thousand for thirty thousand six hundred and six thousand Hessian; subsidies to the Electors of Co-logne, Mentz, and Bavaria; and the sum of five hundred thousand pounds to enable his majesty to prosecute the war with advantage. In a word, the supplies amounted to nine million four hundred twenty-five thousand two hundred and fifty-four pounds; a sum almost incredible, if we consider how the kingdom had been already drained of its treasure. It was raised by the usual taxes comrejert, with new impositions on windows, carriages, and spirituous liquors, a lottery, and a loan from the sinking fund. The new taxes were mortgaged for four millions by transferable annuities, at an interest of four, and a presumption of one hundred thousand pounds of the ere- mous grants, one would imagine the ministry had been determined to impoverish the nation; but from the eagerness and expedition with which the people subscribed for and concluded these loans, one might almost conceive that the kingdom were inexhaustible. It may not be amiss to observe, that the supplies of this year exceeded, by two mil-ions and a half, the greatest annual sum that was raised during the reign of Queen Anne, though she maintained as great a number of troops as was now in the pay of Great Britain, and her armies and fleets acquired every year fresh harvests of glory and advantage; whereas this war had proved an almost uninterrupted series of events big with misfortune and disaster; and the greatest annual sum the naval expense of England had exceeded that of France about five millions sterling; though her fleets had not obtained one signal advantage over the enemy at sea, nor been able to protect her commerce from their depredations.
She was at once a prey to her declared adversaries and professed friends. Before the end of summer she numbered among her mercenaries two empresses, five German princes, and a more powerful monarch, whom she hired to assist her in trimming the balance of Europe, in which they themselves were immediately interested, and she had no more than a secondary concern. Had these fruitless subsidies been saved; had the national revenue been applicable to the public purposes; had the money employed in liquidating gradually the public encumbrances; in augmenting the navy, improving manufactures, encourgaging and securing the colonies, and extending trade and navigation; corruption would have become altogether unnecessary, and dissatisfaction would have vanished: the people would have been eased of their burthens, and ceased to complain; commerce would have flourished, and produced such wealth as most has raised Great Britain to the highest pinnacle of maritime power, above all rival-ship or competition. She would have been dreaded by her enemies; revered by her neighbours oppressed nations would have crept under her wings for protection; the empire of the Great Elector of Germany would have contended; and she would have shown the universal arbiter of Europe. How different is her present situation! Her debts are enormous, her taxes are intolerable, her people discontented, and the sinews of her government relaxed. Without conduct, confidence, or concert, she engages in blundering negotiations: she involves herself rashly in foreign quarrels, and lavishes her substance with the most dangerous devoted spirit; she is ever deserted by her worthless vigour, steadiness, and industry; she grows more odious and pusilllimous; her arms are despised by her enemies; and her councils ridiculed through all Christendom.

In the month of July, Philip King of Spain, dying, in the sixty-third two days survived his daughter, the Dauphiness of France. The three years of his age, was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand, born of Mar-his marriage with the infanta Juana of Portugal, by Maria Magdalena, Infanta of Portugal, but had no issue. Philip was but § XVIII. The king, in order to exhibit a specimen of his desire to diminish the public expense, ordered the third and fourth regiments of his life-guard, who were at this time disestablished, and the reduced three regiments of horse to the quality of dragoons. The House of Commons presented an address of thanks for this instance of economy, by which the annual sum of seventy thousand pounds was saved to the nation. Notwithstanding this seeming harmony between the king and the great council of the nation, his majesty resolved, with the advice of his council, to dissolve the present parliament, though the term of seven years was not yet expired since its last meeting. The minister intimated to insinuate, that the States-general was unwilling to concur with his majesty in vigorous measures against France, during the existence of a parliament which had undergone such a vicissitude of complexion. The allies of Great Britain, far from being suspicious of this assembly, which had supplied them so liberally, saw with concern, that according to law, it would soon be dissolved; and they doubted whether another could be procured equally agreeable to their purposes. In order to remove this doubt, the ministry resolved to surprise the kingdom with a new election, before the malcontents should be prepared to oppose the friends of the government. Accordingly, when the business of the dissolved parliament was at an end, having given the royal assent to the several acts they had prepared, dismissed them in the month of June, with an affectation speech, that breathed nothing but tenderer sentiments. The States was immediately dissolved by proclamation, and new writs were issued for convoking another. Among the laws passed in this session, was an act abolishing the heritable jurisdictions, and taking away the tenure of warholdings in Scotland, which were reckoned among the principal sources of those rebellions that had been excited since the revolution. In the highlands they certainly kept the common people in subjection to their chiefs, whom they implicitly followed and obeyed in all their undertakings. By this act their inmigrants were legally emancipated from slavery; but as the tenants enjoyed no leases, and were at all times liable to be ejected from their farms, they still depended on the pleasure of their lords, notwithstanding this interposition of the legislature, which granted a valuable consideration in money to every noleman and petty baron, who was thus deprived of one part of his inheritance. The forlorn estates, indeed, were divided into small farms, and let by the government on leases at an under-value; so that those who had the good fortune to obtain such leases tasted the sweets of independence; but the highlanders in general were left in their original indigence and wretchedness, the disparity of their manufactories and fisheries being established in different parts of their country, they would have seen and felt the happy consequences of industry, and in a little time would be effectually detached from all their slavish connections.

§ XIX. The intention of the convention of the States-general, when it had been converted in the winter at the Hague, between the Duke of Cumberland and the States-general of the United Provinces, who were by this time generally convinced of France's design to encroach upon their territories. They, therefore, determined to take effectual measures against that restless and ambitious neighbour. The allied powers agreed to assemble a vast army in the Netherlands; and it was resolved that the Austrians and Piedmontese should once more penetrate into Provence. The Dutch minister, however, were not roused into this exertion, until all their remonstrances had failed at the court of Versailles; until they had been urged by repeated memorials of the English ambassador, and stimulated by the immediate danger to which their country was exposed; for France was by this time possessed of all the Austrian Netherlands, and seemed bent upon penetrating into the territories of the United Provinces. In this emergency, the Duke of Cumberland, by letter to his minister, in the assembly of the States-general, invested with the power and dignity of Stadholder, Captain-General, and Admiral of the United Provinces. The vicissitudes of this resolution immediately appeared. All commerce and contracts with the French were prohibited:

* Not the person who commanded in the West Indies.
the peasants were armed and exercised: a resolution was made for making a universal augmentation of the army: a council of war was established for inquiring into the conduct of the governors who had given up the frontier places; and orders were issued to commence hostilities against the French. For a while the army was divided.

§ XXI. Meanwhile, the Duke of Cumberland took post with his whole army between the two Netles, to cover Bergen-op-Zoom and Maestricht; and Marscholl Saxe called to his detachments, with a view to hazard a general engagement. To the latter end, he entered at Brussels; and his general resolved to undertake the siege of Maestricht. For this purpose he advanced towards Louvain; and the confederates receiving his drift, began their march to take post between the two armies.

On the twentieth day of June, they took possession of their ground, and were drawn up in order of battle, with their right at Heleen, and their left extending to Wille, within a mile of Maestricht, having in the front of their left wing the village of Laffelt, in which they posted several battalions of British infantry. The French had taken possession of the heights of Herderen, immediately above the village, and both armies commanded each other till the evening. In the morning the enemy's infantry marched down the hill, in a prodigious column, and attacked the village of Laffelt, which was well fortified, and defended with amazing obstinacy. The assailants suffered terribly in the assault; and were repulsed with horrible slaughter.

The Duke of Cumberland, who was present, had the courage and resolution to push on through the enemy's retreating columns, which was served with surprising dexterity and success; and they met with such a warm reception from the British musketry as they could not withstand: but, when they were broken and dispersed, fresh brigades succeeded with astonishing perseverance. The confederates were driven out of the village: yet being sustained by three regiments, they measured back their ground, and repulsed the enemy with great slaughter.

Nevertheless, Count Saxe continued pouring in other bodies, and the French maintained and maintained their footing in the village, after it had been three times lost and carried. The action was chiefly confined to this part, where the field exhibited a horrible scene of carnage. At noon the Duke of Cumberland ordered the whole left wing to advance against the enemy, whose infantry gave way; Prince Waldeck led up the centre; Marschall Bathini made a motion with the right wing towards Herderen, and victory seemed ready to declare for the confederates, when the fortune of the day took a sudden turn to their prejudice. Several squadrons of Dutch horse, posted in the centre, gave way, and flying at the head of their host, the French could not be checked. The Dutch were advancing from the body of reserve. The French cavalry charged them with great impetuosity, increasing the confusion that was already produced, and penetrating through the lines of the allied army, which was thus divided along the left wing against the centre. The Saxon, who exerted himself with equal courage and activity in attempting to remedy this disorder, was in danger of being taken; and the defeat would in all probability have been total, had not Sir John Ligoni re-taken the resolution of sacrificing himself and a part of the troops to the safety of the army.

At the head of three British regiments of dragoons, and some squadrons of imperial horse, he charged the whole line of the French cavalry with such intrepidity and success, that he overthrew all that opposed him, and made such a diversion as enabled the Duke of Cumberland to effect an orderly retreat to Maestricht. He himself was taken by a French carabinier, after his horse had been killed; but the regiments he commanded retired with deliberation. The confederates retreated to Maestricht, without having sustained much damage from the pursuit, and even brought off all their artillery, except sixteen pieces of cannon. Their loss did not exceed six thousand men killed and taken; whereas the French general purchased the victory at a much greater expense. The common cause of the confederate powers is said to have suffered from the pursuit, and the French disposed of the prisoners they made.

The evening of the battle, when the detachment of the Count de Clermont appeared on the hill of Herderen, Marschall Bathini asked permission of the commander-in-chief to attack them before they should be reinforced, declaring he would answer for the execution of the enterprise. It was paid to this proposal: but the superior asked in his turn, where the marschall would be in case he should be wanted? He replied, "I shall always be found at the head of my troops," and retired in disgust; the subsequent dispositions was likewise been blamed, insomuch as not to leave one half of the army could act, while the enemy exerted their whole force.

§ XXII. The confederates passed the Maese, and encamped in the duchy of Limburg, so as to cover Maestricht; while the French king remained with his army in the near-by quarter, near the town of Maestricht, which was occupied by the British. The famous engineer Coehorn, never conquered, and generally esteemed invincible. It was secured with a garrison of three thousand men, and well provided with artillery, ammunition, and magazines. The enemy appeared before it on the twelfth day of July, and summoned the governor to surrender. The Prince of Saxe Hildburghausen was sent to its relief, with twenty battalions and fourteen squadrons of the troops that could be most conveniently assembled; the former were to be entered the lines of Bergen-op-Zoom, where a determined in expectation of a strong reinforcement from the confederate army; and the old Baron Cronstrom, whom the statesholder had appointed governor of Brabant, assigned the latter post for its strength and resources, of the garrison. The enemy, by his operations on its operations with great vivacity; and the troops in the town defended it with equal vigour. The eyes of all Europe were turned upon this important siege: Count Lowendiil received divers reinforcements; and a considerable body of troops was detached from the allied army, under the command of Baron Schwartzemburg, to co-operate with the Prince of Saxe Hildburghausen. The French general was surprised at the number of French troops that close and continual fire of the besiegers; while he, in his turn, opened such a number of batteries, and plied them so warmly, that the defences began to give way. From the sixteenth day of July to the fifteenth of September, the siege produced an unmitting scene of horror and destruction: desperate salutes were made, and mines sprung with the most dreadful effects: the works began to be shattered; the town was laid in ashes; the trenches were filled with carnage; nothing was seen but fire and smoke; nothing was heard but one continued roar of bombs and cannon. But still the damage fell chiefly on the besieged, who were slain in heaps; while the garrison suffered very little, and the French were baffled in their efforts. In a word, it was generally believed that Count Lowendiil would be baffled in his endeavours; and by this belief the governor of Bergen-op-Zoom seems to have been lulled into a blind security. At length, some ineffectual breaks made by the French were opposed by the Saxon garrison, and these the French general resolved to storm, though Cronstrom believed they were impracticable; and so that supposition presumed that the enemy would not attempt an assault. For this very reason Count Lowendiil resolved to hazard the attack, before the preparations should be made for his reception. He accordingly regulated his dispositions, and at four o'clock in the morning on the eleventh day of September, the signal was made for the assault. A prodigious quantity of bombs being thrown into the ravelin, his troops threw themselves into the fosse, mounted the breaches, forced open a sally-port, and entered the place, almost without resistance. In a word, they had time to extend themselves along the curtains, and form in order of battle, before the garrison could be assembled. Cronstrom was asleep, and the soldiers upon duty had been surprised by the suddenness and impetuosity of the attack. Through the French had taken possession of the ravelin, they did not gain the town without opposition. Two battalions of the Scottish troops, in the pay of the States-general, were assembled in the market-place, and attacked them with such vigour that the troops were in danger of being taken in the street, until fresh reinforcements arriving, compelled the Scots to retreat in their turn; yet they disputed every inch of ground, and fought until two-thirds of them were killed on the spot. Then they brought off the old governor, abandoning the town to the enemy; the troops that were encamped in the lines retreating with great precipitation, all the forts in the neighbourhood immediately surrendered to the victors, who now became masters of the whole navigation of the Scheldt. The French king was no sooner informed of it, than he sent the Prince of Salm, commander-in-chief of the French fleet, to the assistance of Mareschal of France; supported Count Saxe governor of the conquered Netherlands; and returned in triumph to Versailles. In a little time after this transaction, both armies were distributed into winter-quarters and the Duke of Cumberland embarked for England.

§ XXII. In Italy, the French arms did not triumph with equal success, though the Mareschal de Belleisle saw himself in a position of a powerful advantage. In Provence, April he passed the Var without opposition, and took possession of Nice. He met with little or no resistance in reducing Montblan, Villarrose, and Ventimiglia; while General Brown, with eight-and-twenty thousand Austrians, retired towards Final and Savona. In the meantime, another large body, under Count Schuleyberg, who had succeeded the Marquis de Botta, co-operated with fifteen thousand Piedmontese in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa. The French king had sent them supplies and succours, and engineers, with the Duke de Boufflers, as ambassador to the republic, who likewise acted as commander-in-chief of the forces employed for its defence. The allied army hastened upon Genoa. Having forced the passage of the Boecketa on the thirteenth of January, he advanced into the territories of Genoa, and the River was ravaged without mercy. On the last day of March he appeared before the city at the head of forty thousand men, and summoned the consuls to lay down their arms. The answer he received was, that the republic had fifty-four thousand men in arms, two hundred and sixty cannon, thirty-four mortars, with abundance of ammunition and provisions; that they would defend their liberty with their last blood, and be buried in the ruins of their capital, rather than submit to the clemency of the court of Versailles, except by an honourable capitulation, guaranteed by the kings of Great Britain and of Sardinia, the republic of Venice, and the United Provinces. In the beginning of May, Genoa was invested on all sides; a furious sally was made by the Duke de Boufflers, who drove the besiegers from their posts; but the Austrians rallying, he was repulsed in his turn with the loss of seven hundred men. General Schuleyberg carried on his operations with such skill, vigour, and intrepidity, that he made himself master of the suburbs of Bisagno; and in all places where the Austrians had reduced all to desolation, he had been obliged to desist, in consequence of the repeated remonstrances made by the King of Sardinia and Count Brown, who represented the necessity of his abandoning this enterprise, and drawing off his army, to cover Piedmont from the danger of being detached from the dominions of Mareschal de Belleisle. Accordingly, he raised the siege on the tenth day of June, and returned into the Milanesian, in order to join his Sardinian majesty; while the Genoese made an irruption into the Pavian and Placentin, where they committed terrible outrages, in revenge for the mischiefs they had undergone.

§ XXIV. While the Mareschal de Belleisle remained at Venetia, his brother, at the head of four-and-thirty thousand French and Spaniards, attempted to penetrate into Piedmont: on the sixth day of July he arrived at the pass of Exilles, a strong fortress on the frontiers of Dauphine, situated on the north side of the river Dorn. The defence of this important post the King of Sardinia had committed to the care of the Count de Briguerra, who formed an encampment behind the lines, with fourteen battalions of Piedmontese and Austrians, while divers detachments were posted along the passes of the Alps. On the eighth day of the month the Piedmontese entrenchments were attacked by the Chevalier de Belleisle, with incredible intrepidity; but the columns were repulsed with great loss in the first attacks. In the course of this obstinate conflict, the Count de Briguerra was taken prisoner by the French, with five thousand men in arms, and driven to surrender the post. The Austrians, as soon as they saw the French king's troops take the field, were immediately forced to retreat, and the Piedmontese and Spaniards to the rear. The French king, alarmed with the success of the Austrians in this engagement, was chiefly owing to the conduct, activity, and courage of the rear-admiral. A considerable quantity of fuzlons was found in the pouches, which was brought to Spital in triumph; and the treasure being landed, was conveyed in twenty wagons to the bank of London. Admiral Anson was emollied, and Mr. Warren honoured with the order of the Bath.

§ XXVI. About the middle of June, Commodore Fox, with six ships of the line, of the British East India company, took above forty French ships, richly laden from St. Domingo, after they had been abandoned by their convoy. But the French king sustained another more important loss at sea, in the month of October. Rear-Admiral Hawke sailed from Plymouth in the beginning of August, with fourteen ships of the line, to intercept a fleet of French merchant-ships bound for the West Indes. He cruised for some time on the coast of Bretagne; and at length the French fleet sailed from the isle of Aix, would seem to have been, and the other being intercepted by Monsieur de Letendre. On the fourteenth day of October the two squadrons were in sight of each other, in the latitude of Belleisle. The French commodore immediately ordered one of his great ships, and the frigates, to proceed with the trading ships, while he formed the line of battle, and waited the attack. At eleven in the forenoon Admiral Hawke displayed the signal to chase, and in half an hour both fleets were engaged. The battle in the main was a short one, except the Intrepide and Tonnant, had struck to the English flag. These two capital ships escaped in the dark, and returned to Brest in a shattered condition. The French captains sustained the unequal fight with uncommon bravery and resolution; and did not yield until their ships were disabled. Their loss in men amounted to eight hundred: the number of English killed in this engagement did not exceed two hundred, including Captain Scamoner, a great officer, who was killed under Lord Anson in his expedition to the Pacific ocean. Indeed, it must be owned, for the honour of that nobleman, that all the officers formed under his example, and raised by his influence, possessed the elevation with Sr Johnathan Swift's set of commands to which they were prepared. Immediately after the action, Admiral Hawke despatched a sloop to Commodore Legge, whose squadron was stationed at the Lizard Islands, with intelligence of the French fleet of merchant ships, outward-bound, that he might take the proper measures for intercepting them in their passage to Martinique, and the other French islands. In consequence of this advice, he redoubled his vigilance, and a good number of them fell into his hands. Admiral Hawke conducted his prizes to Spithead; and in his letter to the board of admiralty declared, that all his captains behaved like men of honour during the engagement, except Mr. Fox, whose conduct he desired might be inquired into. That gentleman was accordingly tried by a court-martial, and suspended from his command, for having followed the advice of his officers, contrary to his own better judgment: but he was soon restored, and afterwards promoted to the rank of admiral; while Mr. Matthews, whose courage never incurred suspicion, still lay ordered on a suspension for that which had been successfully practised in both these late actions, namely, engaging the enemy without the prospect of escape.

§ XXVII. In the Mediterranean, Vice-Admiral Medley blocked up the Spanish squadron in Carthagena; assisted the Austrian general on the coast of Villafrauca; and interested himself in the capture of the Genoese. At his death, which happened in the beginning of August, the command of that squadron devolved upon Rear-Admiral Hyne, who proceeded on the same plan of operation. In the summer, two British ships of war, having under their convoy a fleet of merchant ships bound to North America, fell in with the Glorioso, a Spanish ship of eighty guns, in the latitude of the Western Isles. She had sailed from the Havana, with an immense treasure on board, and must have fallen a prize to the English ships, had each captain done his duty. Captain Erskine, in the Warwick of sixty guns, attacked her with great intrepidity, and fought until his ship was entirely disabled; but being unsustained by his consort, he was obliged to retire. Finding Hyne, the commander of the Frigate at Ferrol there the silver was landed, and she proceeded on her voyage to Cadiz, which, however, she did not reach. She was encountered by the Dartmouth, a British frigate of forty guns, commanded by Capt. Hamilton, a gallant youth, who, notwithstanding the inequality of force, engaged her without hesitation; but in the heat of the action, his ship being set on fire by accident, was blown up, and he and twenty-seven men with him, and ten or eleven sailors, who were taken up alive by a privateer that happened to be in sight. Favourable as this accident may seem to the Glorioso, she did not escape. An English ship of eighty guns, under the command of Captain Buckle, came up, and obliged the Spaniards to surrender, after a short, but vigorous engagement. Commodore Griffin had been sent, with a reinforcement of ships, to assume the command of the squadron in the East Indies; and although his arrival secured Fort St. David's and kept off a large convoy of the enemy, he could do no more than check the insouciant of Monsieur de Bourdonnais, his strength was not sufficient to enable him to undertake any enterprise of importance against the enemy; the ministry of England, therefore, resolved to equip a fresh armament, that when pressed by the ships to India, should be in a condition to besiege Pondicherry, the principal settlement belonging to the French on the coast of Coromandel. For this service a good number of independent companies was raised, and they were reduced to a fighting force of considerable conduct of Rear-Admiral Boscaewen, an officer of unquestioned valour and capacity. In the course of this year the British cruisers were so alert and successful, that they took six hundred and forty-four prizes from the French and Spaniards; whereas the loss of Great Britain in the same time did not exceed five hundred and fifty. them on the signal successes of the British navy, and the happy alteration in the government of the United Provinces. His majesty gave them to understand that a congress would be speedily opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for effecting a lasting pacification; and reminded them that nothing would more conduce to the success of this negociation than the vigour and unanimity of their proceedings. He received such addresses as the minister thought necessary, and the representation now being gus-salled at their feet. The Duke of Bedford was become a courtier, and in a little time appointed secretary of state, in the room of the Earl of Chesterfield, who had lately executed that office, which he now resigned; and the Earl of Chatham was appointed for the administration of that business. This new House of Commons, in imitation of the liberality of their predecessors, readily gratified all the requests of the government. They voted forty thousand seamen, forty-nine thousand land forces, besides eleven thousand five hundred marines; the subsidies for the Queen of Hungary, the czarina, the King of Sardinia, the Electors of Mentz and Bavaria, the Hessian, and the Duke of Wolfenbuttel; the sum of two hundred thirty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine pounds was granted to the provinces of New England, to reimburse them for the expense of reducing Cape Breton: five hundred thousand pounds were given for the vigorous prosecution of the war; and about one hundred and fifty-two thousand pounds to the Scottish claimants in lieu of their jurisdiction. The supplies for the ensuing year fell very little short of nine millions, of which the greater part was awarded on a loan by successive advances, charged annually upon new or old of this kind; and on the charge of the merchants imported into Great Britain. Immediately after the revolution was suppressed the legislature had established in Great Britain, and the custom-house in Scotland, which was necessary to prevent such commotions for the future. The highlanders were disarmed, and an act passed for abolishing their peculiarities of gait, which was supposed to be a means of rendering them incapable of resorting in the future to their former mode of dis- position, and to preserve the memory of the exploits achieved by their ancestors. In this session a bill was brought in to enforce the execution of that law, and passed with another act for the more effectual settlement of the land in the Highlands of Scotland. The practice of in- troducing French and Spanish ships at London being deemed the sole circumstance that prevented a total stagnation of commerce in those countries, it was prohibited by law under a penalty; and this step of the British parliament accelerated the conclusion of the treaty. Several other prudent measures were taken in the course of this session for the benefit of the public, and among these we may mention the encouragement of the manufacture of dyes in the British plantations of North America: an article for which Great Britain used to pay two hundred thousand pounds yearly to the subjects of France. The session was adjourned without coming to a close. A.D. 1785. May, when the king declaimed to both Houses, that the preliminaries of a general peace were actually signed at Aix-la-Chapelle by the ministers of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces; and that the basis of this accommodation was a general restitution of the con- quests which had been made during the war. Immediately after the prorogation of parliament his majesty set out for his German dominions, after having appointed a regency to rule the kingdom during his absence. § XXX. The articles might have been made much less unfavourable to Great Britain and her allies, had the ministry made a proper use of the treaty with the czarina; and if the confederates had acted with more vigour; and if the expedition in the beginning of the campaign. The Russian auxiliaries might have been transported by sea to Lubeck before the end of the preceding summer, in their own galleys, which had been long building. But the month of July. Had this expedient been used, the Russian troops would have joined the confederate army before the conclusion of the last campaign. But this easy and simple system of conquest by force since this time has been long abandoned. A.D. 1785. They made a small march by land, of incredible length and difficulty, which could not be begun before the month of January, nor accomplished till Midsummer. The operations of the campaign had been concertted at the Hague, in January, by the respective ministers of the allies, who resolved to bring an army of one hundred and ninety thousand men into the Netherlands, in order to compel the French to abandon the barren projects they were entered into. The towns of Holland became the scenes of tumult and insur- rection. The populace plundered the farmers of the re- venue, abolished the taxes, and insulted the magistrates; so that the collection now began to threaten the very existence of the state. The king of Prussia, already a brink of anarchy and confusion, authorized the Prince of Orange to make such alterations as he should see convenient. They presented him with a diploma, by which he was constituted hereditary Stadholder and Captain-general of all the Dutch provinces south of the Rhine, including Guelderland; and the East India company appointed him director and governor-general of their commerce and settle- ments in the Indies. Thus invested with authority unknown to his ancestors, he exerted himself with equal industry and discretion in new modelling, augmenting, and assembling, the troops of the republic. The confeder- dates knew that the Count de Saxe had a design upon Maestricht; the Austrian General Bathnau made repeated remonstrances to the British ministry, entreating them to take speedy measures for the preservation of that fortress. He in the month of January proposed that the Duke of Cumberland should be remitted to Maestricht, and that the Prince of Orange on this subject: he undertook, in the peril of his head, to cover Maestricht with seventy thousand men, from all attacks of the enemy; but his repre- sentatives seemed to have made very little impression on these two great requisitions, charged with the necessity of save- ing England did not depart from England till towards the later end of February; part of March was elapsed before the transports sailed from the Nore with the additional troops, which were threaten; but the foot guards were not embarked till the middle of August. § XXXI. The different bodies of the confederate forces joined each other, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Houthem, near the French possessions in the western part of the kingdom of Scotland; and the French army invested Maestrich, without opposition, on the third day of April. The garr- son consisted of imperial and Dutch troops, under the conduct of the governor, Baron d'Ailleler, with unequalled the place with extraordinary skill and resolution. He be- ninned the besiegers in repeated sallies; but they were determined to surmount all opposition, and prosecuted their approaches with incredible ardour. They assaulted the confederates, and for a time were successful in the ob- tigation of the garrison. These hostilities were sud- denly arrested by the declaration of peace, which was signified at Aix-la-Chapelle. The plenipotentiaries agreed, that, for the glory of his christian majesty's arms, the town of Maestricht should be surrendered to his general, on condition that it should be restored with all the arms and artillery. He accordingly took possession of it on the third day of May, when the garrison marched out with all the honours of war; and a cessation of arms immediately ensued. By this time the Russian auxiliaries, to the number of thirty-seven thousand, commanded by Prince Reipnitz, had arrived in Moravia, where they were reviewed by their imperial majesties; and then proceeded to the confines of Transylvania, where they were ordered to halt, and accordingly marched to the bank of the Szamos at the beginning of August, concluded a convention, importing, that the Russian troops should return to their own cou- ntry; and that the French king should disbanded an equal number of his forces. On the 17th of September, by a convention at Hubetan, the Russians were provided with winter-quarters in Bohemian and Moravia, where they continued till the spring, when they marched back to Livonia. In the meantime seven- and-a-half thousand French troops were withdrawn from Flanders and Picardy, and the two armies were set till the conclusion of the definitive treaty. The suspension of arms was proclaimed at London, and in all the capitals of the contracting powers: orders were sent to the respective admirals in different parts of the world to refrain from hostilities; and a communication of trade and intelligence was again opened between the nations which had been at variance. As the vessels of commerce were numerous on the campaign in Italy. The French and Spanish troops who had joined the Genoese in the territories of the republic, amounted to thirty thousand men, under the command of the Duke de Richelieu, who was sent from France to assume that command. The design of the Duke de Boullons; while Marshal de Belleisle, at the head of fifty thousand men, covered the western Riviera, which was threatened with an invasion by forty thousand Austrians and French under Marshal Zentovsky. At the same time General Brown, with a more numerous army, prepared to re-enter the eastern Riviera, and recommence the siege of Genoa. But these attempted operations were prevented by an armistice, which took place as soon as the belligerent powers had acceded to the preliminaries.

§ XXXII. In the East Indies, Rear-Admiral Boscawen undertook the siege of Pondicherry, which, in the month of August, he blockaded by sea with his squadron, and invested by land with a small army of four thousand Europeans, and about two thousand natives of that country. He proceeded the enterprise with great spirit, and took the fort of Atria Coupam, at the distance of three miles, without loss, and forced the surrender of the place, against which he opened batteries, while it was bombarded and cannonaded by the shipping. But the fortifications were so strong, the garrison so numerous, and the reinforcement so great a force of fresh troops, that he made very little progress, and sustained considerable damage. At length, his army being diminished by sickness, and the rainy season approaching, he ordered the artillery and stores to be landed, and raised the siege on the thirteenth of October. He then took Fort de David, after having lost about a thousand men in this expedition. In the sequel, several ships of his squadron, and above twelve hundred sailors, perished in a hurricane. This was the first instance of losses in the West Indies. Rear-Admiral Knowles, with a squadron of eight ships, attacked Fort Louis, on the south side of Hispaniola, after a warm action of three hours was surrendered on capitulation, and dismantled. Then he made an abortive attempt upon St. Jago de Cuba, and returned to Jamaica, extremely chagrined at his disappointment, which he imputed to the misconduct of Captain Denham, who was tried in England by a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. Meanwhile, he was at the West Indies, admiral cruising in the neighbourhood of the Havannah, with eight ships of the line, encountered a Spanish squadron of nearly the same strength, under the command of the Marques de la Calera, and the engagement began between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, and continued with intervals till eight in the evening, when the enemy retired to the Havannah, with the loss of two ships; one of which struck to the British admiral, and the other was, two days after, set on fire by order of his own commander, that she might not fall into the hands of the English. Mr. Knowles taxed some of his captains with mutineering, and they recommenced on his conduct. On their return to England, a court-martial was the consequence of the mutual accusations. Those who adhered to the commander, and the others whom he impeached, were inflamed against each other, with the most rancorous resentment. The admiral would not give an unreserved answer: two of his captains were reprimanded: but Captain Holmes, who had displayed uncommon courage, was honourably acquitted. Their animosities did not end with the court-martial. A bloodless encounter happened between the admiral and Captain Powell: but Captain Innes and Captain Clarke, meeting by appointment in Hyde Park with pistols, the former was mortally wounded, and died next morning: a circumstance, which, as well deserved for murder, was indulged with his Majesty's pardon.

No naval transaction of any consequence happened in the European seas, during the course of this summer. In January, indeed, the Maganuna, a French ship of the line, was taken in the channel by two English cruisers, after an obstinate engagement: and the privates took a considerable number of merchants and consuls in the exigency.

§ XXXIII. The plenipotentiaries still continued at Aix-la-Chapelle, discussing all the articles of the definitive treaty, which was at length concluded and signed on the seventh day of October. It was founded on former treaties, which were now considered as expired, and Anne of Pal- phia to the last concluded at London and Vienna. The contracting parties agreed, That the prisoners on each side shall be mutually released without ransom, and all conquests restored: That the duchies of Parma, Placentia, but Guastalla, should be ceded as a settlement to the Infant Don Philip, and the heirs male of his body; but in case of his ascending the throne of Spain, or of the two Sicilies, or his dying without male issue, that they should revert to the house of Austria: that the King of Great Britain should, immediately after the ratification of this treaty, send two persons of rank and distinction, to reside in France, as hostages, until restitution should be made of Cape Breton, and all the other conquests which His Britannic majesty should have achieved in the East or West Indies, before or after the preliminaries were signed: that the assiento contract, with the article of the annuity ships, should be immediately restored to the Spaniards, and the enjoyment of that privilege was suspended since the commencement of the present war; that Dunkirk should remain fortified on the land side, and towards the sea continuing in force as a fort, or at least, as a garrison; the contracting powers became guarantors to the King of Prussia for the duchy of Slesia and the country of Glatt, as he at present possessed them; and they likewise engaged to secure the Emperor of Hungary and Bohemia in possession of hereditary hereditary acquisitions, by the various articles of the pragmatic sanction. The other articles regulated the forms and times fixed for this mutual restitution, as well as for the termination of hostilities in different parts of the world. But the lives of subjects of the Emperor of China, who had been deprived of the privileges of the American seas, without being subject to search, was not once mentioned, though this claim was the original source of the differences between Great Britain and Spain: nor were the limits of Acadia ascertainment. This and all other disputes were left to the discussion of commissioners. We have already observed, that after the troubles of the empire began, the war was no longer maintained on British principles. It became a continental contest, and was prosecuted not so much for the purpose of injuring the enemy, as for the purpose of subservient to the spirit, or unanimity. In the Netherlands they were outnumbered and outwitted by the enemy. They never The war was a battle without sustaining a defeat. Their vast armies, paid by the British, his Majesty's forces, by order of Commons, the Russian allies would have secured an undoubted superiority in the field; when the British fleets had trampled on the naval power of France and Spain, intercepted their supplies of treasure, and cut off all their resources of commerce: the British ministers seemed to treat without the least regard to the honour and advantage of their country. They left her most valuable and necessary rights of trade unmourned and undecided: they subordinated to the impatient demand of sending the riches of the realm to grace the court and adorn the triumphs of her enemy; and they tamely gave up her conquests in North America, of more consequence to her traffic than all the other dominions for which the powers at war contended. They gave up the important isle of Cape Breton, in exchange for a petty factory in the East Indies, belonging to a private company, whose existence had been deemed prejudicial to the commerce of all the nations of Europe, the fruits which Britain reaped from this long and desperate war? A dreadful expense of blood and treasure, disgrace upon disgrace, an additional load of grievous imposition, and the national debt accumulated to the enormous sum of eighty millions sterling.

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

A. D. 1782.

§ 5. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, however unstable or inglorious it might appear to those few who understood the interests, and felt for the honour, of their country, was nevertheless not unwelcome to the nation in general. The British ministry will always find it more difficult to satisfy the people at the end of a successful campaign, than at the conclusion of an unfortunate war. The English are impatient of miscarriage and delay, and despise the signal and final step of victory. At this period they were tired of the burdens, and sick of the distractions, to which they had been exposed in the course of seven tedious campaigns. They had suffered considerable losses and interruption in the article of commerce, and some inconvenience from the occasional absence of their sovereign from court; and with even some degree of satisfaction and applause.

§ 9. Immediately after the exchange of ratifications at Aix-la-Chapelle the armies were broken up; the allies in the Netherlands withdrew their several corps of distinguished troops; the French began to evacuate Flanders; and the English forces were re-embarked for their own country. His Britannic majesty returned from his German dominions in November, having landed near Margate in October, after a dangerous passage; and on the twenty-ninth of the same month he opened the session of parliament. By this time the misunderstanding between the first two persons of the royal family had been increased by a fresh succession of matter. The Prince of Wales had held a court at Stannary, in quality of Duke of Cornwall; and revived some claims attached to that dignity, which, had they been successful, would have raised him to a high influence among the Cornishboroughs. These efforts roused the jealousy of the administration, which had always considered them as an interest wholly dependent on the Crown, and therefore the pretensions of royal highness were opposed by the whole weight of the ministry. His adherents, resuming these hostilities as an injury to their royal master, immediately joined the remnant of the former faction in parliament, and unanimously concurred all the ministerial measures that should fall under their cognizance; at least they determined to seize every opportunity of thwarting the servants of the crown, in every scheme or proposal that had not an evident tendency to the advantage of the nation. This band of auxiliaries was headed by the Earl of E—t, Dr. Lee, and Mr. N—t. The first possessed a species of eloquence rather plausible than powerful: he spoke with fluency and fire: his spirit was bold and enterprising, his apprehension quick, and his repartee severe. Dr. Lee was a man of extensive erudition, and irreproachable morals, particularly versed in the civil law, which he professed, and perfectly well acquainted with the civil law of his country. Mr. N—t was an orator of middling abilities who had acquired what all subjects indiscriminately, and supplied with confidence what he was wont in capacity: he had been at some pains to study the business of the House, as well as to understand the nature of his functions and government. He was, as he was heard, as he generally spoke with an appearance of good humour, and hazarded every whimsical idea, as it rose in his imagination. But Lord Bolingbroke is said to have been the chief speaker, which, in several actuated the deliberations of the prince's court. That nobleman, seemingly sequestered from the tumults of a public life, resided at Battersea, where he was visited like a sainted shrine by all the disingenuously votaries of war, eloquence, and political ambition. Before he was cultivated and adorned for the eloquence of his manners, and the ebullions of his conversation. The prince's curiosity was first captivated by his character, and his esteem was afterwards secured by the irresistible address of that extraordinary personage, who continued in a regular progression to insinuate himself still farther and further into the good graces of his royal patron. How far the conduct of his royal highness was influenced by the private abilities of this man, shall not pretend to determine: but, certain it is, the friends of the ministry propagated a report, that he was the dictator of those measures which the prince adopted; and that, under the specious pretext of attachment to the heir apparent, he had an intention of insinuating himself to perpetuate the breach in the royal family. Whatever his sentiments and motives might have been, this was no other than a revival of the old ministerial clamour, that a man cannot be well affected to the king, if he pretends to censure any measure of the administration.

§ 11. The weight which the opposition derived from these new confederates in the House of Commons was still greatly overbalanced by the power, influence, and ability that sustained every ministerial project. Mr. Pelham, who chiefly managed the helm of affairs, was generally esteemed as a man of honesty and candour, actuuted by a sincere love for his country, though he had been educated in the kennel of government, and in some measure obliged to prosecute a fatal system, which descended to him by inheritance. At this time he numbered Mr. Pitt among his fellow-ministers, and was moreover supported by many other individuals of great personal abilities; among whom the first place in point of genius was due to Mr. M. who executed the office of solicitor-general. This gentleman, the son of a noble family in the north of England, having been raised to a great estate by the bar, by a most keen intuitive spirit of apprehension, that seemed to seize every object at first glance; an innate sagacity, that saved the trouble of intense application; and an irresistible stream of eloquence, that flowed pure and classical, strong and copious, reflecting, in the most conspicuous point of view, the subjects over which it ruled. It was at once the great author of the negotiations, and all the entangling weeds of chicanery. Yet, the servants of the crown were not so implicitly attached to the first minister as to acquiesce in all his plans, and dedicate their fame and reputation to the support of even the most absurd measure indiscriminately. This was one material point in which Mr. Pelham deviated from the maxims of his predecessor, who admitted of no contradiction from any of his adherents or fellow-servants, but insisted on sacrifice of all principle to expediency, and discretion and disposal. That sordid deference to a minister no longer characterized the subordinate instruments of the government. It was not unusual to see the great officers of the government divided in a parliamentary debate, and to hear the secretary at war opposing with great vehemence a clause suggested by the chanceller of the exchequer. After all, if we could consider those arguments which have been handed about, and retrieved with such eagerness and ceremony in the House of Commons, and divest them of those passionate tropes and declamatory metaphors which the spirit of opposition alone had produced, we should find very little left for the subject of dispute, and accordingly, we are surprised to discover any material source of disagreement.

§ IV. In the month of November his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech, acquainting them, That he had entered into this session with the same views and objects as in all the previous ones: That he had made the most effectual provision for securing the rights and interests of his own subjects; and procured for his allies the best conditions, which in the present situation of affairs could be obtained. He said, he had found a general good disposition in all the parties to bring the negotiation to a happy conclusion; and observed, that we might promise ourselves a direct effect to a great part of the blessings they expected. Finally, after having remarked that times of tranquillity were the proper seasons for lessening the national debt, and strengthening the kingdom against future events, he recommended to the Commons the improvement of the public revenue, the maintenance of a considerable naval force, the advancement of commerce, and the cultivation of the arts of peace. This speech, as usual, was echoed back by an address to the throne from both Houses, containing general expressions of the warmest loyalty and gratitude to his majesty, and implying the most perfect satisfaction and acquiescence in the articles of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

The negotiations in the opposition, according to custom, cavilled at the nature of this address. They observed, that the late pacification was the worst and most inglorious of all the bad treaties to which the English nation had ever subscribed; that it was equally disgraceful, indefinite, and abysmal; and, in short, that it had gained such an ascendancy over the French at sea, that the sources of their wealth were already choked up; that the siege of Maestricht would have employed their arms in the Low Countries till the arrival of the Russians; and that the accession of these auxiliaries would have thrown the superiority into the scale of the allies. They did not fail to take notice, that the most important and original object of their attack was lost wholly undiscarded; and demonstrated the absurdity of their promising, in the address, to make good such engagements as his majesty had entered into with his allies, before they knew what those engagements would be. On this question, the ministers replied, that the peace was in itself rather better than could be expected; and that the smallest delay might have proved fatal to the liberties of Europe. They affirmed, that the Dutch were upon the point of concluding a neutrality in consideration of the National Rights of the Hapsburgs, and that the war would have been withdrawn from the allied army; and in that case, even the addition of the Russian auxiliaries would not have rendered it a match for the enemy. They asserted, that a declaration of the nature, granted to a power which they had literally snatched from the brink of ruin—a power whose quarter they had espoused with a degree of enthusiasm that did much more discredit to the party who betrayed the strength of Great Britain must have been entirely ruined, many of the public funds having sunk below par in the preceding season, so that the ministry had begun to despair of seeing the money paid in on the new subscription. With respect to the restoration of Cape Breton, the limits of Nova Scotia, and the right of navigating without search in the American seas, which rights had been established in the treaty, they declared, that the first was an unnecessary expense, of no consequence to Great Britain; and that the other two were points in dispute, to be amicably settled by commissioners duly authorized; but by no means articles to be established by a general treaty.

§ VII. What the opposition wanted in strength, it endeavoured to make up with spirit and perseverance. Every minister, every letter, every argument, was anguished, and stilled, and deemed with uncommon art and vivacity: but all this little availed against the single article of superior numbers; and accordingly this was the source of certain triumphs in all debates in which the servants of the crown were united. The nation had reason to expect an immediate mitigation in the article of annual expense, considering the number of troops and ships of war which had been reduced at the ratification of the treaty; but they were disagreeably undeceived in finding themselves again loaded with very extraordinary impositions, for the payment of a vast debt which government had contracted in the course of the war, notwithstanding the incredible aids granted by the nation. The committee of the house of commons established four points of consideration, in their deliberations concerning the sums necessary to be raised; namely, for fulfilling the engagements which the parliament had entered into, for the maintenance of the fleet; the first for the success of the war; for discharging debts contracted; by government for making good deficiencies; and for defraying the current expense of the year. It appeared, that the nation owed four-and-forty thousand pounds to the Elector of Bavaria; above thirty thousand to the Duke of Brunswick; the like sum to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; and near nine thousand pounds to the Elector of Meuts. One hundred and twenty thousand pounds was declared an arrear of one hundred and thousand pounds. The city of Glasgow, in North Britain, presented a petition, praying to be reimbursed the sum of ten thousand pounds, extorted from that corporation by the son of the pretender, during the rebellion. One hundred and twelve thousand pounds were owing to the forces in North America and the East Indies; besides near half a million due on extraordinary expenses incurred by the land forces in America, Flanders, and North Britain, by the office of ordinances, and other services of the last year, to which the parliamentary provision did not extend. The remaining debt of the ordinance amounted to above two hundred and thirty thousand pounds: but the army bills could not be discharged to the satisfaction of the creditors. An addition of two millions three hundred and seventy-four thousand three hundred thirty-three pounds fifteen shillings and two pence was also required for the current service of the year. In a word, the whole annual supply exceeded eight millions sterling—a sum at which the whole nation expressed equal astonishment and disgust. It was charged upon the duties on malt, mum, evder, and perry, the land tax at four shillings in the pound, annuities on the sinking fund, an application of one million from that deposit, and the loan of the like sum to be charged on the first aids of next session. The number of seamen was reduced to seventeen thousand, and that of the land forces to eighteen thousand and hundred and fifty-seven, including guards and garrison.
she squandered away, in the idle pageantry of barbarous magnificence, those ample subsidies which they advanced in aid of the late war: and all through the latter part of the war, the leaders of the opposition neglected no opportunity of imputing the triumphs of their adversaries; they inveighed against the extravagance of granting sixteen thousand pounds for the pay of general staff officers, forming a party that required no such entrenchment, especially at a juncture when the national encumbrances rendered it absolutely necessary to practise every expedient of economy. They even contended the request of the city of Glasgow, to be indemnified for the extraordinary execution it underwent from the rebels, though it appeared from unquestionable evidence, that this particular contribution was exacted on account of that city's peculiar attachment to the reigning family: that it had always invariably adhered to revolution principles; and, with an unequalled spirit of loyalty and zeal for the Protestant succession, distinguished itself both in the last and preceding rebellion.

§ VIII. But the most violent contest arose on certain regulations which the ministry wanted to establish in two bills, relating to the sea and land service. The first, under the title of a bill for amending, explaining, and reducing into a more equal and constitutional light the laws relating to the navy, was calculated solely with a view of subjecting half-pay officers to martial law—a design which not only furnished the opposition with a plausible handle for accusing the ministry of a design to encroach upon the constitution, in order to extend the influence of the crown; but also alarmed the sea-officers to such a degree, that they assembled to a considerable number, with a view to deliberate upon the proper means of defending their privileges and honour. The measure was resisted by the sea-officers; and a petition was the House of Commons, subscribed by three admirals and forty-seven captains, not members of parliament, representing, That the bill in question contained several clauses, tending to the injury and dishonour of all naval officers, as well as to the detriment of his majesty's service; and that the laws already in force had always found effectual for securing the service of officers on half-pay upon the most pressing occasions: they, therefore, hoped, that they should not be subjected to new hardships and discouragements, and begged to be heard by their counsel, before the committee of the whole House, touching such parts of the bill as they apprehended would be injurious to themselves and the other officers of his majesty's navy. This petition was presented to the House by Sir John Norris, and the motion for its being read was seconded by Sir Peter Warren, whose character was universally esteemed for its elevated principles, and which he had always endeavored to promote, both in the constitution and personal interests. His character was such, that many officers and subalterns had repaired to the admiralcy, and threatened, in plain terms, to throw up their commissions, if the bill should pass; and a general ferment was begun among all the subordinate members of the navy. A motion was made, That the petitioners, according to their request, should be heard by their counsel; and this proposal was strongly urged by the first orators of the anti-ministerial association; but the minister, confiding in his own strength, reinforced by the abilities of Mr Pitt, Mr. Luttemon, and Mr Fox the secretary at war, strenuously opposed the motion, which, upon a division, was thrown out by a great majority. The several articles of the bill were afterwards separately debated with great warmth; and though Mr. Pelham had, with the most disinterested air of candour, repeatedly declared that he required no support even from his own adherents, but that which might arise from reason unreserved, and full conviction, he, on this occasion, recapitulated all the fruit from their zeal and attachment which could be expected from the most implicit compliance. Some plausible amendments of the most exceptional clauses were offered, particularly of that which imposed an oath upon the members of every court-martial, that they should not, on any account, discharge, on transgression of such oaths, and which was considered as a sanction, under which any court-martial might commit the most flagrant acts of injustice and oppression, which even parliament itself could not repress, because it would be impossible to ascertain the truth, externally sealed up by this absurd obligation. The amendment proposed was, that the members of a court-martial should be liable, in all cases wherein the courts of justice, as the law now stands, have a right to interfere, if required thereto by either House of parliament: a very reasonable mitigation, which, however, was rejected by the majority. Nevertheless, the suspicion of an intention to extend and broaden such discour- clamour without doors, and diffused the odium of this measure so generally, that the minister thought proper to drop the projected article of war, subjecting the reformed officers of the navy to the jurisdiction of courts martial, and the bill being also softened in other particulars, during its passage through the House of Commons, at length received the royal assent.

§ IX. The fame which this act had kindled, was rather increased than abated on the appearance of a new military bill replete with divers innovations, tending to augment the influence of the crown, as well as the authority and power of a military jurisdiction. All the articles of war established since the reign of Charles the Second, were submitted to the inspection of the Commons; and in these appeared a gradual spirit of encroachment, almost imperceptibly deviating from the civil institutes of the English constitution, and obstructing the operations of the utmost importance. By this new bill a power was vested in any commander-in-chief, to revise and correct any legal sentence of a court-martial, by which the members of such a court, and the proceedings of it, were not prescribed. The measures were absolutely useless, and the commander-in-chief a great measure absolute; for he had not only the power of summoning such officers as he might choose to sit on any trial, a prerogative unknown to any civil court of judicature; but he was able to declare liberty to the prisoner, or as far as a man was subject to two trials for the same offence, and the commander-in-chief was judge both of the guilt and the punishment. By the final clause of this bill, martial law was extended to all officers in the queen's service, the same arguments which had been urged against this article in the navy bill, were now repeated and reinforced with double force. Many reasons were offered to prove that the half-pay was allotted as a recompence for past services; and the opponents of the bill affirmed, that such an article, by augmenting the dependants of the crown, might be very dangerous to the constitution. On the other hand, the partisans of the ministry asserted, that the half-pay was granted as a retaining fee, and that originally all those who enjoyed this indulgence were deemed to be in actual service, consequently subject to martial law. Mr. Pitt, who at this time exercised the office of paymaster-general of the army, and had charge of the establishment of all his predecessors in that department, espoused the cause in dispute, as a necessary extension of military discipline, which could never be attended with any had the same conclusion arrived to the same result, by which he made on this occasion implied an opinion, that our liberties wholly existed in dependence upon the direction of the sovereign, and the virtue of the army. "To that virtue (said he) we trust even at this hour, small as our army is; to that virtue we must have trusted, had this bill been modelled as its warmest opponents could have wished; and without this virtue, should the Lords, the Commons, and the people of England, entertain themselves behind parliaments up to the feet, the sword and find a passage to the vials of the constitution." All the disputed articles of the bill being sustained on the shoulders of a great majority, it was conveyed to the upper House, where it excited another violent contest. Upon the question whether officers on half-pay had not been subject to martial law, the judges were consulted and divided in their sentiments. The Earl of Bath declared his opinion, that martial law did not extend to reformed officers; and opened all the sluices of his ancient eloquence. He ad-now his opinion was entirely changed. He observed, that when the forementioned rebellion first broke out, the House presented an address to the king, desiring his majesty would be pleased to employ his officers, and gratify them with whole pay; and, indeed, a large number were voted on whole pay by the House of Commons. They were afterwards apprized of this vote, by an advertisement in the Gazette, and ordered to hold themselves in readiness to receive orders from the House of Commons, and finally commanded to repair by such a day to those places on pain of being struck off the half-pay list. These precautions would have been unnecessary, had they been deemed sufficient to prevent mutiny; but the penalty of death, and the threat of privation, could not have been merely a privation of their pensions, but they would have fallen under the punishment of death, as deserters from the service. His lordship distinguished, with great propriety and precision, between the step which had been precipitately taken in a violent crisis, when the public was heated with apprehension and resentment, and a solemn law concerted at leisure, during the most profound tranquillity. Notwithstanding the spirited opposition of this nobleman, and some efforts to insert additional clauses, the bill having undergone a few incon siderable amendments, passed by a very considerable majority.

§ X. Immediately after the routine bill had passed the lower House, another fruitless effort was made by the opposition. The danger of a standing army, on whose virtue the constitution of Great Britain seemed to depend, did not fail to meet the attention of the House. But there was nothing attached to the liberties of their country, and gave birth to a scheme, which, if executed, would have enabled the legislature to establish a militia that must have answered many national purposes, and acted as a constitutional bulwark against the pretensions of the House of Commons, as the standing force, under the immediate influence of government. The scheme which patriotism conceived, was, in all probability, adopted by party. A bill was brought in, limiting the time during which a soldiery officer, should be compelled to continue in the service. Had this limitation taken place, such a rotation of soldiers would have ensured among the common people, that in a few years every peasant, labourer, and inferior tradesman in the kingdom would have understood the exercise of arms: and perhaps the people in general would have concluded that a standing army was altogether unnecessary. A project of this nature could not, for obvious reasons, be agreed to by the administration; and therefore the bill was rendered abortive; for, after having been twice read, it was postponed from time to time, till the parliament was prorogued, and never appeared in the sequel. Such were the events of the times, and events of the times were, in their turn, the cause of the other bills of such a nature, which were proposed, and of such a nature, which were opposed, composed, as we have already observed, of the prince's servants and the remnants of the country party, this last being headed by Lord Strange, son of the Earl of Derby, and Sir Francis Dashwood; the former a nobleman of distinguished abilities, keen, penetrating, eloquent, and sagacious; the other frank, spirited, and sensible.

§ XI. It must be owned, however, for the honour of the ministry, that if they caused a few unpopular measures with a high hand, they seemed earnestly desirous of making amends to the nation, by promoting divers regulations for the benefit and improvement of commerce, which actually took place in the ensuing session of parliament. One of the principal objects of commerce, and the cause of all subsequent cogitation, was the trade to the coast of Guinea: a very important branch of traffic, whether considered as a market of British manufactures, or as the source that supplied the English plantations with negroes. This was unusually monopolized by a joint-stock company, which had from time to time derived considerable sums from the legislature, for enabling them the better to support certain forts or castles on the coast of Guinea, and protect the merchants. In the sequel, however, the exclusive privilege having been judged prejudicial to the national trade, the coast was had open to all British subjects; and the proprietors, instead of receiving any benefit from the protection of the company, industriously avoided their castles, as the receptacles of tyranny and oppression. The company, whether from the misconduct or knavery of their directors, contracted such a load of debts as their stock was unable to discharge. They seemed to neglect the traffic, and allowed their castles to decay. In a word, their credit being exhausted, and their creditors growing clamorous, they presented a petition to the House of Commons, and imploring such assistance as should enable them not only to pay their debts, but also to maintain the forts in a defensible condition. This petition recommended to the House in a manner that rendered it difficult to be rejected, by another in behalf of the company's creditors. Divers merchants of London, interested in the trade of Africa and the British plantations in America, petitioned the House, that, as the African trade was of the utmost importance to the nation, and could not be supported without forts and settlements, some effectual means should be speedily taken for protecting and extending this valuable branch of commerce. A fourth was offered by the merchants of Liverpool, representing that the security and protection of the trade of Africa must always principally depend upon his majesty's ships of war being properly stationed on that coast, and seasonably relieved; and that such forts and settlements as might be judiciously provided, for the exertion of sovereignty and possession, would prove a nuisance and barthen to the trade, should they remain in the hands of any joint-stock company, whose private interest always counter-balanced the public good. In short, the House, in the interest of the separate and open trader. They therefore prayed, that the said forts might either be taken into his majesty's immediate possession, and supported by the public, or committed to the merchants trading on that coast; in such a manner that they might be maintained, without vesting in them any other advantage, or right to the commerce, but what should be common to all his majesty's subjects. This remonstrance was succeeded by another, to the effect, that in such cases, the assembled assistants, and commonalty of the society of merchant adventurers within the city of Bristol. All these petitions were referred to a committee appointed to deliberate on this subject; who agreed to certain resolutions, implying that the trade to Africa should be free and open; that the British forts and settlements on that coast ought to be maintained; and put under proper direction; and that, in order to carry on the African trade in the most beneficial manner to the nation, the coast of Africa should be united in one open company, without any joint stock, or power to trade as a corporation. A bill was immediately founded on these resolutions, which alarmed the company's directors, and gave birth to another petition, demonstrating their right to the coast of Africa, and expressing their reliance on the justice of the House, that they should not be deprived of their property without an adequate consideration. In a few days, a second address was offered by their creditors, complaining of the company's mismanagement, promising to surrender their right, as the wisdom of parliament should prescribe; praying that their debts might be indemnified; and that the equivalent to be granted for the company's possessions might be secured and applied, in the first place, for their benefit. The Commons, in consequence of this petition, ordered the company to produce a list of their debts, together with all the British subjects engaged in the remonstrances, which their creditors had presented to them before this application to parliament. A committee of the whole House, having deliberated on these papers and petitions, and heard the company by their counsel, resolved to give them a reasonable compensation for their charter, lands, forts, settlements, slaves, and effects, to be, in the first place, applied towards the payment of their creditors. A bill to this effect was introduced in the Commons, and was conveyed to the upper House, where a great many objections were started; and for the present it was dropped until a more unexpected plan should be concerted. In the meantime, the lords address their majesties, that the lower committees of the trade and plantations might be directed to prepare a scheme on this subject, to be laid before both Houses of parliament. at the beginning or next session: that instant orders should be given for the preserving and securing the forts and settlements on the coast of Guinea belonging to Great Britain; and, that proper persons should be appointed to sit in the committees connected with these forts, as well as of the military stores, slaves, and vessels belonging to the African company, so as to make a faithful report of these particulars, with all possible expedition.

§ XIII. The government professed an inclination to promote and extend the commerce of the kingdom, the Commons resolved to take some steps for encouraging the white fishery along the northern coast of the island, where there is a natural connection between the sea and the rivers, so that the stock of herring may be increased, and employed annually a great number of hands and vessels in this branch of commerce. The sensible part of the British people, reflecting on this subject, plainly foresaw that a fishery under due regulations, undertaken with the protection and encouragement of the legislature, would not only prove a fund of national riches, and a nursery of seamen; but likewise, in a great measure, prevent any future insurrections in the highlands of Scotland, by diffusing a spirit of industry among the natives of that country, who, finding it in their power to become independent, on the fruits of their own labour, would soon extricate themselves from their present necessary servitude; and that much their trade, which they were at length connected with their landlords the cluehans. Accordingly, a committee was appointed to deliberate on the state of the British fishery; and upon their report a bill was founded for encouraging the whole fishery on the coast of Great Britain, by allowing a bounty on the per cent for every ship equipped for that undertaking. The bill having made its way through both Houses, and obtained the royal assent, the merchants in different parts of the kingdom, particularly in North Britain, began to build and fit out ships of great burthen, and peculiar structure, for the purposes of that fishery, which ever since hath been carried on with equal vigour and success. Divers merchants, of London, and others, being represented to his Majesty, by the House of Commons a petition, representing the benefits that would accrue to the community from a herring and cod fishery, established on proper principles, and carried on with skill and integrity, this remonstrance was referred to a committee, upon whose resolutions a bill was formed; but, before this could be discussed in the House, the parliament was prorogued; and on consequence this measure passed for the present.

§ XIV. The next regulation proposed in favour of trade, was that of having open the commerce of Hudson's bay, in the most northern parts of America, where a small monopoly maintained a few forts and settlements, and property which was advantageous for the trade of that continent. It was suggested, that the company had long ago enriched themselves by their exclusive privilege; that they employed no more than four annual ships; that, contrary to an express injunction in their charter, they did not encourage any attempts to discover a north-west passage to the East Indies; that they dealt cruelly and rigidly with the poor Indians, who never traded with them, except when compelled by necessity, so that the best part of the fur trade had devolved to the enemies of Great Britain; and that their exclusive patent restricted to very narrow limits a branch of commerce, which might be cultivated to a prodigious extent, as well as to the infinite advantage of Great Britain. It is true, but be it known, that the trade of Hudson's bay might be had open, were presented to the House by the merchants of London, Great Yarmouth, and Wolverhampton; and a committee was appointed to deliberate upon the subject, and lay the other branches of the company's trade before the House, as well as in petitions and private applications, for their own preservation. The committee examined many papers and records: and the report was taken into consideration by the House. Many views were entertained of the question. At length a majority seemed satisfied that the traffic on the coast of Hudson's bay could not be preserved without forts and settlements, which must be maintained either by an exclusive company or by the state; and partly this was not judged a proper puncture to encumber the nation with any charge of that kind, the design of dissolving the company was laid aside till a more favourable opportunity.

§ XV. The government had, during the war, found great difficulty in pressing men for the service of the navy and army; and it was resolved to bestow certain encouragements to these services, as well as the land forces, by in time of peace, by means of a certain allowance, a number of seamen who should be registered for the purpose, and be ready to man a squadron upon any emergency. Such a plan, properly regulated, and introduced into the commerce, which is always distrest by the practice of pressing men: and at the same time, a great security to the kingdom in dangerous conjunctions, when it may be necessary to equip an armament at a minute's warning. The House of Commons being moved upon this subject, agreed to divers resolutions, as a foundation for the bill: but the members in the opposition affecting to represent this measure in an odious light, as an imitation of the French method of registering seamen without their own consent, Mr. Pelham dropp it, as an unpopular project.

§ XVI. Information having been received, that the French intended to settle the neutral islands of St. Lucia, Dominica, St. Vincent, and Tobago, in the West Indies, the nation had taken the alarm in the beginning of the year; and a motion was made in the House of Commons to address his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to give directions for laying before the House copies of the instructions given to the commanders of the consulship two years last past, so far as they related to these neutral islands: but whether the minister was conscious of a neglect in this particular, or thought such inquiries trenches upon the prerogative of the crown, he was分辨率ed not to be exposed the nation with a collision; and after some debate, the previous question passed in the negative. This was also the fate of another motion made by the Earl of E—— for an address, extolling his Majesty's conduct; which was refused, but the House all the proposals of peace that had been made by the French king since the year which preceded the last rebellion, to that in which the definitive treaty was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. This they proposed as a previous step to the parliament's forming any opinion concerning the utility or necessity of the peace which had been established. Violent debates ensued, in which the opposition was as much excelled in oratory as out-numbered in votes. In the month of June was closed as usual with a speech from the throne; in which his majesty signified his hope, that the parliament, at their next meeting, would be able to reflect on these important events, and determine the trade and navigation of the kingdom. He likewise expressed his satisfaction at seeing public credit flourish at the end of an expensive war; and recommended unanimously as the worst balast of national state by certain worthless individuals, who, having no reliance on their own intrinsic merit, hoped to distinguish themselves as the tools of party, and to obtain favour with the ministry by securing to the company exclusive privileges in navigation and formation. Though neither the rank, age, nor connections of the delinquent were such as ought to have attracted the notice of the public, the vice-chancellor, heads of houses, and proctors of the university, knowing the invicious stratagy to which their conduct was subjected, thought proper to publish a declaration, signifying their abhorrence of all seditious practices, their determined resolution to punisb all offenders to the utmost severity and rigour of the law, all in the university; and to wait for the regulation of the university. Notwithstanding these wise and salutary precautions, the three boys, who, in the of subsistence, engage in desperate courses, and prey upon the community, it was judged expedient to provide an opening, through which these unquiet spirits might extricate themselves from the community with impunity. The first act of the new colony in North America, which, by being properly regulated, supported, and improved, might be the source of great advantage to its mother country. Many disputes had arisen between the subjects of England and France, concerning the limits of Nova Scotia, which no treaty had as yet properly ascertained. A fort had been raised, and a small garrison stationed by the French, without the consent of this very country, called Annapolis Royal, to overawe the French neutrals settled in the neighbourhood; but this did not answer the purpose for which it was intended. Upon every rupture or dispute between the two crowns, these planters, forgetting their neutrality, intrigued with the Indians, communicated intelligence to their own countrymen, settled at St. John's and Cape Breton, and did all the ill offices their hatred could suggest against the colonies and subjects of Great Britain. A scheme was now formed for making a new establishment on the same peninsula, which should further confirm and extend the property and dominion of the crown of Great Britain in that large tract of country, and constitute communities, diffuse the benefits of population and agriculture, and improve the fisheries of that coast, which might be rendered a new source of wealth and commerce to Old England. The particulars of the plan of the project, which was laid before the council, were approved of the design, and referred the execution of it to the board of trade and plantations, over which the Earl of Halifax presided. This nobleman, endowed by nature with an excellent capacity, which had been diligently and judiciously cultivated, anointed with liberal sentiments, and fired with an eager spirit of patriotism, adopted the plan with the most generous ardor, and cherished the infant colony with paternal affection. He commenced for trade and plantations immediately advertised, under the sanction of his majesty's authority, That proper encouragement would be given to such of the officers and private men, lately dismissed from the land and sea service, as were willing to settle with or without families, in the province of Nova Scotia: that the fiscible, or perpetual property, of fifty acres of land should be granted to every private soldier or seaman, free from the payment of any quit rents or taxes, for the term of ten years: at the expiration of which no person should pay more than one shilling per annum for every fifty acres so granted: that, over and above these fifty, each person should receive a grant of ten acres of land for himself and his family, and children, of which his family should consist: that further grants should be made to them as the number should increase, and in proportion as they should manifest their abilities in agriculture: that every officer, under the rank of ensign in the land service, or lieutenant in the navy, should be gratified with fourscore acres on the same conditions: that two hundred acres should be bestowed upon ensigns, three hundred upon lieutenants, four hundred upon captains, and six hundred on every officer above that degree, with proportionable considerations for the number and increase of every family: that the lands should be parcelled out as soon as possible after the arrival of the first adventurers, who should be placed in the hands of proprietors, and their property established; by virtue of which they should enjoy all the liberties and privileges of British subjects, with proper security and protection: that the settlers, with their families, should be conveyed to Nova Scotia, and maintained for twelve months after their arrival at the expense of the government; which should also supply them with arms and ammunition, as far as should be judged necessary for their defence, with proper materials and utensils for clearing and cultivating their land, and for erecting habitations, as far as the nature of the purposes for which they were established might require. This scheme was so feasible, and the encouragement so inviting, that in a little time about four thousand adventurers, with their families, arrived upon the shores of the new settlement, and, under the direction of Colonel Cornwallis, whom the king had appointed their governor, and towards the latter end of June arrived at the place of their destination, which was the harbour of Tobago, on the south coast of the peninsula, about midway between Cape Cañóo and Cape Sable. It is one of the most secure and commodious havens in the whole world, and well situated for the fishery; yet the climate is cold, the soil barren, and the whole country covered with woods of birch, fir, pine, and some oak, unfit for the purposes of timber; but at the same time extremely difficult to remove and extirpate. Governor Cornwallis no sooner arrived in this dominion, than he was joined in the negotiations of the treaty from Cape Breton, and a company of runners from Annapolis. Then he pitched upon a spot for the settlement, and employed his people in clearing the ground for laying out their town. The first inconvenience in this situation, he chose another to the northward, hard by the harbour, on an easy ascent, commanding a prospect of the whole peninsula, and well supplied with streams of fresh and wholesome water. Here he began to build a town on a regular plan, to which he gave the name of Halifax, in honour of the nobleman who had the greatest share in founding the colony; and before the approach of winter above three hundred comfortable wooden houses were built, the whole surrounded by a strong palisade. This colonist, however, has by no means answered the expectations of the projectors; for notwithstanding the ardour with which the interests of it were supported, the wild population, the repeated injuries it has reaped from the bounty of the legislature, the inhabitants have made little or no progress in agriculture; the fishery is altogether neglected, and the settlement entirely subordinated in the same manner by the individuals of the rich and noble, whose duty obliges them to reside in this part of North America.

§ XVI. The establishment of such a powerful colony in Nova Scotia could not fail giving umbrage to the French in this part of the world, who, thinking they had not thought proper to propagulatc their jealous and disgust, nevertheless employed their emissaries clandestinely stimulating and exciting the Indians to harass the colonists with hostilities, in such a manner as should effectively hinder them from extending their plantations, and perhaps induce them to abandon the settlement. Nor was this the only part of America in which the French court counteracted such pernicious practices. More than ever convinced of the importance of a considerable navy, and an extensive plantation trade, they not only excited uncommon industry in re-establishing their marine, which had suffered so severely during the war; but they resolved, if possible, to extend their sway over the West Indies, by settling the negroes on the islands, which we have already mentioned. In the beginning of the year the governor of Barbadoes, having received intelligence that the French had begun to settle the island of Tobago, recommended Captain Tyrrel that he should make a frigate, and learn the particulars. That officer found above three hundred men already landed, seemed by two batteries and two ships of war, and a daily expectation of a further reinforcement from the Marquis de Cavil, governor of Martinique, who had published an ordinance, authorizing the subjects of the French king to settle the island of Tobago, and promising to defend them from the attempts of all their enemies. This assurance was in answer to a proclamation issued by Mr. Fremville, governor of Barbadoes, and stuck up in the different parts of the island, commanding all the inhabitants to remove, in thirty days, on pain of undergoing military execution. Captain Tyrrel, with a spirit that became a commander in the British navy, gave the French officers to understand, that his most christian majesty had no right to settle in the island, which was declared neutral by treaties; and that, if they would not desert, he should be obliged to employ force in driving them from their new settlement. Night coming on, and Mr. Tyrrel's ship falling to leeward, the French captain seized that opportunity of sailing to Martinique; and next day, being informed that the French had returned, had no power to commit hostilities. These tidings, with a copy of the French governor's ordinance, were no sooner transmitted to the ministry, than they despatched a courier to the English envoy at Paris, with directions to make representations to the court of Versailles on this subject. The ministry of France, knowing they were in no condition to support the consequences of an immediate rupture, and understanding how much the merchants and people of Great Britain were alarmed and incensed at their attempts to possess these islands, thought proper to disown the proceedings of the Marquis de Cavil, and to declare the government by that measure, by sending his orders to discontinue the settlement, and evacuate the island of Tobago. At the same time, however, that the court of Versailles made this sacrifice for the satisfaction of England, the government of France observed to the English resident, that France was undoubtedly in possession of that island towards the middle of the last century. He ought in candour to have added, that although they had never sent a governor to the island, the Hollanders, during his war with that republic, it was restored to them by the treaty of Nyegeen, and since that time France could not have the least shadow of a claim to number it among her settlements. It was before this answer could be obtained from the court of Versailles, that the motion, of which we have already taken notice, was made in the House of Commons, relating to the subject of the neutral islands; a motion discouraged by the court, and defeated by the ministry.

§ XXII. The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle was celebrated by fire-works, illuminations, and rejoicings, in which the English, French, and Dutch, seemed to display a spirit of emulation. The affection which the representatives expressed of the probability, these three powers were sincerely pleased at the cessation of the war. England enjoyed a respite from intolerable supplies, exorbitant insurance, and interrupted commerce. France had re-established her navy; and France had obtained a breathing time for re-establishing her naval power, for exerting that spirit of intrigue, by dint of which she has often embroiled her neighbours, and for executing plans of immense advantage, which make much more noise and ado than the progress of open hostilities. In the affair of Tobago the French king had manifested his inclination to avoid immediate disputes with England; and had exhibited another proof of the same disposition in his behaviour to the prince pretender, who had excited such a dangerous rebellion to the island of Great Britain.

§ XXIII. Among those princes and powers who excepted against different articles of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the Chevalier de St. George, foreseeing that none of the plenipotentiaries would receive his protest, employed his agents to fix it up in the public places of Aix-la-Chapelle; a declaration of very little servitude to his cause, which was a hint to the states of Christendom, to be abandoned. So little was the interest of his family considered in this negotiation, that the contracting powers agreed, without reserve, to a literal insertion of the fifth article of this treaty; and no provision whatever was made for the annexation of the island of Tobago, with a free trade to the French navy, and the rights of the Grand Banks, which the British minister had recommended to the king of France, that neither the pretender nor any of his descendants should be allowed to reside within the territories belonging to any of the subscribing parties. At the same time the plenipotentiaries of France promised these of Great Britain that Prince Charles Edward should be immediately obliged to quit the dominions of his most christian majesty. Notice of this agreement was accordingly given by the court of Versailles to the young adventurer, and as he had declared he would never return to Italy, Monsieur de Corentin, the French envoy to the cantons of Switzerland, was directed by his sovereign to demand an asylum for Prince Edward in the city of Fribourg. The regency having complied in this particular, the young pretender, with the advice of his christian majesty, Mr. Barnaby, the British minister to the Helvetic body, took the alarm, and presented the magistracy of Fribourg with a remonstrance, couched in such terms as gave offence in that regency, and drew from them the answer. In vain had the French king exerted his influence in procuring this retreat for the young pretender, who, being pressed with repeated messages to withdraw, persisted. After the other pretenders had surrendered, the Senate of Fribourg had been so cordially invited by his cousin the King of France, that he would not forsake his in distress, nor abandon the interests of his family. Louis was not a little perplexed at this obstinacy of Prince Edward, which was the more vexatious, as that youth appeared to be the darling of the Parmaus; who not only admired him for his own accomplishments, and pitied him for his misfortunes, but considered him as his brother, being of the same family as his father, both being descendants of the renowned Henry the Fourth. At length, the two English noblemen arriving at Paris, as hostages for the performance of the treaty, and seeing him appear at all public places of diversion, composed of the court itself, and the palace and the Tuileries, as well as the Tuileries, as well as the Tuileries, it was evident that the Emperor had not been able to influence his conduct: but this resolution was not taken till the return of a courier whom he despatched to the Chevalier de St. George; who being thus informed of his son's departure, wrote a letter to him, laying strong injunctions upon him, to yield to the necessity of the times, and acquiesce with a good grace in the stipulations which his cousin of France had found it necessary to subscribe, for the interest of his realm. Edward, far from complying with this advice and instruction, signed his resolution to remain in Paris; and even declared, that he would pistol any man who should presume to lay violent hands on his person. In consequence of this bold declaration, an extraneous person, who was a thousand leagues from the Tuileries, determined to arrest him without further delay, and the whole plan of this enterprise was finally adjusted. That same evening, the prince entering the narrow lane that leads to the Tuileries, was met by the ambassador of France, who reads the edict of the king called "To arms!" on which Monsieur de Vaudreuil, exempt of the French guards, advancing to Edward, "Prince, said he, I arrest you in the king's name, by virtue of this order." At that instant the youth was surrounded by four grenadiers, in order to prevent any mischief he might have done with a case of pocket-pistols which he always carried about him; and a guard was placed at all the avenues and doors of the opera-house, lest any other escape should ensue among the population. These precipitations were taken, Vaudreuil, with an escort, conducted the prisoner through the garden of the palais royal to a house where the Duke de Bordeaux waited with a coach and six to convey him to the castle of Vincennes, whither he was immediately accompanied by a detachment from the regiment of French guards, under the command of that nobleman. He had not remained above three days in his confinement when he gave the French ministry to understand, that he would conform himself to the king's intentions: and was immediately enlarged upon giving his word and honour that he would, without delay, retire from the dominions of France. Accordingly, he set out in four days, the French troops having been engaged, conducted him as far as Pont-Bavoisin on the frontiers, where they took his leave of him, and returned to Versailles. He proceeded for some time in the road to Chambery; but soon returned into the French dominions, and, passing through Dauphine, repaired to Arvignon, where he was received with extraordinary honours by the Pope's legate. In the meantime, he arrested great murmurs at Paris; the inhabitants blaming without scruple, their king's conduct in this instance, as a scandalous breach of hospitality, as well as a mean proof of censudescence to the King of England; and many severe pamphlets relating to this transaction, were fixed up in the most public places in that metropolis.

§ XXIV. Although peace was now re-established among the principal powers of the continent, yet another storm seemed ready to burst upon the northern parts of Europe, in a fresh rupture between Russia and Sweden. Whether the czarina had actually obtained information that the French faction meditated some revolution of government at Stockholm, or she wanted a pretence for annexing Finland, is not easy to say, in either view of the transaction, that the Prince-successor of Sweden waited only for the decease of the reigning king, who was very old and infirm, to change the form of government, and resume that absolute sovereignty, which for a long time he and his ancestors had enjoyed. She seemed to think that a prince thus vested with arbitrary power, and guided by the councils of France and Prussia, with which Sweden had lately engaged in close alliance, might become a very troublesome and dangerous neighbour to her in the Baltic; she, therefore, recruited her armies, repaired her fortifications, filled her magazines, and seemed to expect the arrival of a large body of troops towards the frontiers of Finland, and declared in plain terms to the court of Stockholm, that if any step should be taken to alter the government, which she had been able to support by treaty as an ally to their sovereign, and an infringement of the treaty so lately concluded. The French king, after some hesitation between punctilio and convenience, resolved to employ violence upon the person of this troublesome stranger, since mere honour had not been able to influence his conduct: but this resolution was not taken till the return of a courier whom he despatched to the Chevalier de St. George; who being thus informed of his son's departure, wrote a letter to him, laying strong injunctions upon him, to yield to the necessity of the times, and acquiesce with a good grace in the stipulations which his cousin of France had found it necessary to subscribe, for the interest of his realm. Edward, far from complying with this advice and instruction, signed his resolution to remain in Paris; and even declared, that he would pistol any man who should presume to lay violent hands on his person. In consequence of this bold declaration, an extraneous person, who was a thousand leagues from the Tuileries, determined to arrest him without further delay, and the whole plan of this enterprise was finally adjusted. That same evening, the prince entering the narrow lane that leads to the Tuileries, was met by the ambassador of France, who reads the edict of the king called "To arms!" on which Monsieur de Vaudreuil, exempt of the French guards, advancing to Edward, "Prince, said he, I arrest you in the king's name, by virtue of this order." At that instant the youth was surrounded by four grenadiers, in order to prevent any mischief he might have done with a case of pocket-pistols which he always carried about him; and a guard was placed at all the avenues and doors of the opera-house, lest any other escape should ensue among the population. These precipitations were taken, Vaudreuil, with an escort, conducted the prisoner through the garden of the palais royal to a house where the Duke de Bordeaux waited with a coach and six to convey him to the castle of Vincennes, whither he was immediately accompanied by a detachment from the regiment of French guards, under the command of that nobleman. He had not remained above three days in his confinement when he gave the French ministry to understand, that he would conform himself to the king's intentions: and was immediately enlarged upon giving his word and honour that he would, without delay, retire from the dominions of France. Accordingly, he set out in four days, the French troops having been engaged, conducted him as far as Pont-Bavoisin on the frontiers, where they took his leave of him, and returned to Versailles. He proceeded for some time in the road to Chambery; but soon returned into the French dominions, and, passing through Dauphine, repaired to Arvignon, where he was received with extraordinary honours by the Pope's legate. In the meantime, he arrested great murmurs at Paris; the inhabitants blaming without scruple, their king's conduct in this instance, as a scandalous breach of hospitality, as well as a mean proof of censudescence to the King of England; and many severe pamphlets relating to this transaction, were fixed up in the most public places in that metropolis.

§ XXV. This declaration in all probability did not produce such effect as the interposition of his Prussian majesty, the most enterprising prince of that time, at the head of one hundred and thirty thousand men: even if the Prussian army was ever trained. Perhaps he was not sorry that the Empress of Muscovy furnished him with a plausible pretext for maintaining such a formidable army, after the peace of Paris had been so soon concluded, and all the surrounding states had diminished the number of their forces. He now wrote a letter to his uncle the King of Great Britain, complaining of the insults and measures that had been offered by the czarina to Sweden, declaring, that he was bound by a defensive alliance, to which France had acceded, to defend the government at present established in Sweden; and that he would not sit still, and tamely see that kingdom attacked by any power whatsoever without support: and as the czarina had most effectually entered this British nation to interpose his good offices, in conjunction with France and him, to compromise the disputes which threatened to embroil the northern parts of Europe. By this time the Russian army had approached the frontiers of Finland: the Swedes had assembled their troops, rephased their magazines, and repaired their marine: and the King of Denmark, jealous of the czarina's designs with regard to the duchy of Sleswick, which was contested with him by the Prince-successor of Russia, kept his army and navy on the most respectable footing. At this critical juncture, the courts of London, Versailles, and Berlin co-operated so effectually by remonstrances and declarations at Petersburg, that it was evident to the czarina that the Empress of Russia thought proper to own herself satisfied, and all those clouds of trouble were immediately dispersed. Yet, in all probability, her real aim was disappointed; and, however she might dissemble her sentiments, she never heard by force, the King of Prussia for the share he had in this transaction. That monarch, without relaxing in his attention to the support of a very formidable military power, exerted very extraordinary enterprises in cultivating the civil interests of his country. He reformed the laws of Brandenburgh, and reduced the administration of justice from the frauds of chicanery. He encouraged the arts of agriculture and manufacture; and even laid the foundation of naval commerce, by establishing an East India company in the port of Eminak.

§ XXVI. Nor did the French ministry neglect any measure that might contribute to repair the damage which the kingdom had sustained in the course of the war. One half of the army was disbanded; the severe imposition of the tenth penny was suspended by the king's edict; a scheme of economy was proposed, with respect to the finances; and the king's orders were sent to all the manufactories, as well as workmen, for ship-building, that the navy of France might speedily retrieve its former importance. In the midst of these truly patriotic schemes, the court of Versailles betook itself to the paradise of gaiety and dissipation, to which the tyranny, joined to fanaticism, in quarrelling with their parliament about superstitious forms of religion. The sacraments had been denied to a certain person on his deathbed, because he refused to subscribe to the bull Unigeni-tus. The nephew of the defunct preferred a compliant to the parliament, whose province it was to take cognizance of the affair; a deputation of that body attended the king with the report of the resolutions; and his majesty commended them to suspend all proceedings relating to a matter of such consequence, concerning which he would take an opportunity of signifying his royal pleasure. This interposition was the source of disputes between the crown and parliament, which had like to have filled the whole kingdom with intestine troubles.

§ XXVII. At Vienna the empress-queen was not more successful. She was the first to demand the trade and mercantile interests of her dominions, by summptuary regulations, necessary restrictions on foreign superfluities, by opening her ports in the Adriatic, and giving proper encouragement to commerce, than she was careful and provident in reforming the economy of her finances, maintaining a respectable body of forces, and guarding, by defensive alliances, against the enterprises of his Prussian majesty, on whose military policy she looked with jealousy and distrust. In Hesse, all the authority and influence of the state were scarcely sufficient to alloy the fermentis excited among the people, by the provisional taxation which had succeeded the abolition of the pockets, and was indeed viewed as a tax no more than the other. As an expedient, the Prince of Orange proposed a more equitable plan, which was approved by the States, and established with great difficulty. In Italy the system of commerce was carried to such a degree of perfection in the connection of the Hapsburgs with Sardinia, that the commerce of Spain and France in a defensive alliance, comprehending the King of the Two States, the Republic of Genoa, and the Dukes of Modena § XXVIII. The preparations for refining and increasing the navy of Spain were carried on with such extraordinary vigour, that other nations believed an expedition was instituted a project of the French, who had for some period grieved to provoke the trade and commerce of the Mediterranea, except France and Tuscany, who were at perpetual war with the Moors of Barbary, and for that reason obliged to employ foreign ships for the transportation of their merchandize. This employment naturally devolves upon those nations, whose vessels are in no danger from the depredations of the Barbary corsairs: namely, the subject, the maritime powers, who for this piny advantage, not only receive the economical profits of the wealth of all the rich and opulent states of Europe, but themselves, by arms and armament, solicit their passage, and purchase their forbearance with annual presents, which, in effect, equivalent to a tribute; whereas, by unavailing exertions on their part, they would only befall the loss of their interests, and the inability to redeem those precarious breaches of despicable habitants. Even

All the condensation of those disgrace themselves with the title of allies to these miscreants is not always sufficient to restrain them from acts of cruelty and violence. At this very period four cruisers from Algiers made a capture of an English packet-boat, in her voyage from Lisbon, and conveyed her to their city, where she was plundered of money and effects to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds, and afterwards dismissed. In consequence of this outrage, Commodore Keppel was sent with seven ships of war to condoime satisfaction, and to impose some extents from the Barbary corsairs, which had arisen on account of arrears claimed of the English by the Day of Algiers.

The Musselocke, the corsairs, who, having been divided among the captors, could not possibly be re-formed into one body, was attacked and defeated by some of the vessels of war. The pates of Algiers were invested with the sequl, an Almanni ambassador arrived in London with some presents of wild heats for his British majesty. This transaction was succeeded by another injunction from the British ambassador, who succeeded to his post. Mr. Lutton, an English ambassador, sent thither to redeem the British subjects, who had been many years enslaved in the dominions of the King of Morocco. A resolution having lately happened in this empire, Muley Abdallah, the regnang ryllian, insisted upon the ambassador's paying a pretended balance for the ransom of the captives, as well as depositing a considerable sum, which had already been paid to a released bawab; alleging that as (he emperor) received no part of it, the payment was illegal. Mr.
Lutton refusing to comply with this arbitrary demand, his house was surrounded by a detachment of soldiers, who violently dragged his secretary from his presence, and threw him to the dungeon; but no more than the continued twenty days. The English slaves, to the number of twenty-seven, were doomed to the same fate, and the ambassador himself was degraded from his character, deprestable and deplorable. On the sixteenth day, all letters directed to him were intercepted, and interpreted to the alcaide: two negro porters were instructed with the keys of all his apartments, and a couple of soldiers posted in his chamber-door; nay, this Moorish governor threatened to load him with irons, and violently seized part of the presents designed by his British majesty for the emperor. At length, finding that nothing but Mr. Lutton, or the governor of Gibraltar, whom he had written, would deposit the money, without fresh instructions from the court of London, the barbarian thought proper to relax in his severity: the prisoners were enforced, the restrictions removed from the person of the ambassador, and, after all these indignities offered to the honour of the British nation, the balance was paid, and the affair quietly adjusted.

§ XXIX. Britain, in the meanwhile, was alternately lacer-ated by wars which might deserve a place in a general history. Commerce and manufactures flourished again to such a degree of increase as had never been known in the island; but this advantage was attended with an irreavailing increase of that commerce and manufactures, which were a source of so much danger to the peace of all the people, breaking down all the mounds of civil polity, and opening a way for license and immorality.
The highways were infested with rapine and manslaughter; the cities teemed with the tumults, the riot, the roughness, and the procuages of towns all over the place. The whole land was overspread with a succession of tumult, riot, and tumult, excited in different parts of the kingdom by the erection of new turnpikes, which the legislature judged necessary for the convenience of inland carriage. In order to quell these disturbances, recourse was had to the military power: several individuals were slain, and some were executed as examples.

§ XXX. In the month of November the session of parliament was opened with a speech from the throne, in which his majesty expressed a particular pleasure in meeting them at a time when the perfect re-establishment of a general peace was to be expected, and every one was quiet and tranquillity. He said, the good effects of these already appeared in the flourishing condition of national commerce, and in the use of public credit, which were the fruits of the prosperity of commerce, and the wealth of all ages. He declared, that, during the summer, he had used every opportunity of cementing and securing the peace; that it was his firm resolution to do every thing in his power for the preservation of it, and religiously adhere to the engagements into which he had entered. Finally, he took notice of the good disposition he had found in the other contracting parties in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to cherish the public tranquillity of Europe; and he economically recommended to the two Houses the maintenance of a strong naval power, as the bulwark of national security.

§ XXXII. When the motion was made for an address of thanks to the House of Commons, the first paragraph of his majesty's speech furnished the opposition with a handle to declaim against the late treaty. Sir John Hylde Cotton observed, That the peace could not be properly styled complete, as nothing had been added thereto with respect to the article of "no search," alluding to the interruption of our commerce had sustained from the Spaniards in the West Indies; a stipulation, without which both Houses of parliament would never have consented to a peace with that kingdom. In the present conjuncture of affairs such an objection savoured rather of party than of patriotism: and indeed Sir John declared, that the remarks he made upon the occasion were rather in discharge of the duty he owed to his country, than in hope of seeing his sentiments espoused by the majority. Some sharp altercation was used in the debate which arose on this subject; and many severe invectives were levelled at those who negotiated, as well as at those who approved and confirmed, the treaty. But Mr. Pelham, who sustained the whole weight of the debate on the side of administration, answered every objection with equal energy and decision. He contended that the terms of peace were as favourable as could be expected, considering the unfortunate events of the war, and the situation of the contending powers: he at least demonstrated, that it would be the interest of the kingdom to accept such a ratification of the treaties as was proposed. He observed, that the terms of peace were as advantageous as could be, considering the different powers of Europe were, in effect, disadvantageous and prejudicial to the interests of Great Britain. In answer to these assertions, Mr. Pelham undertook to prove, from the register of imports and exports, that the commerce of the kingdom was more extensive at this than at any former period; and that the public credit was strong enough to admit of an experimental measure, which he recommended, as the establishment of peace. He reminded them, that a parliament of Great Britain had once voted "no peace while any part of the West Indies should remain in possession of the Spanish king;" yet a train of incidents, which they could not possibly foresee, afterwards rendered it expedient to adopt a peace, without insisting upon the accomplishment of that condition. In a word, we must own, that in the majority of debates, excited in the course of this session, to promote the interest of the nation, as of reason, as well as from the weight of influence. We shall always, however, except the efforts that were made for reducing the number of land forces to fifteen thousand, and the reduction of their pay to two pounds sterling each, as a measure proposed. On these constitutional points the Earl of Egmont, and the other chiefs of the opposition, expounded with all the energy of eloquence, which, however, was frustrated by the weight of superior numbers. Ten thousand seamen were voted for the services of the ensuing year, notwithstanding his majesty's injunction to maintain a considerable navy; and the number of land forces was continued at eighteen thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven. The sums granted for making good his majesty's engagements with the Electors of Bavaria and Meutz, and the Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, amounted to fifty-three thousand two hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling. The services due from the subscribers to the nation, which had already been paid, were gratified with the sum of one hundred twenty-two thousand two hundred forty-six pounds. The expense incurred by the new colony of Nova Scotia exceeded seventeen thousand pounds.

A small sum was voted for the improvement of Georgia; and ten thousand pounds were granted towards the support of the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa. The sum total granted in this session arose to four millions one hundred forty-one thousand six hundred sixty-one pounds nine shillings five pence, and eleven shillings ten pence, or fifteen pounds, at three shillings in the pound; the malt and other duties, and the surplus of divers impositions remaining in the bank and exchequer; one million by annuities, at three per cent. charged on the sinking fund, until redeemed by parliament; and nine hundred thousand pounds out of the excess or overplus of monies denominated the sinking fund.

§ XXXII. But the capital measure which distinguished this session of parliament was the renewal of the sinking fund on the public funds; a scheme which was planned and executed by the minister, without any national disturbance or disquiet, to the astonishment of all Europe; the different nations of which could not comprehend how it would be possible for the government, at once, to discharge a long and expensive war, which had so considerably drained the country, and augmented the enormous burthen of national debt, to find monies for paying off such of the public creditors as might choose to receive the principal, rather than submit to a reduction of the interest. It was not very much for the honour of the opposition, that some of its leading members endeavoured to impeach this great measure of property by taking what they, perhaps, thought, was a ground of personal objection for refusing to make it known; affirming in parliament, in opposition to his majesty's speech, that the nation, far from being in a flourishing condition, was almost entirely exhausted; that commerce dropped and declined; that public credit was tottering on the brink of ruin; that all the treaties had been concluded among the different powers of Europe were, in effect, disadvantageous and prejudicial to the interests of Great Britain. In answer to these assertions, Mr. Pelham undertook to prove, from the register of imports and exports, that the commerce of the kingdom was more extensive at this than at any former period; and that the public credit was strong enough to admit of an experimental measure, which he recommended, as the establishment of peace. He reminded them, that a parliament of Great Britain had once voted "no peace while any part of the West Indies should remain in possession of the Spanish king;" yet a train of incidents, which they could not possibly foresee, afterwards rendered it expedient to adopt a peace, without insisting upon the accomplishment of that condition. In a word, we must own, that in the majority of debates, excited in the course of this session, to promote the interest of the nation, as of reason, as well as from the weight of influence. We shall always, however, except the efforts that were made for reducing the number of land forces to fifteen thousand, and the reduction of their pay to two pounds sterling each, as a measure proposed. On these constitutional points the Earl of Egmont, and the other chiefs of the opposition, expounded with all the energy of eloquence, which, however, was frustrated by the weight of superior numbers. Ten thousand seamen were voted for the services of the ensuing year, notwithstanding his majesty's injunction to maintain a considerable navy; and the number of land forces was continued at eighteen thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven. The sums granted for making good his majesty's engagements with the Electors of Bavaria and Meutz, and the Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, amounted to fifty-three thousand two hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling. The services due from the subscribers to the nation, which had already been paid, were gratified with the sum of one hundred twenty-two thousand two hundred forty-six pounds. The expense incurred by the new colony of Nova Scotia exceeded seventeen thousand pounds.

A small sum was voted for the improvement of Georgia; and ten thousand pounds were granted towards the support of the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa. The sum total granted in this session arose to four millions one hundred forty-one thousand six hundred sixty-one pounds nine shillings five pence, and eleven shillings ten pence, or fifteen pounds, at three shillings in the pound; the malt and other duties, and the surplus of divers impositions remaining in the bank and exchequer; one million by annuities, at three per cent. charged on the sinking fund, until redeemed by parliament; and nine hundred thousand pounds out of the excess or overplus of monies denominated the sinking fund.

with the terms proposed, and subscribed their respective annuities before the end of February; but the three great companies at first kept aloof, and refused to subscribe any part of their capital, till the end of March.

§ XXX. About the middle of March the Commons ordered the proper officers to lay before them an account of the sums which had been subscribed, and they were then to cause the said proportionation by a committee of the House; and it was then that Mr. Pelham, as chancellor of the exchequer, observed, that besides the debts due to the three great companies in their corporate capacity, all the rest, everyone four per centum interest, had been subscribed. In this case, the proprietors, or subscribers, the proprietors of those companies of which had forfeited the favour designed by them to parliament: but as many of these had been misled by evil counsellors, who perhaps were more intent on distressing the government, than solenmly to serve their friends; and as many were foreigners, residing beyond sea, who had not time to take proper advice, and give the necessary instructions; and as these could not possibly be distinguished from such as refuse to subscribe from mere obstinacy or deceitful, it might be thought cruel to take the most rigorous advantage of the forfeiture they had incurred. With respect to the proprietors of the stock or capital belonging to the three great companies, he asserted, that many of them would have subscribed their proportions within the prescribed time, but were necessarily excluded by the majority on the ballot; and as it was equally impossible to know those who were against the question on the ballot, he thought that the present necessity was due even to the proprietors of those three companies: his opinion, therefore, was, that they and the uncomplying annuitants should be indulged with further time to complete their subscriptions; but, in order to preserve the authority of parliament, and the respect due to that august assembly, they ought not to be gratified with such advantageous terms as were allowed to the annuitants who at first cheerfully complied with the proposals offered by the legislature. For these reasons he proposed that the subscribers should not be proscribed till the thirteenth day of May, the encouragement of three pounds ten shillings per centum per annum should not be continued to the second subscribers longer than till the fifth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five.

The proposal being approved, a bill was framed for this purpose, as well as for redeeming such annuities as should not be subscribed, which passed through both Houses, and was enacted into a law, after having received an additional clause, empowering the East India Company, in case they should subscribe all their stock bearing an interest of four per centum, to borrow, with the consent of the treasury, any sums not exceeding two hundred thousand pounds, for a period of several rates of interest before proposed to be paid by the public, and one million more at three per centum per annum. They were also vested with a power to raise money by bonds as formerly; yet so as the whole, including the annuities, should not exceed what they were by former acts empowered to borrow. The objections to the execution of this project, which by many were deemed insurmountable, entirely vanished before the fortune, perseverance, and caution of the minister; who had secured, among the most wise of the nation, the promise of such sums as would have been sufficient to pay off the capital belonging to those creditors who might refuse to accept the interest till reduced. The second subscription had the desired effect. The three great companies acquiesced, and their example was followed by other scrupulous annuitants; the national burthen was considerably lightened, and the sinking fund considerably increased, without producing the least perplexity or disturbance in the commonwealth; a circumstance that could not fail to give the most universal admiration and envy of all Christians.

§ XXXIV. The mutiny bill for the ensuing year was mitigated with an essential alteration, relating to the oath of secrecy imposed upon the members of every court-martial who were to try offenders in the service; to give evidence, by due course of law, in any court of justice; and whereas, by the former mutiny bill, a general was empowered to order the revulsion and sentence by a court-martial as often as he pleased, and, on that pretence, he kept the drum beating, both on the land and sea, upon a fair trial, it was now enacted, that no sentence pronounced by any court-martial and signed by the president, should be more than once liable to revulsion. Colonel George Townshend, son of Lord Viscount Townshend, who had equally distinguished himself by his civil and military accomplishments, proposed another clause, for preventing any non-commissioned officer being broke or reduced into the ranks; or any soldier being punished, but by the sentence of a court-martial. He gave the House to understand, that certain persons attended at the door, who from the station of non-commissioned officers had been broke, and reduced into the ranks, without trial, or any cause assigned; and that these were capable of extending both to the existing officers, as well as to the new establishments; but also upon the danger of leaving such arbitrary power in the hands of an individual officer. A warm debate was the consequence of this motion, which, however, was not carried by a large majority.

§ XXXV. Among other regulations made in the course of this session for the encouragement of the British manufactures, a large duty was laid upon Irish silk-cloth, which being sold at an under price, was found to import the same species of commodity fabricated in the island of Great Britain; and, for the further benefit of this last, the bounty on the exportation of it, which had been deducted from a defective fund, was now made payable out of the common fund, the same year a considerable addition to a duty was made upon sugar, in the proportion of a duty of two pounds, would be levied on forty pounds of sugar. This was thought sufficient to discourage the importation of foreign sugar, and in consequence of its being the only commodity in which the Swedes again entered into competition with the French, and other mercantile powers, those necessaries and superfluities with which they might have been as cheaply furnished by Great Britain. In the meantime the English importers of foreign sugar were taking advantage of the making advantage of their own produce, in exchanging their manufactures for such commodities as they were under the necessity of procuring from their mother-country. Such restriction was not only a cruel grievance upon our own settlements, but also attended with manifest prejudice to the interest of Great Britain, annually drained of great sums, in favour of an ungrateful nation, from which no part of them returned; whereas the iron imported from America must of necessity come in exchange for our own manufactures. The Commons having appointed a day for taking this affair into consideration, carefully examined into the state of the British manufactures, and having with Sweden, as well as into the accounts of its imports from the plantations in America; and a committee of the whole House having resolved, that the duties on American pig and bar-iron should be removed, a bill was brought in for that purpose, containing a clause, however, to prevent his majesty's subjects from making steel, and establishing rolls for sitting and rolling iron within the British colonies of America; this precaution being taken, that the embargo might not interfere with the manufactories of their mother-country.

§ XXXVI. The next commercial improvement, of which we shall take notice, was the bill for the encouragement of the British while building and equipping ships. This was the result of the expense of transporting, importation, that a bounty of thirty shillings per ton should be granted, and paid out of the customs to all new vessels from twenty to fourscore tons burthen, which should be built for that purpose, and annually employed in the coasting trade, should be incorporated, under the name of the Free British Fishery, by a charter, not exclusive, with power to raise a capital not exceeding five hundred thousand pounds; and that three pounds ten shillings per centum per annum should be granted and paid out of the customs to the proprietors for fourteen years, for so much of the capital as should be actually employed in the said fisheries. Corresponding chambers were proposed to be erected in remote parts of North Britain, for taking in subscriptions, and prosecuting the trade, under the directions of the company at London; and the nation seemed eager to dispute this branch of commerce with the subjects of other countries, and particularly with the French and English traders.

In the House of Peers, however, the bill met with a formidable opposition from the Earl of Winchelsea and Lord Sandy's, who justly observed, that it was a cruel, inconsistent, and dangerous, project, intended to answer the expectations of the people; that in contending with the Dutch, who are the patterns of unwearied industry, and the most rigid economy, nothing could be more absurd than a joint-stock company, which is always clogged with extraordinary expense; and the resolution of fitting out vessels at the port of London, where all sorts of materials, labour, and seamen are so much dearer than in any other part of the united kingdom, exclusive of the great distance and dangerous voyage between the metropolis and the sound of Brassa in Shetland, the rendezvous at which all the herring vessels were to assemble in the beginning of the fishing season. They likewise took notice of the heavy duty on salt, used in curing the fish for sale, and the beef for provision to the warrows; a circumstance of itself sufficient to discourage adventurers from embarking in a commerce, which, at best, yields but very slender profits. The clauses of this bill, therefore, might prove to the community in general. These objections were answered by the Duke of Argyle and the Earl of Granville, who seemed to think that this branch of trade could not be fairly set on foot, unless some provision were made for the money of a single individual would be able to prosecute the fishery at a smaller expense than that which particular traders must necessarily incur; that the present spirit of the nation, which was cagerly bent upon trying the experiment, ought not to be baulked by delay, lest it should evaporate; and that though the plan was not unexceptionable, the defects of it might in the sequel be remedied by the legislature. In a word, the bill was adopted by the majority, with a small amendment in the title, which produced some dissuasives in the lower House; but this dispute was compromised, and it was enacted into a law. The consequences of this measure would be more agreeable to the public than the sanction of the legislature to this favourite plan, which was ardently promoted, and patronized by men of the greatest eminence for wealth and popularity. The company chose for their governor the Prince of Wales, who received this proof of their attachment and respect with particular marks of satisfaction: the president and vice-president were both aldermen of London; and the council was composed of thirty gentlemen, the majority of whom were members of parliament. Great skill was used, to learn the Dutch method of curing the fish. People crowded with their subscriptions; a number of hands were employed in building and equipping the hundreds of vessels used to the fishery; and the most favourable consequences were expected from the general vigour and alacrity which animated these preparations. But the success did not gratify the sanguine hopes of the projectors and adventurers. The objections made in the House of Lords soon appeared to have been well founded; these co-operating with mismanagement in the directors, the spirit of the company began to flag, the natural consequences of commercial disappointment, and now the British fishery seems to languish under the neglect of the legislature.

§ XXXVII. Touching the trade to the coast of Africa, petitions were renewed by the company and its creditors, the merchants of Bristol, Liverpool, and Lancaster; and a remonstrance was presented by the planters and merchants interested in the British sugar settlements in America; but the Commons adhered to their former resolutions of laying open the trade, and limiting the number of vessels, and the public expense, and reducing the commerce by a combination of merchants, representing the chief trading towns in the kingdom, to be superintended by the board of trade and plantations. The bill was accordingly framed and presented; but it was rejected by his majesty's ministers, and opposition, obtained the royal assent. Over and above these wise, salutary, and patriotic measures for the improvement of commerce, they encouraged the importation of raw silk by an act, reducing the duties formerly payable on that which was the growth of China to the same that is raised on the raw silk from Italy, and allowing the same drawback upon the exportation of the one which had been there. They then usually granted it to those vessels that were brought in for the encouragement of the growth and culture of silk in Carolina and Georgia, where it had been lately produced with extraordinary success, by freeing all duties that should be imported from his majesty's dominions in America; and a third was framed, permitting raw silk of the growth or produce of Persia, purchased in Russia, to be imported into Great Britain, from any port or place belonging to the empire of Russia. The measures of the crown were supported by assent, to rectify certain abuses in the army and administration; some bills were brought in, and several petitions were left on the table; but all of them proved abortive, and the whole spirit of the measures of his majesty was resolved that no benefit should flow upon the nation through any channel but his own. Nevertheless it must be acknowledged for the honour of his memory, that there is no session on record so productive as this was of measures advantageous to the community.

§ XXXVIII. The people, however, were not entirely satisfied with the conduct of the administration, if we may judge from the ferment and commotions raised during the progress of an election for a citizen to represent the city of Westminster in parliament. The seat which had been filled by Lord Trentham, eldest son of Earl Gower, having become vacant in consequence of that nobleman's accepting the office of lord mayor of London, it was determined to use their utmost endeavours to baffle the choice of the voters, and considerable sums of money were saved to the nation. They observed, that the importations of iron from America could no more affect the ironworks and friends of iron than the tobacco of Virginia from any other country; but they proved that the people of America must be reined forth from the power and provisions of the ministry, and resolved that no benefit should flow upon the nation through any channel but his own. Nevertheless it must be acknowledged for the honour of his memory, that there is no session on record so productive as this was of measures advantageous to the community.

They likewise suggested, that if all the iron manufacturers of Great Britain should be obliged to depend upon a supply of iron from the producers, this would not only be a violation of the rights of the free agents and the enemy, the manufacturers would probably decay in consequence of the return of their original produce, and encourage them to take a greater quantity of the foreign, and therefore the greatest benefit from the importation of the metal of the same kind. But it was observed, that the importation of iron from America was no more to be considered as endangering the commerce of Great Britain than the introduction of foreign silk from that quarter, which would improve the manufactures of the nation, and be supplied from the colonies in America, the importation would cease. designs of the court, and at the same time take vengeance on the family of Earl Gower, who had entirely abandoned the opposition, of which he was formerly one of the most resolute supporters.

With this view, a general consultation was held, and the members agreed to resolutions, and set up a private gentleman, named Sir George Vandremar, as the competitor of Lord Trentham, declaring that they would support his pretensions at their own expense, being the more encouraged to this enterprise by the sudden and most unexpected elevation of the Prince of Wales and his adherents. They accordingly opened houses of entertainment for their partisans, solicited votes, circulated remonstrances, and propagated abuse: in a word, they exercised, with surprising spirit and perseverance, against the whole interest of St. James's. Nobles were hired and processions made on both sides, and the city of Westminster was filled with tumult and uproar. The mutual animosity of the parties seemed every day to increase during the election, and a great number of unqualified votes were presented on both sides: all the powers of instigation, obliquity, and ridicule, were employed to vilify and depreciate both candidates. At length the poll being closed, a majority of votes appeared in behalf of Lord Trentham: but a scrutiny being demanded by the other side, the returning officer complied with their request. The speaker of the lower House had issued his warrant for an election about the middle of November, and towards the end of February Mr. Fox, secretary at war, standing up, and observing that no return had yet been made, thought proper to move, that the clerk of the crown should be ordered to the election of the western side, the under sheriff of Middlesex, and the high bailiff of Westminster, should attend next morning, and give an account of their issuing, delivering, and executing the writ of election. These being examined, and the high bailiff declaring that he would proceed with all possible dispatch in the scrutiny, which had been demanded and was begun, Mr. Speaker explained to him some particulars of his duty; in the discharge of which, he was given to understand, he should be honest, zealous, and sedulous; and that he should meet with any obstruction which he could not otherwise surmount. By the violence and caprice with which a great number of votes were contested on both sides, the scrutiny was protracted a long time, and the return attended with some extraordinary consequences, which shall be particularized among the transactions of the next year. In the meantime, the present session of parliament was closed on the twelfth day of April, with a speech from the throne, commanding the Commons for having seized the very first opportunity of reducing the interest of the national debt, without the least infringement upon the faith of parliament; and congratulating them on the prosperity of the public in general, which could only fail to add strength and reputation to the government, both at home and abroad. Immediately after the rising of the parliament, his majesty appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence; and embarked for the continent, in order to visit his German dominions.

§ XXXIX. The month of January and the beginning of February were distinguished, the first day, by a very remarkable Aurora Borealis, appearing at night to the north-east, of a deep and dusky red colour, like the reflection of some great fire, for which it was by many people mistaken; and the confusions, unlike those that are generally observed, did not meet in the zenith, but in a point some degrees to the southward. February was ushered in by terrible peals of thunder, flashes of lightning, and such a tempest of wind, hail, and rain, as, overwhelming with fear and astonishment the inhabitants of Bristol, where it chiefly raged. On the eighth day of the same month, between twelve and one in the afternoon, the people of London were still more dreadfully alarmed by the shock of an earthquake, which shook all the houses within a considerable distance, and that the furniture, fixed on the floors, the pewter and porcelain rattled on the shelves, the chamber bells rang, and the whole of this commotion was attended with a clap or noise resembling that produced by the explosion of gunpowder. The shock was felt throughout the cities of London and Westminster, and was felt on both sides the river Thames, from Greenwich to the westward of London; but not perceptible at a considerable distance. On the very same day of the next month, between five and six o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the metropolis were again affrighted by a second earthquake, yet not so violently amusing as it waked the greater part of the people from their repose. It was preceded by a succession of thick low flashes of lightning, and a rumbling noise, like that of a heavy carriage rolling over a hollow pavement. The shock lasted but a few seconds, and produced no more than a violent convulsion, which lasted some seconds, and violently shook every house from top to bottom. Again the chairs rocked, the shelves clattered, the small bells rang, and in some places public clocks were heard striking, and persons roused by this terrible visitation, started from their beds, and ran to their doors and windows in distraction; yet no life was lost, and no house overturned by this concussion, though it was so dreadful as to threaten an immediate dissolution of the globe. The circumstance, however, did not fail to make a deep impression upon ignorant, weak, and superstitious minds, which were the more affected by the consideration, that the two shocks were periodic; that the second, which happened exactly one month after the first, had been the more violent; and that the next increasing in proportion, might be attended with the most dismal consequences. This general notion was confirmed, and the most extraordinary visions, and prodigies, and adorations of a fanatic soldier, who publicly preached up repentance, and boldly prophesied that the next shock would happen on the same day in April, and totally destroy the city. The heart was filled with astonishment at the infectious nature of fear and superstition, and the emphatic manner in which the imagination had been prepared and prepossessed, it was no wonder that the prediction of this illustrious enthusiast should have contributed in a great measure, to augment the general terror. The churches were crowded with penitent sinners: the songs of riot and profanity were overawed into sobriety and decorum. The streets no longer resounded with excursions, or the crowd of the House of Commons, by which the hope of charity was liberally opened. Those, whom fortune had enabled to retire from the devoted city, fled to the country with hurry and precipitation, insomuch that the highways were encumbered with horses and carriages. Many who had, in the beginning, combated these groundless fears with the weapons of reason and ridicule, began insensibly to imitate the contagion, and felt their hearts fail, in proportion as the hour of probation approached, and even science and philosophy were not proof against the unaccountable effects of this communication. In afterages it will hardly be believed, that on the evening of the eighth day of April, the open fields that skirted the metropolis were so crowded with spectators, which could only be explained by an ambition to add to the strength and reputation of the government, both at home and abroad. Immediately after the rising of the parliament, his majesty appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence; and embarked for the continent, in order to visit his German dominions.

§ XL. By this time all the grand objects in England were filled with the refuse of the army and navy, which having been dismissed at the peace, and either averse to labour, or excluded from employment, had naturally preyed upon the commonalty, who, without the benefit of proper regulations, might have been rendered serviceable to the community, were executed as examples; and the rest punished miserably, amidst the stench and horrors of noisome dungeons. Even the prison of Newgate was rendered so infectious by the uncommon crowds of confined felons, stowed together in close apartments, that the very air they breathed acquired a pestilential degree of infection, and consequently there was a very great number of deaths among the malefactors brought to trial at the bar of the Old Bailey in May, produced among the audience a pestilential fever, which infected and proved fatal to the people of the court, who were not employed. The judges, divers lawyers who attended the session, the greatest part of the jury, and a considerable number of the spectators. In order to prevent such disasters for the future, the goals were cleansed, and accommodated with ventilators, which exhaust the foul and supply a circulation of fresh air; and other humane precautions were taken in the establishment of the resort.

§ LII. The affairs of the continent underwent no remarkable alteration. An ambassador extraordinary being sent to Petersburg from the court of London, declared, to the czarina's minister, that in case of a rupture between Russia and Austria, the latter country, for the honor and supremacy of the empire, which were contested against his Britannic majesty, the czarina's minister would consider Russia as the aggressor, and the czarina could not expect that he would supply her with the succours which he could give by treaty to furnish her with remonstrances in case she should be attacked. A declaration of the same nature was made by the ambassador of her imperial majesty the Queen of Hungary, while the ministers of France and Prussia, who were in strict alliance with Sweden, gave her to understand, that they would punctually fulfil their engagements with the court of Stockholm, should she actually invade the Swedish territories of Finland. The spirit with which the King of Prussia exerted himself on this occasion, gave infinite umbrage to the czarina, who, indeed, expressed her resentment, by treating the minister of Brandenburgh with contemptuous neglect, and even refused to favour him with an audience, till he should make a formal and public protest. These were some of the misunderstandings between those two powers, which, in the sequel, grew up to the most bitter animosity, and served to inflame those dissensions, which, as a result of the general spirit of mutiny with which the trooping of the guard was accompanied. The remonstrance of his Prussian majesty with respect to the troubles of the North, was couched in such terms as gave dissatisfaction to the court of Petersburg. The Russian minister recalled from Berlin, without the consent of taking leave, and the Prussian ambassador Warendorf was recalled from the court of the czarina.

§ XLII. The attention of his Britannic majesty was not wholly diverted by the disputes between Russia and Sweden. He had another object in view, which more nearly concerned the interest of his German dominions; and had set on foot two negotiations of the utmost importance to the commerce and advantage of Great Britain. His first and principal aim was, in conjunction with the court of Vienna, to take such measures as would secure the succession of the imperial dignity to the Archduke Joseph, eldest son and heir to the reigning emperor. As the previous step to that object, an embassy was composed to act upon the principles of the King of the Romans; and for this purpose it was necessary to procure a majority not only of the electors, but also in the diet of the empire, through which the proposal might be transmitted to the British plantations. In order to effect this expedient to the German princes. Subsidies were offered to the maritime powers of England and the States-general, to the Electors of Mentz and Cologne; and a treaty of the same nature was concluded with the Elector of Bavaria, who, in consideration of an annual subsidy, amounting to forty thousand pounds sterling, two-thirds to be paid by Great Britain, and the rest by the States-general, engaged to keep in readiness a body of six thousand infantry, as auxiliaries to the maritime powers, though not to act against the emperor or empire; and to join the interest of his Britannic majesty in the diet, as well as in the elective college. In order to render the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, and the other princes of Germany, immodulated with the loan of a very considerable sum upon the mortgag of certain bailivlicks and lordships belonging to the Saxton dominions. Thus a majority of the electors was secured, and such foundations were laid for the success of this project, that it was generally believed it would be accomplished in his Britannic majesty's next visit to his German dominions. Hopes, it was said, were given to the other parties that they should be gratified, by erecting the house of Hesse Cassel, of which he was head, into a tenth electorate. Arguments of an interesting nature were used with the King of Prussia, and the Elector Palatine, that if possible, the diet might unanimously approve of his Britannic majesty's necessity for establishing the peace of the empire, and preventing such troubles as arose from a disputed succession at the death of Charles the Sixth. These endeavours, however, did not succeed in their full extent.

§ XLIII. The King of Prussia, as Elector of Brandenburgh, opposed to the courts of Vienna and England, on account of the health and vigour of the reigning emperor, and the tender years of the archduke. This monarch had set himself up as a balance to the power of the house of Austria, which had long aspired to absolute dominion in the German empire, its co-existent right of succession to the empire; he, therefore, employed all his influence to frustrate the measure proposed, either actuated by a spirit of pure patriotism, or inspired by hope that he had not yet throughproper declaration. The opposition was joined by the Elector Palatine, and counseled by the French king; who protested, that, for the sake of peace, he would not oppose this election, though contrary to the golden bull, provided it should be confirmed by the unanimous consent of the electoral college; but should any one member signify his dissent, and he or any state of the empire claim the protection and assistance of his most Christian majesty, he could not dispense with granting both, in consequence of his being guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia: an engagement by which he was obliged to succour those princes and states of the empire who might have recourse to him, in case of any grievances that he might suffer with his allies stipulated in that constitution. This declaration co-operating with the known character of his Prussian majesty, whose great army overawed Hanover and Bohemia, in all probability dashed all hopes of Vienna, and the ministers of France had hitherto prosecuted this important negotiation.

§ XLIV. The second object that employed the attention of the British ministry was the establishment of the peace limits of Acadia to Nova Scotia, where the new colony had suffered great misfortune and interruption from incursions of the Indians, excited to these outrages by the subjects and emissaries of France. Commissioners had been appointed by both crowns, to meet at Paris, and compromise these disputes, and to attempt to extinguish this abortive by every act of cavilling, chicanery, and procrastination, which the French commissioners opposed to the justice and perspicacity of the English claims. They not only misinterpreted treaties, though expressed with the utmost precision, and perplexed the conferences with difficulties and matter foreign to the subject, but they carried the finesse of perfidy so far as to produce false charts and maps of the country, in which the rivers and boundaries were not correctly represented. At this time the insincerity of the French court appeared in affected delays and artful objections, with respect to the evacuation of the neutral islands in the West Indies; and the governors of these islands did not participate in the transmitted intelligence, that the French had begun to make encroachments on the banks of the English colonies.

§ XLV. Perhaps the precarious footing on which the peace stood between Great Britain and France at this juncture, and the critical situation of affairs in Germany, determined the ministry of England to compromise all differences with Spain, upon such terms as at any other time they would hardly have embraced. In order to those points between the two nations, which had not been settled by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, conferences were also begun at Madrid, and carried on by Mr. Keene, plenipotentiary to his Britannic majesty, and Don Joseph de la Carvaly, minister of Spain. At this time a treaty of commerce was concluded on these conditions: The King of Spain engaged to pay, in three months, to the South sea company of England, one hundred thousand pounds sterling, as an indemnification for all claims upon his crown by virtue of the Assiento. In other respects, the trade and navigation of the English to the ports of Spain were regulated by former treaties. It was stipulated, that they should be gratified by what they should be exacted of them in the reign of Charles II. of Spain: That they should be treated on the footing of the most favoured nations; and continue to enjoy the privilege of taking salt at the island of Tortuga. But there was no article restricting the Spanish guards costs from searching the English vessels on the high seas: although, as we have already observed, this insolent prerogative, assumed without right, and exercised without humanity, was, in effect, the original and sole cause of the late rupture, which had been attended with such enormous expense to the nation. It must be observed, however, that his subsequent treaty was at least an period extremely well disposed to live upon good terms with Great Britain. He was resolved to indulge his people with the blessings of peace, to propagate a spirit of industri and courage throughout his dominions, and in particular, to encourage commerce, which he foresaw would prove a much more certain and inexhaustible source of wealth, power, and influence, than all the treasures he could drain from the mines of Mexico and Peru. His resolutions on this important subject were chiefly directed by Don Ricardo

Wall, who now acted as his minister at London: a gentleman of Irish extract, who had distinguished himself in the field as well as in the cabinet, and possessed the joint qualifications of a general and a statesman. He had, by virtue of a passport, come over privately to England before the peace, in order to pave the way for the treaty, by a secret negotiation with the English ministers; but immediately after the peace was proclaimed, he appeared in the character of ambassador. He was possessed of the most insinuating address, shrewd, penetrating, and inquisitive. While he resided in London, he spared no pains in learning the insinuating address, shrewd, penetrating, and inquisitive. While he resided in London, he spared no pains in learning the interest of both parties, and he had perceived, in a measure, that commerce, by which Great Britain had been so remarkably agrardized; and on his return to Spain, where in a little time he was placed at the helm of affairs, he turned the knowledge he had thus acquired to the advantage of his country. He had the whole of Spain subservient to the interest of Great Britain, but demonstrated the Dinsamerican advantage that would accrue from an active trade, which the Spaniards had for many ages neglected; and in a few years their ships were seen to swarm in all the commercial parts of Europe. Of other foreign events which distinguished this summer, the most remarkable was the death of John,

King of Portugal, who perfectly understood, and steadily promulgated, the interest of his country; land and many princes in the vast extent of his dominions, were debased by a cruel spirit of corruption and superstition. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Joseph, who, if he has fallen short of his father in some respects, cannot be justly charged with having inherited this paternal weakness.

§ XLVII. The King of Great Britain, having returned to England, opened the session of parliament in January a speech, importing, that he had concluded a treaty with the King of Spain, and amicably adjusted such differences as could not be so properly compromised with a general treaty: that the true commerce of this nation with that country was re-established upon the most advantageous terms; and that there was the greatest reason to hope the ancient friendship between Great Britain and Spain would, from mutual inclination as well as interest, be now effectually restored. He told them, that in conjunction with the empress queen and the States-general he had concluded a treaty with the Elector of Bavaria; and was employed in taking such further measures as might best tend to strengthen and secure the tranquility of the empire, support its system, and timely anticipate such events as had been found by experience to endanger the common cause, involve Europe in the calamities of war, and occasion the loss of much blood and treasure to these kingdoms. He promised, that both these treaties should be subjected to their prudential; he gave them to understand, that he had received from all the other contracting powers in the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the most full and clear declarations of their resolution to preserve the general peace; and that he had taken care to consolidate the ties of union and friendship between him and his allies, the to secure their mutual interests, maintain the peace already subsisting, and prevent the occasion of any future rupture. Finally, he recommended unanimity, the improvement of the national credit, commerce, and the suppression of such outrages and violences as are inconsistent with good order and government, and endanger the lives and properties of the subject, whose happiness and flourishing condition were the best indication that his Majesty's system had succeede

§ XLVIII. When the motion was made for an address of thanks, couched in terms that savoured of the most implicit complaisance, approbation, and acquiescence in the meaures which the crown had taken, the Earl of Egremont, and some other anti-courtiers, affirmed, that such an address would be equally servile and absurd. They observed, that the approbation of the most influential ministers, and the approbation of measures which they did not know: that nothing could be more ridiculous than their congratulations on the present happy tranquility, when almost every day's newspaper was filled with some British subjects being seized in the Spanish colonies, or some new attack made by the French on our infant colony in Nova Scotia. With respect to the continent of Europe, they affirmed, that the tranquility of Germany would have been upon a much lower foundation, had more England been employed in the affairs of the empire; in that case the princes would of themselves have supported the constitution of their own country; that the election of an infant for the King of the Romans was much more likely to disturb than to establish the tranquility of Europe; because it would to overturn the constitution of the empire, by rendering the imperial dignity hereditary in one house, instead of being the result of a free election. They took notice, that the constitution had provided vicars to govern the empire during the vacancy of the imperial throne; but had made no provision of regents, protectors, or guardians for a more probable and certain event, and had thereby chosen a worse fate. They inveighed against the late treaty with Spain; in which, they said, the ministry, for the paltry sum of one hundred thousand pounds, had given up the claims of the South Sea company, and other countries. They also asserted that the Spanish bringing in the amount of one million three hundred thousand pounds; and bartered away the freedom of our trade and navigation, by leaving untouched that prerogative which the Spaniards have assumed of searching the British ships in the open seas, and confisquing them should they find on board the least particle of what they called contraband merchandise. They produced an instance of an English ship, which had recently been searched by the customs of the Spanish West Indies, where she was searched, seized, and condemned, under this pretence. They reenounced the conduct of the French, who, in the midst of their declarations of peace and moderation, were still employed in fortifying their settlements on the neutral islands, as well as in harassing and encroaching upon our plantations in North America. They exclaimed against the treaty of subsidy with the Elector of Bavaria, or any other peace in time of peace; observing, that for some years the nation had paid such pensions to the Danes and the Saxons; but, in the course of the late war, the former abandoned our interests, and the latter actually took arms against Great Britain; and that the subsidy of the States-General, after the treaty, was so certain, that unless the land tax should be continued at four shilling in the pound, they could not afford a shilling to any prince in Germany, without encroaching upon the sinking fund. "At such a juncture (said a certain member) will any gentleman presume to propose the continuation of such an imposition on the land-holder, for the sake of bringing the princes of Germany to do what?—to preserve the freedom and independency of their native country. I say, princes of Germany, because this subsidy to Bavaria will signify nothing unless we take half a score more of them into our pay; and when we have thus indulged them for some years of peace, they will find it no easy task, as others have done, whenever another war should be declared." Against these objections the motion was supported by William Pitt, at this time an advocate for the ministry. He observed, that the address was no more than the usual compliment to the throne, which did not imply an obligation on the parliament to approve of measures which they might find cause to censure upon further inquiry. He said, the trivial disquietes still subsisting between the two nations was, the checked attempts at suppression of such outrages and violences as are inconsistent with good order and government, and endanger the lives and properties of the subject, whose happiness and flourishing condition were the best indication that his Majesty's system had successfully operated. He was convinced that his Majesty's wisdom in taking off from the French interest such a powerful prince as the Elector of Bavaria, and conereeting other salutary measures for preserving the balance of power on the continent. He defended the articles of the late treaty with Spain; observing, that what remained of its provisions, if the number of its annual contributions to the king of Spain were reduced to such a scale as to prevent a continuance of the war to the South Sea company; that the demands of this company, and other British merchants, were all conciliated by the rupture with Spain, and more than recom pense to the nation by a great balance of captives during the war, as well as by the great traffic carried on with the Spanish settlements in the West Indies, after it had been laid open by the demolition of their fortresses. He asserted, that a great number of important concessions; they had conceded to pay a great sum to the South Sea company; they had consented to the re-establishment of the British trade in Spain, upon a very advantageous and solid footing, by agreeing that the subjects of Great Britain should pay no other duties on merchandise than those exacted of his catholic majesty's own subjects, and to abolish all innovations that had been introduced into the commerce. He affirmed, that the article of No Search was a stipulation which it would have been ridiculous to insist upon; and thought proper to obviate a reproach which he foresaw the opposition would throw upon him, from the circumstance of his having, upon the same subject, proposed a duty to people with grief, and that for an address, That no treaty of peace with Spain should be admitted, unless such a stipulation should be first obtained as a preliminary. He owned he had strenuously contended for such a motion, because at that time, being very great numbers of men all ready to go abroad: but he was now ten years older, had considered matters more coolly, and was convinced that the privilege of No Search, with respect to British vessels sailing near the American shore, would never be obtained, unless Spain should be brought so low as to acquiesce in any terms we, as victors, might propose. He likewise signified his conviction, that all addresses from the House of Commons, long andearnestly attached to the interest of Great Britain. That motion could not but be affected at seeing a prince of such expectations ravished from their hopes; and their grief was the better founded, as the king had already attained to an advanced age, and the heir-apparent, George, now Prince of Wales, was a minor.

§ L. His majesty, foreseeing all the inconveniences which might arise from a minority, deliberated with his council on this subject, and resolved to obtain a parliamentary sanction for the measures judged necessary to secure the succession. With this view he sent a message to both Houses on the twenty-sixth day of April, importing, That nothing could conduce to the safety of the crown but the immediate marriage of his son, in his royal family as proper provisions for the tuition of the person of his successor, and for the regular administration of the government, in case the successor should be of tender years; his majesty, therefore, earnestly recommended this weighty affair to the deliberation of parliament; and proposed, that when the imperial crown of these realms should descend to any of the late prince's sons, being under the age of eighteen years, his mother, the Princess Dowager of Wales, should be guardian of his person, and regent of these kingdoms, until he should attain the age of majority, with such powers and limitations as should appear necessary and expedient for these purposes. This message produced a very affective address, expressing a resolution of taking the affair into their serious consideration; and in the beginning of May the Duke of Newcastle presented to the House of Peers a bill to provide for the administration of government, in case the crown should descend to a minor. The bill was read a second time, and committed, when a second message arrived from his majesty, recommending to their consideration the settlement of such a council of regency as the bill proposed, consisting of the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Lindsey, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Lindsey, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Earl of Exeter. These measures were approved of by the king; and the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Lindsey, the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Exeter, and the Duke of Grafton, were appointed the regency council of the admiral, the two principal secretaries of state, and the lord chief justice of the king's bench; all these great officers, except his royal highness the duke, for the time being. This bill did not pass through the lower House without violent debate and bitter satire. The council of regency, though supported by all the ministry, including the parsimony general, met with fierce opposition, as an unnecessary and fatal restriction, that would impede the machine of government, and, as the council was constituted, might be put on the most pernicious consideration. Some persons among the ministers ventured even to insinuate the danger of leaving at the head of a large standing army a prince of the blood vested with a share of the regency, possessed of great personal influence, the darling of the soldiers, having a popular, and enterprising; supposed not wholly devoid of ambition, and not at all remarkable for any symptoms of extraordinary affection towards the person of the heir-apparent. The history of England was ransacked with invidious instances of royal uncles and regents, who had injured the sovereigns, and distressed the government, by their pride, cruelty, and ambition. The characters of John Lackland, and John of Gaunt, Humphrey and Richard Dukes of Gloucester, were called in review, compared, and quoted, with some odious applications: but the majority, being convinced of the loyalty, virtue, integrity, and great abilities of his royal highness, to whom the trust over the control of the nation passed the bill with a few amendments, in which the Lords acquiesced; and in a little time it received the royal sanction. § 5. The death of the Prince of Wales was fatal to a bill which had been brought into the House of Commons, for naturalizing all foreign protestants who should settle within the dominions of Great Britain. Political antime-tications have generally taken it for granted, that to every commercial advantage there is an increase of population is an increase of opulence; and this maxim is certainly true, on the supposition that every individual is industrious, and that there is a sufficient field for employment; but all these general maxims could not be received under certain qualifications. When all branches of manufacture are overstocked, an addition of workmen will doubtless be an additional encumbrance on the community. In the debates which this bill produced, the members of the ministry were divided among themselves. The measure was enforced by the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. W. Pitt, and Mr. Lyttelton; and in opposing it the Earl of Egmont was joined by Mr. Fox, secretary at war. Petitions and counter-petitions were presented by the merchants of London, Bristol, and other trading towns of the kingdom. All merchants and traders of foreign extraction exerted themselves vigorously in its behalf, and it was without doubt countenanced by the spirit of the times about the project which was general. The lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of London, in common council assembled, composed a remonstrance to the lower House, setting forth the danger and dangers which would be attended on naturalization foreign protestants. A petition of the merchants and principal inhabitants of Bristol represented that such a law would be prejudicial to the trade and commerce of this kingdom, by preventing many industrious artificers from procuring a sufficient support for themselves and their families, and on consequence increasing the rates of the poor: that the introduction of such a number of foreigners, instead of being a support to the present happy establishment, might danger the very basis of our constitution; that it would greatly tend to the diminution of our manufactures, as many strangers would doubtless come and reside in England for a time, in order to learn the methods and management of our manufacturers and artificers; and, after having obtained this instruction, return to their native countries, where they would establish and carry on works of the same nature. The twentieth day of March being appointed for the third reading of the bill, it was postponed, in consequence of the unfortunate death of the Prince of Wales; and other petitions from different cities of the kingdom being mustered against it in the sequel, the ministry did not think it proper in any serious measure to adopt such a delicate conjunction; so the bill was no more brought upon the carpet. Divers other regulations relating to civil policy as well as to the commerce of Great Britain, were proposed in the House of Commons; but these proposals proved abortive, either because they appeared rude and indigested in themselves, or the House could not at that proper time touch the allegations they contained.

§ 6. There were no other transactions in this session, except the concurrence of both House in stigmatizing a printed paper, entitled, "Constitutional Queries, earnestly recommended to the public consideration of every Briton;" and the steps taken by the Commons, in consequence of the commotions occasioned by the Westminster election. The above-mentioned paper, which had been conveyed by letter to the majority of both Houses, was communicated to the Lords in the month of January by the Duke of Marlborough, who moved for resolutions against it as a seditious libel, and that the concurrence of the Commons might be desired. A conference accordingly ensued, and both Houses concurred in voting the paper a false, malicious, scandalous, infamous, and seditious libel, containing the most false, judicious, and abominable calumnies and indignities upon his majesty, and the most pretensions and wicked insinuations that our laws, liberties, and properties, and the excellent constitution of this kingdom, were in danger under his majesty's legal, mild, and gracious government, with intent to instil grounds of suspicions and jealousy into the minds of his majesty's good subjects, and to alienate their affections from his majesty and the royal family. It was therefore resolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons of the House of Commons assembled; that the detestation of such abominable and seditious practices, the paper should be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the new palace yard of Westminster; and this sentence was executed accordingly. Then they presented an address to his majesty, desiring that such additional means might be taken for discovering the author, printer, or publisher, that he or they might be brought to con-ordinary punishment. Directions were given for this purpose; but without the least success. The bill for printing the writing, after circulating the paper, had acted with such caution, that not one of them was ever discovered.

§ 7. The proceedings of the Commons with respect to the election of a burgess for Westminster were attended with some extraordinary circumstances, which we shall now record for the edification of those who pique themselves on the privileges of a British subject. We have already observed that a majority appearing on the part of Lord Trencham, the adherents of the other candidate, Sir George Vandecut, demanded a scrutiny, which was granted by the high-bailiff of Westminster, the returning officer. During this tedious investigation, which rolled chiefly on the quality rather than on the quantity of the votes cast; and seeming candour as gave entire satisfaction to both parties, till at length he determined in favour of Lord Trencham, whom he returned as duly elected. Those who styled this a triumph to the high-bailiff, and to the House; but in this determination without clamour, reproach, means, and riot. They taxed Mr. Leigh, the high-bailiff, with partiality and injustice: they loudly affirmed, that ministerial influence had been used in the most scandalous maner: and, finally, joined Sir George Vandecut in a petition to the lower House, complaining of an undue election and return of a member for the city of Westminster.

The Commons instead of inquiring into those matters of these petitions, ordered them to be upon the table; and, without any complaint from any person whatever, a motion was made that Leigh, the high-bailiff, should attend the House immediately, in order to make them acquainted with what he had done in pursuance of the directions he had formerly received from that House, touching the execution of the writ for electing a new member to represent the city of Westminster. As this motion had been preconcerted, Leigh was indignant, and instantly rose up, and left the House to be examined on this subject. Having, in the course of his examination, alleged that the election had been protracted by affected delays, he was asked by whom, and by what means that delay had been occasioned. He answered, the Earl of Egmont, interposing, objected to the reception of the election as improper, and moved for the order of the day. A debate immediately ensued, in which the propriety of the question was demonstrated by Mr. Helden, now lord keeper, Dr. Lee, and some others, the most sensible and moderate members of the House; but they were opposed with great violence by Lord Vescove Covke, Henry Fox, Esq. Sir William Young, Colonel Lyttelton, and the weight of the House. Mr. Murray, by making an erroneous statement of fact, was carried in the negative, and the high-bailiff required to answer the question. Thus interrogated, he declared that he had been impeached in the scrutiny, and maltreated, by Mr. Murray; that he had been released, upon reasoning with the Serjeant-at-Arms, by the Honourable Alexander Murray, brother to Lord Elbiance, and one Gibson, an usherholder, who had been very active, zealous, and turbulent in his endeavors to promote the interest of Sir George Vandekap, or rather of his wife; accusation was preferred against him, who was supposed to be countenanced by the ministry. These three persons, thus accused, were brought to the bar of the House, notwithstanding the strenuous remonstrances of several members, who opposed this method of proceeding as a species of oppression equally arbitrary and absurd. They observed, that, as no complaint had been preferred, they had no right to take cognizance of the affair; that if any undue influence had been used, it would naturally appear when the merits of the election should fall under their inquiry; that a complaint having been lodged already against the returning officer, it was their duty to investigate his conduct, and punish him, if he should be found guilty of any delinquency; that if there could be more flagrantly unjust, and apparently partial, than their neglecting the petitions of the other candidate and electors, and encouraging the high-bailiff, who stood charged with incompetence of opinion, and having been apprised of the situation of the inquiry, to have been allowed to be disabled from giving evidence on the inquiry into the merits of the election. What difference is it to the subject, whether he is oppressed by an arbitrary prince, or by the despotic insolence of a ministerial majority? Mr. Crowle alleged, in his own vindication, that he had been employed as counsel by the electors of Westminster, and attended the scrutiny in that character; that after the high-bailiff had, in the course of the last session, received the order of the House, he had proceeded to the scrutiny with such precipitation as he apprehended, was unjust, and prejudicial to his clients; that, in this apprehension, he (Mr. Crowle) insisted upon the high-bailiff’s proceeding with more deliberation, and in so doing he thought he did his duty to his employers. Some evidence being examined against him, declared he had not only protracted the scrutiny, but also spoke disrespectful words to the Speaker, and threatened to ill-treat him by his counsel; but, in the meantime, they ordered him to be taken into custody by the serjeant-at-arms attending the House. This step, however, was not taken without a warm opposition by some of the most sedate and intelligent members of the House, who considered it as a cruel act of oppression. They observed, that in cases of breach of privilege no person complained of was ever taken into custody, until after he had been fully heard in his defence: that this was literally performing the cases before it had been examined; and the oppression was the greater, as the alleged offence consisted entirely of words, of which no complaint or information had been made for above eight months after the supposed offence had been committed; and, even then, not till an accusation had been lodged against the informer, upon the trial of which accusation the persons informed against might very probably be the most material witnesses. They observed, that in one of the highest offences which can be committed by words, namely that of denying the king’s right to the crown, or renouncing the Trinity, the information must be brought in within six months from the time the words are manifested towards any subject: that the words must be proved to have been spoken maliciously, directly, and advisedly, and the prosecution must commence in three months after the information. These suggestions made no more impression than if they had been uttered in a desert. Those who were secure in their number asserted that the House of Commons was not restricted by the forms of proceedings at common law; and that it was necessary to vindicate their own honour and dignity, of whose protection they had been solemnly charged, without the slightest contempt. Mr. Murray was committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, and found bail; and Gibson was sent prisoner to Newgate, from whence he was in a few days released, upon promising a humble petition, professing sorrow for having incurred the displeasure of the House, to the bar of which he was brought, and received a reprimand on his knees from the speaker. In the meantime divers witnesses were recommended before the House, declared that Mr. Murray had been committed, not for the return of a member for Westminster, heading and exciting a tumult in acts of violence against the high-bailiff. The majority, therefore, after a long and warm debate, agreed, that for his dangerous and seditions practices, in violation and contempt of the privileges of the House, and of the freedom of elections, he should be committed close prisoner to Newgate. Then, in the close of another violent debate, they resolved, that he should be brought to the bar of the House, to receive that sentence on his knees. He accordingly appeared, and being directed by the speaker to kneel, refused to comply. He knew that he could not be discharged from Newgate during the session, he therefore appeared without a hat, and asked permission of the House for the continuance of his practices, which he declared were not the practice of an innocent man, but such as he thought would imply a consciousness of guilt; he considered this whole transaction as an oppressive exertion of arbitrary power, and being informed of the sentence of the House, he declared he would bear the brunt of their indignation, rather than make submission which he deemed beneath the dignity of his character. When he refused to humble himself, the whole House was in confusion; he was no sooner removed from the bar than they resolved, that his having in a most insolent and audacious manner refused to be on his knees at the bar of that House, in consequence of their former resolution, was a high and most dangerous contempt of the authority and the dignity of the House; and therefore ordered, that he should be committed close prisoner to Newgate, debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper; and that no person should have access to him without the leave of the House. Finally, a committee was appointed to consider what methods might be proper to be taken by them, in relation to this instance of contempt. Meanwhile the petitioners against the return made by the high-bailiff perceived the temper of the House, and the complexion of the majority, were convinced of their policy, and the order which had passed for hearing the merits of the election was discharged. Mr. Murray being taken dangerously ill in Newgate, application was made to the House, and his cases were moved to a more convenient situation; and his physician, being examined, gave it as his opinion that he was infected with the gout distemper. Upon this representation the House agreed that the speaker should issue a warrant for removing him from Newgate to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, but this favour he refused to accept, and expressed the warmest resentment against those relations who had applied to the Commons in his behalf. Thus he remained sequestered even from his own brother and sister, under the displeasure of the Commons of England, who condescended so far as to make resolutions touching the physician, apothecary, and nurse who attended this prisoner. But the petitioning of parliament having put an end to their authority for that session, Mr. Murray was discharged of course, and conducted by the sheriffs from Newgate to his own house, in procession, with flags and streamers exhibiting the emblems of liberty.

The interior economy of the nation, and the annual accounts of the government, were submitted to the House. Mr. Murray was again committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, and found bail; and one Gibson was sent prisoner to Newgate, from whence he was in a few days released, upon promising a humble petition, professing sorrow for having incurred the displeasure of the House, to the bar of which he was brought, and received a reprimand on his knees from the speaker. While the debate went on, divers witnesses were recommended before the House, and declared that Mr. Murray had been committed, not for the return of a member for Westminster, but for his dangerous and seditions practices, in violation and contempt of the privileges of the House, and of the freedom of elections, he should be committed close prisoner to Newgate. Then, in the close of another violent debate, they resolved, that he should be brought to the bar of the House, to receive that sentence on his knees. He accordingly appeared, and being directed by the speaker to kneel, refused to comply. He knew that he could not be discharged from Newgate during the session, he therefore appeared without a hat, and asked permission of the House for the continuance of his practices, which he declared were not the practice of an innocent man, but such as he thought would imply a consciousness of guilt; he considered this whole transaction as an oppressive exertion of arbitrary power, and being informed of the sentence of the House, he declared he would bear the brunt of their indignation, rather than make submission which he deemed beneath the dignity of his character. When he refused to humble himself, the whole House was in confusion; he was no sooner removed from the bar than they resolved, that his having in a most insolent and audacious manner refused to be on his knees at the bar of that House, in consequence of their former resolution, was a high and most dangerous contempt of the authority and the dignity of the House; and therefore ordered, that he should be committed close prisoner to Newgate, debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper; and that no person should have access to him without the leave of the House. Finally, a committee was appointed to consider what methods might be proper to be taken by them, in relation to this instance of contempt. Meanwhile the petitioners against the return made by the high-bailiff perceived the temper of the House, and the complexion of the majority, were convinced of their policy, and the order which had passed for hearing the merits of the election was discharged. Mr. Murray being taken dangerously ill in Newgate, application was made to the House, and his cases were moved to a more convenient situation; and his physician, being examined, gave it as his opinion that he was infected with the gout distemper. Upon this representation the House agreed that the speaker should issue a warrant for removing him from Newgate to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, but this favour he refused to accept, and expressed the warmest resentment against those relations who had applied to the Commons in his behalf. Thus he remained sequestered even from his own brother and sister, under the displeasure of the Commons of England, who condescended so far as to make resolutions touching the physician, apothecary, and nurse who attended this prisoner. But the petitioning of parliament having put an end to their authority for that session, Mr. Murray was discharged of course, and conducted by the sheriffs from Newgate to his own house, in procession, with flags and streamers exhibiting the emblems of liberty.
Great Britain produced within the circle of this year nothing else worthy of historical record, except a series of enormous crimes, arising from the profusion of individuals, which reflected disgrace upon the nation, and the policy of the government. Rapine and robbery had demonstrated without intermission ever since the return of peace, which was attended with a reduction of the army and navy; but now crimes of a deeper dye seemed to lift up their heads in connivance with human law. The day almost produced fresh instances of perjury, forgery, fraud, and circumvention; and the kingdom exhibited a most amazing jumble of virtue and vice, honour and infamy, compassion and obduracy, sentiment and brutality.

CHAP. II.

§ 1. The royal family of England had sustained three severe shocks in the compass of a few months. Besides the loss of the Prince of Wales, which the nation lamented as irreparable, his majesty was deeply afflicted by the untimely death of his youngest daughter, the Queen of Denmark, who died at Copenhagen, on the nineteenth day of December, in the prime of youth. She was one of the most amiable princesses of the age in which she lived, whether we consider the virtues of her heart, or the accomplishments of her person; generous, mild, and tender hearted; beloved even to adoration by her royal consort, to whom she had borne a prince and a princess, and whom she often adored and revered by the subjects of his Danish majesty. Her death had been preceded about two months by that of her brother-in-law, the Prince of Orange, no less regretted by the natives of the United Provinces, for his candour, integrity, and hereditary love to his country. Though he had not distinguished himself by the lustre of a superior genius, he had been at great pains to cultivate his understanding, and study the true interest of that community of which he was a member. He had always approved himself a good and zealous citizen, and since his elevation to the stadtholdership, taken many salutary steps for the advantage of his country. Among other excellent schemes which he suggested, he left a noble plan with the States-General for restoring the liberties of the land, and lived long enough to receive their warmest acknowledgment for this last proof of his prudence and patriotism. His son and daughter have both infants, the administration of the government devolved upon the princess, as governess during her son's minority; and as such she succeeded to all the power which her husband had enjoyed.

§ 11. With respect to the affairs of the continent, the peace of the north seemed still as precarious as ever; for though the difference between Russia and Sweden had been compromised, the mutual distrust between the czarina and the emperor was yet deep. He was no longer willing to receive the annual subsidies, or all the reciprocal gifts, mails, offices, and confidential declarations, that those two powers seemed to be on the eve of a rupture, and each was employed in making extraordinary preparations for war. The courts of Vienna and Great Britain, foreseeing that such a rupture would embroil the empire, and raise insurmountable obstacles to their favourite scheme of electing the Archduke Joseph King of the Romans, resolved to employ all their endeavours to effect a reconciliation between the courts of Petersburg and Berlin. His Prussian majesty had signified to the King of Great Britain, and the States-General, the situation in which he stood with the czarina, and sollicited their interposition, that the difference might be amicably accommodated. At the same time he sent an envoy extraordinary to Versailles, to negotiate with the French king for a very considerable body of auxiliaries, in case he should be attacked. These circumstances induced the maritime powers, and the court of Vienna, to use their utmost endeavours for the prevention of a rupture; and accordingly they made remonstrances on this subject by their ministers at Petersburg and Berlin, that the quarrel should be terminated without bloodshed, and all causes of anxiety be buried in oblivion.

§ 111. In the meantime, they eagerly prosecuted the design of the election; and the imperial minister at Berlin not only endeavoured to be connected with the proceedings of the states of the empire, but he sent his private agents to the capital of England on this expedition, but even solicited his vote for the Archduke Joseph, when the election of a King of the Romans should be proposed in the electoral college. To this proposal he replied, That he was extremely well disposed to manifest his regard for their imperial majesties, and to give the most genuine proofs of it, even in the proposed election of a King of the Romans, considering the great merit of the present candidate; but he held it to the consideration of their imperial majesties, whether the election would not be a little premature, if transacted at a time when his imperial majesty was in the flower of his age; enjoying perfect health; and when all Europe, particularly the empire, was hushed in the bosom of tranquillity, so that no circumstance seemed to prognosticate the necessity of such an election; or of putting in execution the motives mentioned in the capitulations of the regning emperor's election; especially as the examination of these motives belonged to the whole empire, and ought to precede the election, by virtue of the eighth article of the treaty of Westphalia. He observed, that, in case of the emperor's death, Germany would suffer, and that there was a very dangerous scheme in the hands of the government of a minor. For these reasons, he said, he could not help advising their imperial majesties to wait until the archduke should be of age, when his election might be carried on more securely on the laws and constitutions of the empire, and more suitable to the majesty of the whole Germanic body. Thus reply he circulated among the electors, and in particular transmitted it to the King of Great Britain, desiring they would deliberate maturely on this subject, and confer together in a body, as well as in private, that they might proceed according to the ancient custom of the electoral college, and take such measures as should be judged expedient for the honour and advantage of the community; and for securing the safety of the sovereign, the electors, and the people, he was sworn by the King of England and the Elector of Bavaria, who demurred, that it was the privilege of the electoral college only, without any participation of the other princes of the empire, to elect a King of the Romans during the life of the emperor, in order to maintain the peace and preserve the liberties of Germany; and that the neglect of this wise precaution had produced bloody wars, and many fateful consequences to the empire. They observed, that could nothing more contribute to the establishment of the public tranquillity than this measure, so ardently desired by the Archduke Joseph wanted a few years of being of age, it might possibly happen that the reigning emperor should die during that prince’s minority, yet it would be much less prejudicial to the empire to lose an elector than to see the succession altogether unsettled. His Prussian majesty received a declaration to the same purpose from the Elector of Meissen; and understanding that the latter and Hamburg had already conspired to convocate an elector’s diet, in order to propose the election of a King of the Romans, he wrote an elaborate letter to his electoral highness, explaining at more length his reasons for postponing the election. He quoted that sentence of the treaty of Westphalia which expressly declares, that the election of a King of the Romans shall be discussed and ordained by the common consent of the states of the empire; and, therefore, he could not conceive what right the electoral college had to arrogate this privilege to themselves, excluding the other state of the empire. He observed, that the imperial capitulations, which were the only laws of the empire that treated of this subject, mentioned only six electors, and it was by no means certain, that such an election; namely, the emperor’s leaving, and long absence from Germany; his advanced age, or an indisposition, rendering him incapable of managing the reins of government; and any case of emergency in which the government was on the point of falling into another hand, to the great prejudice of the empire, were the motives on which this election was either to be organised, or its duration limited. It was therefore impossible for anyone to determine who such an emperor might succeed, that was to be elected in our days.

§ IV. Another disappointment, with respect to this election, the promoters of it sustained in the death of his Swedish majesty, who expired in a good old age, and was succeeded by Adolphus Frederick, Duke of Holstein-Eutin, Bishop of Lubeck, upon whom the succession had been settled for some years, by the unanimous concurrence of the states of the kingdom. This prince ascended the throne of Sweden with the greatest delight of his heart, that he would never attempt to introduce a despotic authority; but maintain his liberties with his blood, and govern his subjects in all respects according to the laws and the form of government established in Sweden. This public act, which was communicado to all the foreign ministers, and particularly to the envoy from Petersburgh, met with such a favourable reception from the czarina, that she expressed her satisfaction in a public declaration; and the good understanding between the two courts was perfectly restored.

§ V. When the parliament of England was opened, in the month of November, the king, in the ascension day of his throne, gave them to understand, that for the same purposes which suggested the treaty with the Elector of Bavaria, he had now, in conjunction with the States-General, concluded another with the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony. He told them, that the unfortunate death of the Prince of Orange had made no alteration in the state of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the strongest assurances from the States, of their firm resoliation to maintain the utmost union and friendship hapily subsisting between his majesty and those ancient and natural allies of his crown. He exhorted both Houses to consider seriously of some effectual provisins, to suppress those audacious crimes of robbery and violence, which were too frequent about the capital, proceeding in a great measure from that profane spirit of irreligion, idleness, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itself in an uncommon degree, to the disdoun of the nation, and the great offence and prejudice of the sober and industrious part of the people. The paragraphs of this speech were, as usual, echoed back to the throne in addresses, replete with expressions of loyalty, affection, and approbation.
Opposition was soon joftemned that the proclamation of the proceedings of both Houses took place with such unanimity as was hardly ever known before this period in a British parliament. The Commons, however, seem to have assembled the most senti mental part of the house in honour to their temper and magnanimity. In a few days after the session opened, Lord Viscount C — e, a young nobleman, whose character entitled him to very nings, in that country. After a warm debate, however, it was adopted by a great majority, and obtained the royal assent.

§ XX. A third law related to certain articles of the national debt, which was now converted into several joint stocks of annuities, transferable at the bank of England, to be charged on the sinking fund. A great number of different funds for annuities, established at different times, and of different acts already issued for that purpose, so that it was necessary to keep many different accounts, which could not be regulated without considerable trouble and expense, for the removal of which the bill was calculated.

§ XII. In consequence of petitions from the woollen manufacturers of Westmoreland and Yorkshire, two bills were brought in, and passed through both Houses, by which the ports of Lancaster and Great Yarmouth were opened for the importation of wool and woollen yarn from Ireland; but why this privilege was not extended to all the frequent ports of the kingdom it is not easy to conceive, without supposing a little national jealousy on one hand, and a great deal of greedy restraint on the other. Over and above these new laws, some unsuccessful endeavours were used in behalf of commerce and police.

A bill was offered for laying further restrictions on pawnbrokers and brokers, that they might no longer suck the blood of the poor. This scheme, which was canvassed, debated, and made its way through the lower House; but the Lords rejected it as a crude scheme, which they could not amend, because it was a mere bill, not cognizable by their House, by engaging in a dispute with the Commons. Another bill was prepared, for giving power to change the punishment of felons, in certain cases, to confinement and hard labour in dock-yards or garrisons. It was the opinion of many who wished well to their country, and were properly qualified to prosecute such inquiries, that the practice of consignifying such a number of writs to the hands of the executioner served only, by its frequency, to defeat the purpose intended by it, and subjected the public to the abuse of the power by the public of such subjects, who might, notwithstanding their delinquency, be in some measure rendered useful to society. Such was the motive that influenced the promoters of this bill; by which it was proposed, in imitation of that economy practised in other countries, to confine felons convicted under certain circumstances to hard labour upon the public works of the kingdom. The scheme was accepted by the lower House, but rejected by the Lords, who seemed apprehensive of its bringing such discredit upon his majesty's dock-yards, as would discourage persons who valued their reputation from engaging in such employment. Of all other nations the next measure proposed, in a bill for making Great Britain and Ireland more useful, presented by Mr. Thornton, a gentleman of Yorkshire, who had distinguished himself by his loyalty and patriotism. It was canvassed in a committee of the whole House, and underwent divers amendments: but miscarried, through the averment of the ministry to any project tending to remove or lessen the necessity of maintaining a standing army. A considerable number of petitions for different regulations, in respect to commerce and convenience of traffic, were presented, considered, and left upon the table. A remonstrance from the prisoners confined in the goal of the king's bench, complaining of the situation arising from want of room and other conveniences, being taken into consideration by a committee, among other evidences, they examined that remarkable personage who had signalized himself in defence of Christendom, under the name of Theodore, King of Corsica. Though formerly countenanced and even treated as a sovereign prince by the British ministry, he was now reduced to the forlorn condition of a confined debtor; and, to the reproach of this kingdom, did not appear at his trial and disarmed himself and overwhelmed with the infirmities of old age. But the most remarkable circumstance of the parliamentary transactions distinguished this session, was a motion made in both Houses for an address to the king, beseeching his majesty, that in time of public tranquillity he would be graciously pleased to avoid entering into subsidiary treaties with foreign princes, which are so burdensome to this nation. This extraordinary proposal was made and strenuously urged by the Duke of B., and a vehement debate ensued, in which the Earls of G., S., and H., opposed it with an exertion of superior abilities, and the question being put, was carried in the negative without a division. The session ended in the latter end of March, when his majesty, having granted the new public bills, and private bills, harangued both Houses, and prorogued the parliament.

§ XII. Immediately after the prorogation the king appointed a regency, and set out for Hanover, in order to complete the grand scheme he had projected for electing a King of the Romans. * * * Great Britain, in the meantime, produced no event of importance, or any transaction that deserved historical mention, except the ratification of two treaties of peace and commerce with the states of Trinidad and Tunis on the coast of Barbary, concluded by the British consuls in those cities, under the influence and auspices of an English squadron, commanded by Commodore Besfel, son to the Earl of Albermarle. The tide of luxury still flowed with an impetuous current, bearing down all the mounds of temperance and decorum; while fraud and profusion struck out new channels, through which they eluded the narrow stream of righteousness, under the vigilance of civil policy. New arts of deception were invented, in order to insure and ruin the unwary; and some infamous practices in the way of commerce were condoned by persons of rank and importance in the commonwealth. A certain member of parliament was obliged to withdraw himself from his country, in consequence of a discovery, by which it appeared that he had contrived and executed schemes for destroying his own ships at sea, with the assistance of the papers and secrets of the French government. The northern powers enjoyed a perfect tranquillity: the States-General of the United Provinces were engaged by plans of national economy. Spain was intent upon extending her commerce, bringing her manufactures to perfection, and preparing the defence of the British dominions; and the king's majesty endeavoured, by certain peremptory precepts, to check the exportation of gold coin from his dominions; and insisted upon inspecting the books of the British merchants settled at Lisbon: but they refused to comply with this demand, which was contrary to a treaty subsisting between the two crowns; and he thought proper to sequence in their refusal. He was much better employed, in obtaining from the Pope an abolution of the annual procession called the Anto da Pa, one of the most horrid triumphs of the Christian church.
should be referred to the decision of the Aulic council, in regard to his claim to the estates of East Friesland: but the king being already in possession, refused to submit his right to the decision of that council, and when the diet presumed to deliberate on this affair, his envoy entered a strong protest against their proceedings. At the same time he presented the other ministers with a memorial, tending to refute the Elector of Hanover's assertion of his title to that domain: the protestation was

§ XV. At this juncture his Prussian majesty made no scruple of expressing his resentment against the court of London, which he considered as an offensive calumny, the direct motives of which were intermediate in the practice of Germany. His resident at London complained to the British ministry, that divers ships, sailing under the Prussian flag, had been stopped at sea, and even seized by English cruisers: and that his subjects had been ill treated and oppressed; he therefore demanded reparation in a peremptory tone; and in the meantime, discontinued the payment of the Silesian loan, which he had charged himself with, by an article in the treaty of Breslau. This was a sum of money amounting to two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which the Emperor Charles VI. father of the reigning empress, had borrowed of the subjects of Great Britain, on condition of paying an interest of six per cent. and mortgaging the silver mine of Reichenberg, in the repayment. It was, however, devoted to the King of Prussia with this encumbrance, and he continued to pay the interest punctually till this juncture, when the payment was stopped; and he published an edict, "an Exequies of the Monarch, which influenced his Conduct on this Occasion." In his memorial to the ministry of Great Britain he alleged, that eighteen Prussian ships, and thirty-three neutral vessels, in which the subjects of Prussia were concerned, had been unjustly seized by English privates: his account of damages amounted to a very considerable sum; and he demanded, in the most dogmatic terms, that the affair should be finally discussed in the course of three months from the date of his remonstrance. The exposition and memorial were subjected to the examination of the ablest civilians in England, who related every article of the charge with equal precision and perspicuity. They proved, that captures by sea fell property under the cognizance of those powers under whose jurisdiction the seizures were made; and, therefore, his Prussian majesty could not, consistent with the laws of nations, determine these disputes in his own tribunals. They demonstrated, by undoubted evidence, the falsity of many facts alleged in the memorial, as well as the fairness of the proceedings by which some few of the Prussian vessels had been condemned; and maintained, with no insult or ill word, the rights of the subjects of Prussia. Finally, they observed, that the Silesian loan was a private transaction of such a nature, that, even if a war had happened between the Emperor Charles VI. and his Britannic majesty, this must have been held sacred and inviolable: that when the empress queen ceded Silesia to the King of Prussia, this monarch charged himself with the repayment of the loan, which, being a private debt and insuperable, was now diffused into different countries, and became the property of many others besides the subjects of Great Britain. They wound up their chain of reasoning by observing, that, according to agreement with the emperor, the whole of this loan should have been paid in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-five: whereas the complaints specified in the Prussian memorial were founded on facts posterior to that period. Whether his Prussian majesty was convinced by these reasons, derived from Archimedes' principle, or those proper to give up his claim upon other political considerations; certain it is, he no longer insisted upon satisfaction, but ordered the payments of the Silesian loan to be continued without further interruption: a report, indeed, was exchanged between the two courts, in which the demands of each nation were made by a certain prince, who employed his agents to buy up great part of the loan at a considerable discount.

§ XVI. How much severer the King of Prussia may be that, with regard to his own subjects, he acted as a wise legislator, and the father of his country. He peopled the deserts of Pomerania; by encouraging with royal bounties, a great number of industrious emigrants to settle in that province; the face of which, in a very few years, underwent the most agreeable alterations. Above sixty new villages were founded in the dominions of that country, exhibited marks of successful cultivation. Those solitary and desolate plains, where so human footsteps had for many ages been seen, were now converted into fields of corn. These farms were regularly parcelled out: the houses supplied, and teemed with population. The peasants, sheltered in a peculiar manner under their king's protection, sowed their ground in peace and reaped their harvest in security. The same care and indulgence were extended to the inhabitants of the Prussian dominions, and extraordinary encouragement was granted to all French protesters who should come and settle under the government of this political sage.

§ XVII. The courts of Vienna and Hanover still employed their chief attention upon the scheme of electing a King of the Romans: and the Elector of Meutz, influenced by the majority of the college, had convoked an electoral diet for that purpose: but strong protests against this convocation were entered by the Electors of Colom and Paltine, inasmuch that it was thought expedient to conclude this last, by taking some steps in his favour, with respect to the satisfaction he demanded from the empress queen and his Hanoverian subjects. Hanover, and his demand for Vienna amounted to three millions of florins, by way of indemnification for the losses he had sustained during the war. He demanded of the King of England twenty thousand pounds in compensation for the damage sustained by the British troops while they acted on the Maine; and the like sums for the like purposes from the States-general of the United Provinces. The empress queen could not help representing against this demand as exorbitant in itself, and the more unreasonable, as the Elector Palatine, at the death of her father, had openly declared against the pragmatic sanction, which he had guaranteed in the most solemn manner; so, therefore, observed, that the claims he had sustained, in consequence of that declaration, ought to be considered as the common fate of war. These reasons, though conclusive and irrefragable in the usual way of arguing, made no impression upon the Palatine, who perfectly well understood his own importance, and was determined to seize this opportunity of turning it to the best advantage. The court of Vienna, and the maritime powers, finding him thus obstinately attached to his own interest, resolved to bring him over to their views at any rate, and commenced a negotiation with him, which produced a formal treaty. By this convention his demands in money were fixed at twelve hundred thousand Dutch florins, and one hundred thousand marks, under penalty of his armed forces being landed upon the Dutch soil by the empress queen, and the remaining seven hundred thousand by the King of Great Britain and the States-general, according to the proportion established in former treaties. The privilege of non appellea, for the study of Deux points, was confirmed to his electoral highness, together with some other rights and pretensions, in consideration of his concurring with his other electors in the choice of a King of the Romans, to be elected according to the customs prescribed by the laws and constitutions of the empire. He likewise engaged to join them in settling the articles of the capitulation with the King of the Romans, emperor in futuro. Yet, even after the concurrence of this prince had been secured, the purpose of the King of Prussia was far from the strong objections that were started, and the strenuous opposition which was made, by his Prussian majesty, who perhaps aspired in secret at the imperial dignity, whereby he, the empress queen took all this pains to perpetuate in her own family.

§ XVIII. The King of Great Britain, returning from the continent, opened the session of parliament on the eleventh day of January with a speech, wherein the demand of concessions had been conducted and directed to preserve and secure the duration of the general peace, so agreeable and necessary to the welfare of all Europe: that he had the satisfactions to be assured he was secure in all his right, and that were his allies, to adhere to the same salutary object. He exhorted them to continue their attention to the reduction of the national debt, the augmentation of the sinking fund, and the improvement of the public revenue. He recommended to their serious consideration what further laws and regulations might be necessary for suppressing those crimes and disorders of which the public had been so severely complained; and concluded with an assurance, that his hearty concurrence and endeavours should never be wanting in any measure that might promote their welfare and prosperity. The laws in this respect were now so much improved that the absurdity transmitted by such measures as were hitherto couched in the usual form of implicit approbation: but that of the Commons did not pass without question. The Earl of E— took exceptions to one paragraph, in which they acknowledged his majesty's wisdom, as well as the necessity of pursuing such measures as should contribute to maintain and render permanent the general tranquillity of Europe; and declared their satisfaction at the assurance his majesty had received from his allies, that they were all attached to the same salutary object. His lordship expatiated on the absurdity of these compliments at such a juncture, when the peace of Europe was so precarious, and the English nation so much of complaint and dissatisfaction. He was seconded by some other individuals, who declared with great vivacity against continental connections; and endeavoured to expose the weakness and folly of the whole system of foreign measures which our ministry had lately pursued. It must be supposed, they said, that the English nation had been given an opportunity to compliment their sovereign on the permanency of the peace than at this juncture, when they must have seen themselves on the very brink of a new rupture with Europe; where, like hungry men, they had been told it was necessary to receive victual. In this manner, these addresses to the throne had been long considered as compliments of course, implying no more than a respectful attachment to their sovereign: accordingly, both Houses agreed to their respective addresses without division. The two grand committees of supply and of ways and means being established, the business of the House was transacted without much alteration; and the people had great reason to be satisfied with their moderate proceedings. Ten thousand men, and the usual number of land forces, were retained for the service of the ensuing year. They provided for the maintenance of the new colony in Nova Scotia, the civil establishment of Georgia, the support of the castles on the coast of Guinea, and the erection of a new fort at Anamaboo, where the French had attempted to make a settlement; and they enabled his majesty to fulfill his engagements with the King of Poland and the Elector of Ivary.

§ XVI. The House, on the supplies, including grants for former deficiencies and services, for which no provision had been made in the course of the last year, did not exceed two millions one hundred thirty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty pounds, twenty shillings, and one penny; in order to defray which expense they assigned the duty on malt, &c. the land tax at two shillings in the pound, the surplus of certain funds in the exchequer, and the sum of four hundred and twenty thousand pounds to the sinking fund; so that the excesses amounted to near three hundred thousand pounds. As for the national debt, it now stood at the enormous sum of seventy-four millions three hundred sixty-eight thousand four hundred and fifty-one pounds, fifteen shillings, and one penny; and the sinking fund produced one million seven hundred thirty-five thousand five hundred and twenty-nine pounds, six shillings, and ten pence farthing.

§ XVI. The next step taken by the Commons was an affair of much greater consequence to the community, being a bill for obliging ships more effectually to perform quarantine, in order to prevent the plague from being imported from foreign countries into Great Britain. For this purpose, it was ordained, that if any dreadful visitation should appear in any ship to the northward of Cape Finisterre, the master and commander should report the same to the lord protector of New Grunsvy, in one of the islands of Scilly, and there communicate the discovery to some officer of the customs; who should with the first opportunity transmit his intelligence to another custom-house officer in the nearest port of England, to be by him forwarded to one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state. In the meantime the ship should remain at the said island, and not an individual presume to go ashore, until his majesty's pleasure should be declared. It was also provided, that in case the master of a ship thus infected should not be able to make the islands of Scilly, or be forced up either channel by violent winds, she should not enter any frequented harbour; but remain in some open road, until he could receive orders from his majesty, or the privy council: that, during this interval, he should avoid all intercourse with the shore, or any person or vessel whatsoever, on pain of being deemed guilty of felony, and suffering death without benefit of clergy.

§ XXII. In order more effectually to repress the barbarous practice of plundering ships which have the misfortune to suffer shipwreck; a practice which prevailed upon many different parts of the British dominions, on the grace of the nation, and the scandal of human nature; a bill was prepared, containing clauses to enforce the laws against such savage delinquents, who prowl along the coasts of these islands, under the colour of the hope of rescuing some fellow-creatures: and certain provisions for the relief of the unhappy sufferers. When the mutiny bill fell under deliberation, the Earl of Egmont proposed a new clause for empowering and requiring reguinald courts-martial to examine witnesses upon oath in all their trials. The proposal occasioned a debate, in which the minority were pretty equally divided; but the clause was disapproved by the majority, and this annual bill was enacted into a law without any further alteration.

§ XXIII. The next bill was framed in consequence of divers petitions presented by the exporters of corn, who complained that the bounties were not paid, and prayed that the House would make proper provision for that purpose. A bill was accordingly brought in, importing, That interest after the rate of three per cent. should be allowed upon every delverent for the bounty on the exportation of corn, payable by the receiver-general or cashier of the customs, until the principal could be discharged out of such customs or duties as are appropriated for the payment of this bounty. This premium on the exportation of corn ought not to be granted, except when the lowness of the market produces great benefit to the merchants. In the speech from the throne, the House was granted, that it could have no superabundance in the kingdom; otherwise the exporter will find his account in depriving our own labourers of their bread, in order to supply our rivals at an easier rate: for example, suppose wheat in England should sell at twenty shillings a quarter, the merchants might export into France, and afford it to the people of that kingdom for eighteen shillings, because the bounty on exportation would, even at that rate, afford him a considerable advantage.

§ XXIV. A great number of merchants have presented petitions from different parts of the kingdom, representing that the trade of Turkey was greatly decreased, everything that is exported out of Great Britain is now sold by a monopoly, and praying that the trade might be laid open to all his majesty's subjects, one of the members for Liverpool moved for leave to bring in a bill for this purpose. Such a measure had been supported before proposed without success; but now it was introduced; and, notwithstanding all the interest and efforts of the Turkey company, who petitioned the House against it, and were heard by their counsel: it passed through both Houses, and received the royal sanction. By this regulation any British subject may obtain the freedom of the Turkey company, by paying or rendering a line of twenty pounds; and the customs are seized from the tyranny of Government-preservative by-laws, contrived by any monopolizing cabal. § XV. But this session was chiefly distinguished by an act for naturalizing Jews, and a bill for the better preventing clandestine marriages. The first of these, which passed without much opposition in the House of Lords, from which it descended to the Commons, was entitled, "An act to permit persons professing the Jewish religion to become members of parliament, and other purposes therein mentioned." It was supported by some petitions of merchants and manufacturers, who, upon examination, appeared to be Jews, or their dependants; and countenanced by the ministry, who thought they foresaw, in the consequences of such naturalization, a great accession to the moneys interest, and a considerable increase of their own influence among the individuals of that community. They boldly affirmed, that such a law would greatly contribute to the advantage of the nation, that it would encourage persons of wealth to remove with their effects from foreign parts into Great Britain, increase the commerce and the credit of the kingdom, and set a laudable example to the rest of Europe; that the credit of the Christian religion, endanger the excellent constitution, and be highly prejudicial to the interest and trade of the kingdom in general, and of the city of London in particular. A petition of the same purpose was next day presented to the House, subscribed by merchants and traders of the city of London; who, among other allegations, observed, that the consequences of such a naturalization would greatly affect the character and credit of Britain, and particularly with Spain and Portugal. Congresses heard, evidence examined, and the bull produced violent debates, in which there seemed to be more passion than patriotism, more declamation than argument. The advocates of the bill affirmed, that such a naturalization would deluge the kingdom with brokers, insurers, and beggars; that the rich Jews, under the shadow of this indulgence, would purchase lands, and even advenrous; as so not only to acquire an interest in the legislature, but also to influence the constitution of the church of Christ, to which they were the importuned and professed enemies; that the lower class of that nation, when thus admitted to the denizens, would be the undisciplined strangers who endangered their livelihood by their labour; and by dint of the most preposterous frugality, to which the English are strangers, work at an under-price; so not only to share, but even in a manner to exclude them from all employment; that such an adoption of vagrant Jews into the community from all parts of the world, would rob the real subjects of their birthright, disgrace the character of the nation, expose themselves to the most dishonourable participation and intrusion, endanger the constitution both in church and state, and be an indelible reproach upon the established religion of the country. Some of these orators seemed transported even to a degree of enthusiasm. They prognosticated that the Jews would multiply so much in number, excess such wealth, and acquire so great a power and influence in Great Britain, that their persons would be revered, their customs imitated, and Judaism become the fashionable religion of the English. Finally, they affirmed that such an act was directly flying in the face of the prejudice, which declares that the Jews shall be a scattered people, without country or fixed habitation, until they shall be converted from their infidelity, and gathered together in one of their confederacies and apprehensions, which were in reality frivolous and chimerical, being industriously circulated among the vulgar, naturally prejudiced against the Jewish people, ex-

6 Several other bills were passed—one for regulating the number of public beavers in any county or precinct; another for prohibiting the sale of linen and silk cloths without a licence; an act which empowered the justices of peace to try such cases; an act for the better punishment of vagrants; an act for prohibiting all kind of horsedrawn carriages, that the high roads of the kingdom might be the better preserved. a special license by the archbishop: That if any marriage should be solemnized in any other place than a church or a chapel, without a special license, or in a public chapel, without having published the banns, or obtained a license, the marriage would be void, and the person who solemnized it transported for seven years: That marriages, by license, of parties under age, without consent of parent or guardian, should be null and void, unless the parties be one above age by four, widow, and the parent refusing consent, a widow married again: That when the consent of a mother or guardian is refused from caprice, or such parent or guardian be not competent, the marriage may be resorted to; and there is no recourse for relief to the court of chancery: That no suit should be commenced to compel a celebration of marriage, upon pretence of any contract: That all marriages should be solemnized before two witnesses, and an entry be made in a book kept for that purpose, whether it was by banns or license, whether either of the parties were under age, or the marriage celebrated with the consent of parent or guardian; and this entry to be signed by the minister, the parties, and the witnesses: That a false license, or certificate, or destroying register books, should be deemed felony, either in principal or accessory, and punished with death. The bill, when first considered in the lower House, gave rise to some of that agitation which was apt to be divided rather according to their real sentiments, than by the rules of any political distinction: for some principal servants of the government freely differed in opinion from the minister, who connived at the bill; while others were opposed to it, supported by certain chiefs of the opposition, and the disputes were maintained with extraordinary eagerness and warmth. The principal objections imported, that such restrictions on marriage would damp the spirit of love and propagation; promote mercenary matches, to the ruin of domestic happiness, as well as to the prejudice of posterity and population; impede the circulation of property by preserving that property to the same family; and encourage the opulent families, who would always intermarry within their own pale; subject the poor to many inconveniences and extraordinary expense, from the nature of the forms to be observed; and throw an additional power into the hands of the chancellor. They affirmed, that no human power had a right to dissolve a vow solemnly made in the sight of heaven: and that, in proportion as the bill prevented clandestine marriages, it would encourage fornication and depravity. The parties restrained from indulging their mutual passions in an honourable manner, would be tempted to gratify them by stealth, at the hazard of their reputation. In a word, they foresaw a great number of men, who, rather than lose the pleasure of gratifying their passion, would be willing that they should be realized. On the other side, its advocates endeavored to refute these arguments, and some of them spoke with great strength and precision. The bill underwent a great number of alterations and amendments; which were not effected without violent contest and altercation. At length however, it was floated through both Houses on the tide of a great majority, and steered into the safe harbour of royal approbation. Certainly it is, the abuse of clandestine marriage might have been removed upon much easier terms than those imposed upon the subject by this bill, which, after all, hath been found ineffectual, as it may be easily eluded by a short voyage to the continent, or a moderate journey to North Britain; where the indissoluble knot may be tied without scruple or interruption. § XXVII. Over and above these new statutes, there were some other subjects which occasionally employed the attention of the Commons; such as the state of the British sugar colonies, which was considered in consequence of petitions presented by the sugar refiners and manufacturers of London, Westminster, and Bristol, complaining of the exorbitant price demanded and given for sugars imported from Jamaica: desiring that the proprietors of land in Jamaica might be obliged to cultivate greater quantities of ground for raising sugar cane, or that they (the petitioners) might have leave to import muscovado sugar from the same island. These petitions were at length referred to the Lords, by whom it was, at the second reading, thrown out, as a scheme of very dangerous tendency. The legislature of Great Britain have, on some occasions, been more started at the diwan shadow of a bare possibility, than at the real approach of the most dangerous innovation. It is by the careful definition on civil and commercial concerns, the attention of the parliament, which had seldom or never turned upon literary avocations, was called off by an extraordinary subject of this nature. Sir Hans Sloane's celebrated plans and natural history known through all the civilized countries of Europe for his ample collection of rarities, culled from the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, as well as of antiquities and curiosities of art, had directed in his last will, that his vast library together with his curiosities should be offered to the parliament, for the use of the public, in consideration of their paying a certain sum, in compensation, to his heirs. His terms were embraced by the Commons, who agreed to pay twenty thousand pounds for the whole, supposed to be worth four times that sum; and a bill was prepared for purchasing this museum, together with the Harleian collection of manuscripts, so designated from its founder, Robert Harley Earl of Oxford, lord high treasurer of England, and now offered to the public by his daughter, the Duchess of Portland. It was proposed that these purchases should be joined to the famous Cottonian library, and a suitable repository provided, and the king's library, which lies in a dungeon neglected and exposed to the injuries of the weather in the old dormitory at Westminster. Accordingly, trustees and governors, consisting of the most eminent persons, were drawn up, with regulations and restrictions established for the management of this noble muniment, which was deposited in Montagu-house, one of the most magnificent edifices in England, where it is subjected, without reserve, to the use of the public, under certain necessary restrictions, and exhibits a glorious monument of national taste and liberality. In the beginning of June the session of parliament was closed by his majesty, who mentioned nothing particular in his speech, but that the state of foreign and domestic affairs was in a prosperous manner.

§ XXX. The genius of the English people is perhaps incompatible with a state of perfect tranquillity; it is not ruffled by foreign provocations, or agitated by unpopular measures of domestic administration, it will undergo temporary fermentations from the turbulent ingredients inherent in its own constitution. Troumluts are excited, and factions kindled into rage and inveteracy, by incidents of the most frivolous nature. At this juncture, the metropolis of England was divided and discomposed in a surprising manner, by a dispute in itself of so little consequence to the community, that it would not deserve a place in a general history if it did not have a characteristic feature of the English nation. In the beginning of the year an obscure damsel, of low degree, whose name was Elizabeth Canning, pronounced a report, which in a little time attracted the attention of the public. She affirmed, that on the first day of the new year, at night, she was seized under Bedlam-wall by two ruffians, who having stripped her of her upper apparel, secured her mouth with a gag, and threatened to murder her should she make the least noise; that they conveyed her on foot about ten miles, to a place called Enfield-wash, and brought her to the house of one Mrs. Wells, where she was pillaged of her staves; and, because she refused to turn prostitute, confined in a cold, damp, separate, and unfurnished apartment; where she remained a whole month, without any other sustenance than a few stale crusts of bread, and about a gallon of water; till at length she forced her way through a window, and ran home to her mother's house, almost naked, in the night of the twentieth of January. This story, improbable and unsupported, operated so strongly on the passions of the people in the neighbourhood of Aldermarsham, where Canning's house is situated, and particularly on the more sanguine denominations, that they roused voluntary contributions with surprising eagerness, in order to bring the supposed delinquents to justice. Warrants were granted for apprehending Wells, who kept the house at Enfield-wash, and Virtue, her husband, a greasy, old woman, and Southern, her servant. Warrants were also granted for the apprehension of a woman, named Canning, alias Virtue, Hall, and one Squires, an old greasy woman, which last was charged by Canning of having robbed her of her stays. Wells, though acquitted of the felony, was punished as a bawd. In the same instance, a judge of the admirals of the court of admirals, afterwards accosted. Squires, the bishop, was convicted of the robbery, though she produced undoubted evidence to prove that she was at Abergavenny in Monmouthshire that very night in which the felony was said to be committed, and Canning was taken from her house, and brought up before the admiralty court during the course of the trial. By this time the prepossession of the common people in her favour had risen to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that the most palpable truths which appeared on the other side, had no effect other than that of exasperating them to the most dangerous degree of rage and revenge. Some of the witnesses for Squires, though persons of unblemished character, were so intimidated, that they would not enter the court; and those who had resolution enough to give evidence in her behalf, ran the risk of assassination from the vulgar that surrounded the place. On this occasion, Sir Crisp Gaspouye, Lord Mayor of London, in a matter with that grandeur of conduct and humanity which ought ever to distinguish the chief magistrate of such a metropolis. Considering the improbability of the charge, the heat, partiality, and blind enthusiasm with which it was prosecuted, and being convinced, that the case was entirely against the accusers, and that the accused was innocent of the kind of affidavit, voluntarily sent up from the country by persons of unquestionable credit, he, in conjunction with some other worthy citizens, resolved to oppose the torrent of vulgar prejudice. Application was made to the throne for mercy: the case was referred to the attorney and solicitor-general, who, having examined the evidences on both sides, made their report in favour of Squires to the king and council; and this poor creature was indulged with his majesty's pardon. This affair was now swelled up into such a faction as divided the greater part of the kingdom, including the rich as well as the poor, the high as well as the humble. Pamphlets and pamphlets were published on both sides of the dispute, which became the general topic of conversation in all assemblies, and people of all ranks espoused one or other party with as much warmth and animosity as had ever inflamed the whigs and tories, even at the most renowned period of their opposition. Subscriptions were opened, and large sums levied, on one side, to prosecute for perjury the persons on whose evidence the pardon had been granted. On the other hand, hands were stretched out to the poor woman resolved to support her witnesses, and, if possible, detect the imposture of Canning. Bills of perjury were preferred on both sides. The evidence for Squires were tried and acquitted; at first Canning abscounded; but afterwards surrendered to take her trial, and being, after a long hearing, found guilty, was transported to the British colonies. The zeal of her friends, however, seemed to be inflamed by her conviction; and those who came on the prosecution against her were assaulted, even to the danger of their lives. They supplied her with necessities of all sorts, paid for her transportation in a private ship, where she enjoy'd all the comforts and conveniences that could be afforded in that situation, and forwarded her with such recommendations as secured to her a very agreeable reception in New England.

§ XXXI. Next to this very remarkable transaction, the incident that principally distinguished this year in England, was the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron, a native of North Britain, and brother to Cameron of Lochiel, chief of that numerous and warlike tribe, who had taken the field with the prince pretender. After the battle of Sheriffmuir, among fragments of all denominations, that they roused voluntary contributions.
the doctor, had accompanied him in all his expeditions, though not in a military capacity, and was included with him in the act of attainer passed against those who had been concerned in the rebellion. Notwithstanding the imprisonment of the former, an order was issued for the latter's return to Scotland, in order (as it was reported) to recover a sum of money belonging to the pretender, which had been embezled by his adherents in that country. Whether this may have been the reason of his becoming such an unfortunate gentleman: their pit was mingled with esteem, arising from his personal character, which was altogether unblemished, and his deportment on this occasion, which they could not help admiring, as the standard of mankind and decorum. The populace, though not very subject to tender emotions, were moved to compassion, and even to tears, by his behaviour at the place of execution; and many sincere and industrious people, resolving on this occasion never to be parties to the sacrifice of this victim, at such a juncture, could not redound either to his honour or security.

§ XXXII. The turbulent spirit, which is never totally extinguished in this kingdom, had its full vent in the different parts of South Britain. The price of provisions, and bread in particular, being raised to an exorbitant rate, in consequence of an absurd exportation of corn, for the sake of the bounty, a formidable body of colliers, and other labouring people, raised an insurrection at Bristol, began to plunder the corn-vessels in the harbour, and commit such outrages in the city, that the magistrates were obliged to have recourse to the military for a formidable assistance. The convulsion, however, and the insurgents were quelled, though without some bloodshed. Commotions of the same kind were excited in Yorkshire, Manchester, and several other places in the north, and particularly at Leeds: a detachment of the king's troops were obliged in their own defence to fire upon the rioters, eight or nine of whom were killed on the spot; and, indeed, so little care had been taken to restrain the licentious insolence of the vulgar by proper laws and regular measures, that the possession of the town by the faction, that a military power was found absolutely necessary to maintain the peace of the kingdom.

§ XXXIII. The tranquillity of the continent was not equally happy here. To remove, however, the breach between the clergy and the parliament of Paris was every day more and more widened, and the people were pretty equally divided between superstition and a regard for civil liberties. The parliament having caused divers ecclesiastics to be apprehended, for having refused to administer the sacraments to persons in extremity, who refused to subscribe to the bull Unigenitus, all of them declared they acted according to the direction of the Archbishop of Paris. Application being made to this haughty prelate, he treated the deputies of the parliament with the most supercilious contempt, and even seemed to bravo the power and authority of that body. They, on the other hand, protested their adherence to the royal authority, and their sovereign ordered them to desist. They then presented remonstrances to his majesty, reminding him of their privileges, and the duty of their station, which obliged them to do justice on all departments. In the meantime, they continued to perform their functions, and even commenced a prosecution against the Bishop of Orleans, whom they summoned to attend their tribunal. Next day they received from Versailles a lettre de cachet, accompanied by letters patent, commanding them to suppress all protestations relating to the refusal of the sacraments; and ordering the letters patent to be registered. Instead of obeying these commands, they presented new remonstrances, for an answer, which they were refused to give. The king's former declarations. In consequence of this intimidation, they had spirit enough to resolve, "that whereas certain evil-minded persons had prevented truth from reaching the throne, the chambers remained assembled, and all other business should be suspended." The affair was now become very serious. His majesty, by a fresh letter of orders, and commanded them to proceed with their ordinary business, on pain of incurring his displeasure. They forthwith came to another resolution, importing, that they could not obey this injunction without a breach of their duty and their oath. In a few days letters de cachet were issued, prohibiting them to proceed to different parts of the kingdom all the members, except those of the great chamber, which the court did not find more tractable than their brethren. They forthwith resolved to take the measures above; and, as an instance of their unshaken fortitude, ordered an ecclesiastic to be taken into custody for refusing the sacraments. This spirited measure involved them in the fate of the rest; for they were also implicated from Paris, the citizens of which did not fail to exult their conduct with the lowest encomiums, and at the same time to express their resentment against the clergy, who could not stir abroad without being exposed to violence or insult. The example of the parliament of Paris was followed by that of Rouen, which had courage enough to issue orders for apprehending the Bishop of Evreux, because he had refused to appear when summoned to their tribunal. Their brethren, in the same council of state, who, in an instance of the council of state, presented a bold remonstrance, which, however, had no other effect than that of exasperating the ministry. A grand deputation being ordered to attend the king, they were commanded to dissent in disputes relating to the refusal of the sacraments, and to register this injunction. At their return they had recourse to a new remonstrance: and one of their principal councillors, who had spoken freely in the debates on this subject, was arrested by a party of dragoons, who carried him prisoner to the castle of Dourlens. In a word, the body of the people declared for the parliament, in opposition to ecclesiastical tyranny; and, had they not been overawed by a show of force, they would have formed a formidable body of armed forces. The insurrection was, however, quelled without the intervention of the people, and the monarch, weakly suffered himself to be governed by priestly delusions; and, secure in his military appointment, seemed to set the rest of his subjects at defiance. Apprehensive, however, that these disputes would put an entire stop to the administration of justice, he, by letters patent, established a royal chamber for the prosecution of suits civil and criminal, which was opened with a solemn mass performed in the queen's chapel, and conducted in an extraordinary manner, that a military power was found absolutely necessary to maintain the peace of the kingdom.
Vienna, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of fourteen voices. His Prussian majesty's final declaration with regard to this affair was afterwards presented to the diet, and answered in the sequel by a memorial from his Britannic majesty as Elector of Hanover. Some other petty disputes likewise happened between the regency of Hanover and the city of Munster; and the former claiming some saltwicks in the territories of Bremen, sequestered certain saltwicks belonging to the city of Stade and Ferden, till these claims should be satisfied.

§ XXXV. The court of Vienna having dropped for the present the scheme for electing a King of the Romans, concluded a friendly treaty with the Duke of Modena, stipulating that his serene highness should be appointed perpetual governor of the duchy of Milan, with a salary of ninety thousand thalers, on condition that he should maintain a body of four thousand men, to be at the disposal of the empress queen; that her imperial majesty should have a right to place garrisons in the citadels of Mirandola and Reggio, as well as in the castle of Massa Carrara: that the Archduke Peter Leopold, third son of their imperial majesties, should espouse the daughter of the hereditary Prince of Modena, by the heiress of Massa Carrara; and in case of her dying without heirs male, the estates of that house and the duchy of Mirandola should descend to the Elector of Hesse; but in either of these cases, that she should enjoy the principality of Ferrara, and other possessions in Hungary, claimed by the Duke of Modena, for her fortune; finally, that on the extinction of the male line of the house of Este, the dominions of the Duke of Modena should devolve to the house of Austria.

§ XXXVI. While the powers on the continent of Europe were thus employed in strengthening their respective interests, and concerting measures for preventing any interruption of the general tranquility, a new topic of general interest was opening to a fresh rupture between the subjects of Great Britain and France, in different parts of North America. We have already observed that commissaries had been appointed by that power to the city of Boston, to determine the disputes between the two powers, relating to the boundaries of Nova Scotia; and we took notice in general of the little arts of evasion practised by the French commissaries to darken and perplex the dispute, and elude the pretensions of his Britannic majesty. They persisted in employing these arts of chicanery and caviil with such perseverance, that the negotiation proved abortive, the conferences broke up, and every thing seemed to point to an approaching hostility. But, before we proceed to a detail of the incidents which were the immediate forerunners of the war, we will endeavour to convey a just idea of the dispute concerning Nova Scotia; which, we apprehend, is but a trifle as compared to the vast subjects, to determine which the disputes between the two powers are opened. We shall proceed to a survey of the whole, comprehending the whole of the question, and the interesting points connected with it, and the consequences which may happen from this new and pressing measure, affecting the interests of the world, and the liberties of mankind. We shall discuss it in a distinct manner, and we shall have occasion to shew, that the French, in concerting their views, have been actuated by motives which are greatly to annoy all our other colonies, and, if in the hands of the French, would be of singular service both to their fishery and their sugar-islands, has frequently changed hands from the French to the English, and from the English back again to the French, till our right to it was finally settled by the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, by which it was confirmed to Great Britain, in consideration of the ancient limits of that country, which was called Nova Scotia or Acadia, was ceded to the English. This article was confirmed by the treaty of Aus- lia-Chapelle; but, for want of ascertaining distinctly what were the bounds intended to be fixed by the two nations with regard to the said province, the disputes, as we have observed, were appointed by both sides, to adjust the litigation.

§ XXXVII. The commissaries of the King of Great Britain, were employed in fixing the boundary line of the treaty itself, and assigned those as the ancient limits of this country, which had always passed as such, from the very earliest time of any certainty, down to the conclusion of the treaty; which the two crowns had frequently declined to be such, and which the French had often admitted and allowed. These limits are, the southern bank of the river St. Lawrence to the north, and Pentagot to the west: the country situated between these boundaries is that which the French received by the treaty of St. Germain's, in the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-two, under the general name of Acadia. Of this country, thus limited, they continued in possession from that period to the year 1713, when, by the treaty of the Peace of Utrecht, it was made up, by the command of Colonel Sedg- weck. That these were then the undisputed limits of Acadia, his Britannic majesty's commissaries plainly proved, by the declaration of the treaty, by a letter from Lord Louvois and La Tour, regulating their jurisdictions in Acadia; by the subsequent commissions of the French king to the same persons, as governors of Acadia, in the sequel; and by that which was afterwards granted to the Senor Darya, in the year one thousand six hundred and fifty-four; all of which extend the bounds of this country from the river St. Lawrence to Pentagot and New England. That these were the notions of the French with respect to the ancient limits of Acadia, was further established by memorials made by their ambassador, in the course of that same year, for the restitution of the forts Pentagot, St. John's, and Port Royal, as forts situated in Acadia. In the year one thousand six hundred and eighty-two, upon the renewal of the claim of France to the country of Acadia, which had been left undecided by the treaty of Westminster, the French ambassador, then at the court of London, assigned Pentagot and Port Royal to the western, and the river St. Lawrence to the northern, boundary of that country; and alleged the restitution of Acadia in the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-two, and the possession taken by France in consequence thereof, as well as the continuation of the possession, as the same, without interruption of six hundred and fifty-four, as proofs of the equity and validity of the claim he then made: in which claim, and in the manner of supporting it, he was particularly appro- ving of by the court of France. The same court afterwards thought it so clear, upon former determinations, and her own former possessions, that the true ancient boundaries of Acadia were Pentagot to the west, and the river St. Lawrence to the north, that she desired no speci- fication of limits in the treaty of Breda, but was contented with the restitution of Acadia; generally named; and, upon a dispute which arose in the execution of this treaty, France re-asserted, and Great Britain, after some discussion, carried the possession of the said territory to the French; and France obtained possession of that country, so bounded, under the treaty of Breda. The sense of France upon this subject, in the year one thousand six hundred and eighty-five, and one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, was also clearly manifested, in the memorials delivered at that time by the French ambassador at the court of London, complaining of some encroachments made by the English upon the said territory. These were afterwards confirmed, as extending from old Piscataquis, which lies at the entrance of the river St. Lawrence, to St. George's island: and again, in a subsequent complaint, made by Mons. Barillon and Mons. Morin, to the English and French majesties, would be extremely injurious to the trade of this country, and to the interests of the kingdom of France, as having seized the effects of a French merchant at Pentagot, which, said they, was situated in Acadia, as restored to France by the treaty of Breda. To explain the sense of France, touching the bounds of Acadia in the year one thousand seven hundred, the British commissioners produced a proposal of the French ambassadors to the Americans, which was drawn up according to the limits of that country to the river St. George. They also instanced the surrender of Port Royal in the year one thousand seven hundred and ten, in which Acadia is described with the same limits with which France had received it in the two preceding years, amounting in all to thirty-two, and one thousand six hundred and sixty-seven. And further to ascertain the sense of both crowns, even at the treaty of Utrecht itself, they produced the Queen of Great Britain's instructions to her ambassadors in the year one thousand seven hundred and eleven, in which they were directed to state, "That his most Christian Majesty should quit all claim or title, by virtue of any former treaty, or otherwise, to the country called Nova Scotia, and expressly to Port Royal, otherwise Annapolis Royal." To these they added a manifest demonstration, founded on indisputable facts, proving that the recital of the several sorts of right which France had ever pretended to this country, and the specification of both terms, Acadia or Nova Scotia, were intended by Great Britain to obviate all doubts which had ever been made concerning the limits of Acadia, and to comprehend with more certainty all that concerned the conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht, with a view to specify what France considered as Acadia. During the treaty they referred to the offers of the crown in the year one thousand seven hundred and twelve, in which they pretended to the crown, that of the river St. George, as a departure from its real boundary, in case Great Britain would restore to her the possession of that country. From all these facts it plainly appears that Great Britain demanded nothing but what the fair construction of the articles of the treaty of Utrecht necessarily required; and that it is impossible for anything to have more evident marks of candidor and fairness in it, than the demand of the English on this occasion. From the variety of evidence, the undersigned, and the British commissioners, it is clear that the English commissioners assigned no limits as the ancient limits of Acadia, but those which France herself determined to be such in the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-two; and which she possessed, in consequence of that determination, till the year one thousand six hundred and fifty-four; and that in one thousand six hundred and sixty-two France claimed, and received in one thousand six hundred and seventy-five, and which she possessed, in consequence of that determination, till the year one thousand six hundred and seventy-four; and that, by the treaty of Utrecht, she engaged to transfer that very same country as Acadia, which France had always asserted and possessed, and Great Britain now claims, as such. Should the crown of France, therefore, be ever willing to decide what are the ancient limits of Acadia, by her own declarations so frequently made in like discussions upon the same point, by her possessions of this country for almost a century, and by her description of Acadia, during the negotiation of that very treaty upon which this doubt is raised, she cannot but admit the claim of Great Britain to be conformable to their sense and the treaty of Utrecht, and to the descriptions of the country transferred to Great Britain by the twelfth article of that treaty. There is a consistency in the claim of the English, and a completeness in the evidence brought in support of it, which is seldom seen in discussions of this sort; for it rarely happens in disputes of such a nature between two crowns, that either of them can safely offer to have its pretensions decided by the known and repeated declarations, or the possessions, of the other. To answer the determination of this question, either by a direct negotiation, or by a new trial to the real question in dispute, the French commissioners, in their memorial, laid it down as a distinction made by the treaty of Utrecht, that the ancient limits of Acadia were to be considered as those limits from which that country may have passed under the treaties of St. Germain's and Breda; and then endeavoured to show, upon the testimonies of maps and historians, that Acadia and its limits were anciently confined to the south-eastern part of the peninsula. In support of this system, the French commissioners had recourse to ancient maps and historians, who, to their own sense and the French, referred to the limits they assigned. They alleged that those commissions of the French government over Acadia, which the English cited as evidence of the limits they claimed, were given as commissions over Acadia and the country around it, and not over Acadia itself. And the country claimed by the English as Acadia, could not possibly be supposed ever to be considered as such, because many parts of that territory always did, and still do, preserve particular and distinct names. They affirmed New France to be a province in itself; and argued that many parts of what we claim as Acadia can never have been in Acadia, because historians and the French commissions of government expressly place them in New France. They asserted that no evidence can be drawn of the opinion of any crown, with respect to the limits of any country, from its declaration during the negotiation of a treaty; and, in the end, relying upon maps and historians for the ancient limits of Acadia, they pretended that the express reservation of St. Germain's and the possession taken by France in consequence of the treaty of Breda, after a long discussion of the limits, and the declaration of France during the negotiation of the treaty of Utrecht, to all intents and purposes, was the point in question. In refutation of these maxims, the English commissioners proved, from an examination of the maps and historians cited by the French in support of their system, that if we can give any opinion as to the authorities which they themselves allowed to belong and to be applicable to this discussion, the limits which they assigned were utterly inconsistent with the best maps of all countries, which are authoritative in point for almost every part of the British empire. They also proved that the French historians, Champlain and Denys, and particularly this last, with his commission in the year one thousand six hundred and fifty-five, assigned the same northern as the French did in the treaty of Utrecht, and that Escarbot, another of their historians, as far as any evidence can be drawn from his writings, agrees entirely with the former two. They observed, that all these evidences fall in with and confirm the better authorities of treaties, and the several transactions between the two crowns for near a century past; and that the French commissioners, by deviating from treaties, and the late proceeding of the two crowns, to ancient historians and maps, only contributed to an accumulation of evidence, and led the English commissioners into an inquiry, which proved that both the proper and the improper, the regular and the foreign evidence, upon which this matter had been revolved, was in their favor, according to the French commissioners as the ancient limits of Acadia.

CHAP. III.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

A.D. 1733.——Book III.

§ I. While the British ministry depended, upon the success of the conferences between the commissioners of the two crowns at Paris, the French were actively employed in extending their plans of encroachment upon the British colonies in North America. The scheme was to engross the whole fur-trade of that continent, and they had already made great progress in extending its ramifications. British settlements on the river Mississippi with their possessions in Canada, along the great lakes of Erie and Ontario, which last issues into the river St. Lawrence. By these means they hoped to exclude the English from all communication and traffic with the Indians; and by thus confining even those of the British settlements, and confine them within a line of their drawing, beyond which they should neither extend their trade nor plantations. Their commercial spirit did not act so much as the patriotic aims of their colonists. They could not supply all those Indians with the necessaries they wanted, so that many of the natives had recourse to the English settlements; and this commerce produced a connexion, in consequence of which the British adventurers ventured to travel with merchandise as far as the banks of the river Ohio, that runs into the Mississippi, a great way on the other side of the Apalachian mountains, beyond the line of our colonists, who attempted to penetrate. The tract of country lying along the Ohio is so fertile, pleasant, and inviting, and the Indians, called Twightees, who inhabit those delightful plains, were so well disposed towards a close alliance with the English, that seven hundred and sixty, in the years fifteen and sixteen, Mr. Spotwood, Governor of Virginia, proposed a plan for erecting a company to settle such lands upon this river as should be ceded to them by treaty with the natives; but the design was at that time frustrated, partly by the indulgence and timidity of the British ministry, who were afraid of giving umbrage to the French, and partly by jealousies and divisions subsisting between the several colonies of Great Britain. The very same circumstances encouraged the French to proceed in their progress of invasion. At length, they penetrated from the banks of the river St. Lawrence, across lake Champlain, and upon the territory of New York built, with impunity: and indeed without opposition, the fort of Crown Point, the most insolent and dangerous encroachment that they had hitherto carried into execution.

§ II. Governor Spotwood's scheme for an Ohio company was revived immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, when certain merchants of London who traded to Maryland and Virginia, petitioned the government on this subject, and were indulged not only with a grant of a charter to a company, but to the southward of Pennsylvania, which they promised to settle, but also with an exclusive privilege of trading with the Indians on the banks of the river Ohio. This design no sooner transpired than the French governor of Canada took the alarm, and wrote the letters to the Governors of New York and Pennsylvania, giving them to understand, that as the English inland traders had encroached on the French territories and privileges, by trading with the Indians under the protection of his sovereign, he would seize them wherever they could be found, if they did not immediately desist from that illicit practice. No regard being paid to this intimation, he next year caused three British traders to be arrested. Their officers were confounded, and they themselves did not resemble the French, from whence they were sent prisoners to Rochelle in France, and there detained in confinement. In this situation they presented a remonstrance to the Earl of Albemarle, at that time English ambassador at Paris, in which they charged the French with being British subjects, they were set at liberty. Although, in answer to his lordship's memorial, the court of Versailles promised to transmit orders to the French governor of Canada to release them, on their endeavour in no case, that the earl did not send them, and the officers of the French court who had these papers sent, being some slight oversight, the concurrence of the Indians was neither obtained nor solicited, and therefore they looked upon this measure with an evil eye, as a manifest invasion of their rights.

§ IV. While the French thus industriously extended their encroachments to the southward, they were not idle in the gulf of St. Lawrence, but seized every opportunity of distressing the English settlement of Nova Scotia. We have already observed, that the town of Halifax was no sooner built, than they spirited up the Indians of that neighbourhood to commit hostilities against the inhabitants, some of whom they murdered, and others they carried to Halifax, where they armed them for arms and ammunition, the French pretending that they maintained this traffic from motives of pure compassion, in order to prevent the massacre of the English captives, whom, however, they did not set at liberty without exacting a large ransom for them. Some of the Indians were generally directed and headed by French commanders, repeated complaints were made to the governor of Louisbourg, who still answered, that his jurisdiction did not extend the Continent, and that the French conductors were chosen from the inhabitants of Annapolis, who thought proper to remain in that country after it was ceded to the English, and were, in fact, the subjects of Great Britain. Even while the conferences were carried on for ascertaining the limits of Nova Scotia, the Governor of Canada detached M. La Corne, with some regular troops, and a body of militia, to fortify a post on the bay of Chignecto, on the pretence that this and a great part of the peninsula belonged to his government. The possession of this post not only secured to the Indians of the continent a free entrance into the peninsula, and a safe retreat in case of pursuit; but also encouraged the French to assume a pretence to rise in open rebellion against the English government.

§ V. In the spring of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty, General Cornwallis, Governor of Halifax, sent M. De la Jonquiere, with a large body of men, to put down to obedience. At his approach they burned their towns to ashes, forsook their possessions, and threw themselves under the protection of M. La Corne, who, thus reinforced, found himself at the head of fifteen hundred men, well provided with arms and ammunition. Major Laurence being unable to cope with him in the field, demanded an interview, at which he desired to know for what cause the French inhabitants of Nova Scotia had shewn off their allegiance to the crown of Great Britain, and violated the neutrality which they had hitherto affected to profess. The French officer, without pretending to account for their behaviour, gave him to understand in general terms, that he had orders to defend his post, and these orders he was determined to obey. The English major finding himself too weak to attack their united force, and having no orders to commit hostilities against any but the French and their Indian abettors, returned to Halifax, without having been able to fulfil the purpose of his expedition. Immediately after his retreat, the French neutrals (so they were called) returned to the habitations which they had abandoned; and, in conjunction with the Indians, renewed their depredations among the inhabitants of Halifax and its dependent settlements. The English governor, justly incensed at these outrages, and seeing they would neither submit to the English government themselves, nor allow others to enjoy it with tranquillity, resolved to expel them effectually from the country they so ill deserved to possess. Major Laurence was again detached with a thousand men, transported by sea to Chignecto, where he found the French and Indians intrenched, in order to dispute his landing. Notwithstanding this opposition, he made a descent with a few companies, received and returned a smart fire, and rushing into their intrenchments, put an end to the pretended protection, leaving a considerable number killed and wounded on the spot. The fugitives saved themselves by crossing a river, on the further bank of which La Corne stood at the head of the troops, drawn up in order to receive them as friends and dependants. He had by this time erected a fort, which he denominated Beau Sejour, and now the English built another on the opposite side of the river, which was called after its founder St. Laurence. This had pressed upon the French to evacuate it as a citadel upon the French, and in some measure restrained the incursions of their barbarians. Not that it effectually answered this purpose; for the Indians and neutrals still secured numerous Swiss prisoners in the land or on the sea, in the interior parts of the peninsula. In the course of the succeeding year they surprised the little town of Dartmouth, on the other side of Halifax bay, where they killed and scalped a great number of people, and carried off some prisoners. For these expeditions the French always supplied them with boats, canoes, arms, and ammunition; and indeed they were conducted with such care and secrecy, that it was almost impossible to prevent their success. One sure remedy against the sudden and stolen incursions of those savages might have been found in the use of stand hounst, which would have run on the foot, detected the lurking savages of Nova Scotia, and frustrated all their ambuscades: but this expedition, so easy and practicable, was never tried, though frequently recommended in public to the attention of the government, but did not even procure their remonstrances continued to plunder and massacre the British subjects with impunity, and were countenanced by the French government in that country, who now strengthened their lodge subject on the neck of the peninsula with an additional fort, distinguished by the name of Bay-verte; and built a third at the mouth of St. John's river, on the north side of the bay of Fundy.

§ VI. All the previous steps to a rupture with England were taken with great deliberation, while the commissioners of both nations were disputing about the limits of the very country which they thus arrogantly usurped; and they proceeded to perfect their chain of forts to the southward, without paying the least regard to the rights and interests of the English governors, or to a memorial presented at Versailles by the Earl of Allambarie, the British minister. He demanded that express orders should be sent to M. de la Jonquiere, commanding the French forces in Canada, to desist from violence against the British subjects in that country; that the fort of Niagara should be immediately razed; that the subjects of Great Britain, who had been made prisoners, should be set at liberty, and indemnified for the losses they had sustained; and that the persons who had committed these excesses should be punished in an exemplary manner. True it is, six Englishmen, whom they had unjustly taken, were immediately dismissed; and the ambassador amused with general promises of sending such instructions to the French governor in America, as should anticipate any cause of complaint for the future; but, far from having any intention to perform these promises, the court of Versailles, without all doubt, exhoribated de la Jonquiere to proceed in bringing its ambitious schemes to perfection.

§ VII. Every accident in America seemed to prognosticate war, when the session of parliament was opened on the fifteenth day of November; yet his majesty, on this occasion, told them, that the events of the year had not made it necessary for him to offer any thing in particular to their consideration relating to foreign affairs; declared, that the maintenance of the public tranquillity, and the general state of Europe, remained upon the same footing as when they last parted; and assured them of his steadiness in pursuing the most effectual measures to preserve to his people the blessings of peace. He expressed an uncommon concern, that the horrid crimes of robbery and of murder were of late rather increased than diminished, and earnestly recommended this important object to their serious attention. Affectionate addresses were presented by both Houses in answer to this harangue; and, what was very remarkable, they were proposed and passed without question or debate.

§ VIII. The expeditions continued the same number of seamen and land-forces for the ensuing year, which had been granted in the last session, and made suitable provision for all the exigencies of the state. The whole supply amounted to two millions seven hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and sixteen pounds, ten shillings, and two pence, to be raised by a land tax of two shillings in the pound, a malt tax, a continuation of certain duties on wine, vinegar, cider, and beer imported, a sum taken from the sinking fund, and the revenue of the postmasters and officers, funds, and duties. The provisions made coodenscendently exceeded the grants; but this excess was chargeable with the interest of what should be borrowed upon the credit of the state, and which was necessary for the public service, both, as also with the deficiency (if any should happen) in the sums they were computed to produce. The House agreed to all these resolutions almost unanimously: indeed, no opposition was made to any of them, but that for continuing the same number of land-forces, which was carried by a great majority.

§ 4. The act of the twenty-fifth of March, 1701, for the naturalization of Jews, which had, during the last session, triumphed over such an obstinate opposition, was by this time become the subject of national horror and execration. Every part of the kingdom was filled with the apprehension that the ministry who had enforced such an odious measure; and the two brothers, who engrossed the greater part of the administration, trembled at the prospect of what this clamour might produce at the general election, this being the last session of the present Parliament. So eager were they to have annulled this unpopular measure, that, immediately after the Peers had agreed to the nature and form of an address to his majesty, the Duke of Newcastle, with that precipitation so peculiar to his character, posted forth an abrupt harangue in that House, importing, that the disaffected had made a handle of the act passed last session in favour of the Jews, to raise discontents among many of his majesty's good subjects; and as the act was in itself of little importance, he was of opinion it ought to be repealed; for this purpose he presented a bill ready framed, which was read and committed, though not without some debate. The next day, the bill, now devoured as a sacrifice to the resentment of the people, contained a clause disabling all naturalized Jews from purchasing, inheriting, or receiving any advowson or presentation, or right to any ecclesiastical benefice or promotion, school, hospital, or donation; and as it was a draft of the bill, which had been promulgated, it was intended that this clause should not be repealed. It was the opinion, however, of the majority, that such a clause standing unrepealed might imply, that the Jews, by being thus expressly excluded from the possession of any ecclesiastical right of presentation, would be considered as having the power and privilege of purchasing and inheriting any lay-property in the kingdom. Of creating an anxiety of the nature of that in the bill, the clause in question was left out, and the whole act of naturalization repealed without exception.3 Though the Lords in general concurred in the expediency of the repeal, it was opposed by few, as too great a sacrifice to the idle and unfounded clamours of the multitude; and upon this side of the debate a great power of eloquence was displayed by Earl Temple, who had lately succeeded to this title on the death of his mother, a nobleman of distinguishing abilities and the most amiable dispositions, frank, liberal, humane, and zealously attached to the interest and honour of his country. In the lower House, the members of both parties seemed to vie with each other in demonstration of their opposition to this unpromising act. On the very first day of the session, immediately after the motion for an address to his majesty, Sir James Dashwood, an eminent leader in the opposition, gave the Commons to understand, that he had a motion of very great importance to make, which would require the attention of every member, as soon as the motion for the address should be dis- cussed; he therefore desired they would not quit the House, until he should have an opportunity to explain his proposal. Accordingly, they had no sooner agreed to the motion for an address of thanks to his majesty, than he stood up again; and having expatiated upon the just and general indignation which the act of the preceding session, in favor of the Jews, excited among the people, he moved to order that the House should be called over on Tuesday the fourth day of December, for taking that act into consideration: but being given to understand, that it was not usual to appoint a call of the House for any particular purpose, he agreed that the motion should be general. It was seconded by Lord Parker, his opposite in political interests; the House agreed to it without opposition, and the call was ordered accordingly. They were anticipated, however, by the Lords, who feared and transmitted to them a bill on the same subject, to the purport of which the Commons made no objection; for every member, having the fear of the general election

3 The recent session of bishops' held, with a laudable spirit of Christian moderation, generally approved of the indolence granted to three Hebrew brethren, and now they acquiesced in the proposed repeal before his eyes, carefully avoided every expression which could give umbrage to his constituents: but violent opposition was made to the preamble, which ran in the following strain:—"Whereas an act of parliament was made..." Intuited, an act to permit persons professing the Jewish religion to be naturalized by parliament, and for other purposes therein mentioned; and whereas occasion was taken to argue that the act required disquisitions and disquisitions in the minds of his majesty's subjects, be it enacted, &c." This introduction was considered as an unjust reflection upon the body of the people in general, and in particular upon those who had opposed the bill in the last session. It was therefore recommended by the minister that the act be disapproved of. Parliament therefore moved, that the expression should be varied to this effect: "Whereas great discontents and disquietudes had from the said act arisen." The consequence of this motion was an abstinence debate, but as it was supported by the Earl of Egmont, and driven other able orators; but Mr. Pelham and Mr. Pitt were numbered among its opponents. The question being put for the proposed alteration, it was of course carried in the negative: the bill, after the third reading, passed senate contrádictórem, and in due time obtained the royal assent.

§ 6. Even this concession of the ministry did not allay the discontents of the non-juring faction, or prevent the encroachment from the Jews. Another act still subsisted, by virtue of which any person professing the Jewish religion might become a free denizen of Great Britain, after having resided seven years in any of his majesty's colonies in America. In Mr. Pelham's opinion, this was a measure, which was the more dangerous tendency, of which the other was now in a fair way of being convicted. It was moved, therefore, in the lower House, that part of this former act might be read; then the same member made a motion for an address to his majesty, desiring that the House might have the perusal of the lists transmitted from the American colonies to the commissioners for trade and plantations, containing the names of those who were already entitled to claim the benefit of the said act, since the year one thousand seven hundred and forty. These lists were accordingly presented, and left upon the table for the perusal of the members; and this act contained no limitation of time within which the benefit of it should be claimed, and as this claim was attended with a good deal of trouble and some expense, very few persons had availed themselves of it in that period. It was observed, as a great number who were already entitled to claim this indulgence, and as it remained an open channel through which Great Britain might be deluged with those people, all of whom the law would hold as foreigners, from all the restrictions contained in the act with respect to naturalized foreigners, Lord Harley moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the said act as related to persons professing the Jewish religion, who should come to settle in any British colony after a certain time. The motion was seconded by Sir James Dashwood, and supported by the Earl of Egmont; but being found unequal to the interest and eloquence of Mr. Pelham and Mr. Pitt, was rejected by the majority.

and company, were submitted to the perusal of the members. The bill was by many considered as a dangerous extension of military power, to the prejudice of the civil rights enjoyed by British subjects, and as such violently contested by the Earl of Egmont, Lord Strange, and Mr. Andros, who was supported by the solicitor-general and Mr. Yorke. The bill, after some warm debates, being espoused by the ministry, was enacted into a law, and despatched to the East Indies by the minister's own orders.

§ XII. Some other motions were made, and petitions presented on different subjects, which, as they miscarried, will be unnecessary to particularize. It may not be amiss, however, to mention the difficulty, to which the Commons were subjected, in the person of a member belonging to a public office, whom they detected in the practice of fraud and imposition. Notwithstanding the particular care taken in the last session, to prevent the monopolizing of tickets in the state lottery, all those precautions had been eluded by a scandalous manner by certain individuals, intrusted with the charge of delivering the tickets to the contributors, according to the intent of the act, which expressly declared that tickets would not be sold to any one, if not in the public lottery. Instead of conforming to these directions of the legislature, they and their friends engrossed great numbers, sheltering themselves under a false list of legged names for the purpose of perpetuating the equitable intention of the Commons; but in some measure injured the public credit; insomuch as their avarice had prompted them to subscribe for a greater number than they had cash to purchase, so that there was a deficiency in the first payment, which might have had a bad effect on the public affairs. These practices were so flagrant and notorious as to attract the notice of the House, where an inquiry was begun, and prosecuted with a spirit of real patriotism, in opposition to a scandalous cabal, who endeavored with equal eagerness and perseverance to screen the delinquents. All their efforts, however, proved abortive; and a committee, appointed to examine particulars, agreed on the several resolutions against one L—, who had amassed a large fortune by this and other kinds of peculation. They voted him guilty of a breach of trust, and a direct violation of the lottery act; and an address was presented to his majesty, desiring he might be prosecuted by the attorney-general for these offences. He was accordingly sued in the court of king's bench, and paid a fine of one thousand pounds, for having committed frauds by which he had gained forty times that he had paid; and his sentence was as remarkably denominated the censure of that tribunal.

§ XIII. The session ended in the beginning of April, when the king gave the parliament to understand that be would not sign any of the bills then under his consideration, because he was sure of their fixed resolution to exert his whole power in maintaining the general tranquillity, and adhering to such measures for that purpose as he had hitherto pursued in conjunction with his council. He in very affectionate terms thanked both Houses for the repeated proofs they had given of their zealous attachment and loyalty to his person and government. He enumerated the salutary measures they had taken for lessening the national debt, and augmenting the public credit, extending navigation and commerce, reforming the morals of the people, and improving the regulations of civil economy. He concluded with declaring, that he securely relied upon the loyalty and good affection of his people, and had no other aim than their permanent happiness. In a little time after the close of this session they were dissolved by proclamation, and new writs issued by the lord chancellor for convoking a new parliament. The same ceremonies were practiced with respect to the convocations of Canterbury and York; though they no longer retained their former importance; nor, indeed, were they suffered to sit and deliberate upon the subjects which formerly fell under their cogitation and discussion.

§ XIV. In the beginning of March, the ministry of Great Britain had been left without a head by the death of Mr. Pelham, which was not only sincerely lamented by his colleagues, but by all his other friends, whose affection he had powerfully recommended himself by the candour and humanity of his conduct and character, even while he was pursued with measures which they did not entirely approve. The loss of such a minister was the more deeply felt by the government at this juncture, being the eve of a general election for a new parliament, when every administration was exposed to the full reed of the opposition, which had redoubled its vigilance and circumspection. He had already concurred the measures for securing a majority, and his plan was faithfully executed by his friends and adherents, who still urged the administration.

The Duke of Newcastle, was appointed first lord commissioner of the treasury, and succeeded as secretary of state by Sir Thomas Robinson, who had long resided as ambassador at the court of Vienna. The other department of the business was still retained by the Earl of Holderness; and the function of chancellor of the exchequer was performed as usual by the lord chief justice of the king's bench, until a proper person could be found to fill the important office; but in the course of the summer it was bestowed upon Mr. Legge, who acquitted himself with equal honour and capacity.

Divers other alterations were made, of less importance to the public, Sir George Littleton was appointed to the see of Rochester, and the Earl of Hillsborough, comptroller of the household. Mr. George Grenville, brother to Earl Temple, became treasurer of the navy; and Mr. Charles Townshend, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel, took place as a commissioner of the customs, and of the revenue, in the room of Lord Harrington, made master of the wardrobe. Lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was promoted to the dignity of an Earl. The place of lord chief justice of the king's bench, becoming vacant by the death of Sir William Lee, was filled by Sir Dudley Ryder, and he was succeeded by Mr. Murray to the office of attorney-general.

§ XV. The elections for the new parliament generally succeeded according to the wish of the nursery. The opposition was now dwindled down to the lowest state of imbecility. It had received a mortal wound by the death of the late Prince of Wales, whose adherents were too wise to pursue any further efforts, without the prospect of success or advantage. Some of them had prudently sung their palinode to the ministry, and been gratified with profitable employments; while others, setting too great a price upon their own importance, kept aloof till the market was over, and were left to pant in secret over their disappointed ambition. The maxims of toymanship had been relinquished by many, as the barren principles of a losing game; the body of the people were concluded to the established government; but those whose interest it was, for the first time, subsisted among all the branches of the royal family, had a wonderful effect in acquiring a degree of popularity which they had never before enjoyed. The sessions of parliament, that year particularly, were put to the last day of May, by the Duke of Cumberland, and some other peers, who acted by virtue of a commission from his majesty. The Commons having chosen for their speaker the Right Hon. Arthur Ouslow, who had honourably filled that high office in four preceding parliaments, he was presented and approved by the commissioners. Then the lord high chancellor harangued both Houses, giving them to understand, that his majesty had indulged them with this early opportunity of coming together, in order to complete without loss of time certain parliamentary proceedings which he judged would be for the satisfaction of his good subjects: but he did not think proper to lay before them any points of general business, reserving every thing of that nature to the usual time of their assembling in the winter. On the fifth day of June this short session was closed, and the parliament prorogued by the lords commissarii.

§ XVI. In the beginning of this year violent disputes arose between the government and the House of Commons in Ireland, on the almost forgotten subjects of privilege and prerogative. The Commons conceived they had an undoubted right to imply the surplus of their revenue towards national purposes, without the consent of their sovereign; and, accordingly, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, prepared a bill with this preamble: "Whereas, on a certain late occasion, last a considerable chance remained in the hands of the vice-treasurers..." in your majesty's treasury as should be necessary to be applied to the discharge of the national debt, or such part thereof as should be thought expedient by parliament.

This then being the crisis, which was to determine a constitutional point of such importance, namely, whether the people in parliament assembled had a right to deliberate upon and vote the application of any part of the unappropriated revenue, without the previous consent of the crown; those who were the most seriously attached to the moderate and liberal doctrine, considering it as essential to their maintaining the character of opposition what they conceived to be a violation of those liberties; and the bill, with its alterations, was rejected by a majority of five voices. The success of their endeavor was still further crowned with the most extravagant representation, as a triumph of patriotism over the arts of ministerial corruption: and, on the other hand, all the servants of the crown, who had joined the popular cry on this occasion, were in a great time dismissed from their employments.

The rejection of the bill was a great disappointment to the creditors of the public, and the circulation of cash was almost stagnated. These calamities were imputed to arbitrary designs in the government; and the people began to be inflamed with an enthusiastic spirit of independency, which might have produced mischievous effects, had not ardent steps been taken to bring over the demagogues, and convert thetifious division of the realm into one solid body of virtue, by insinuating to those very individuals who had been the idols of popular veneration.

The speaker of the House of Commons was promoted to the dignity of an earl; and some other patriots were gratified with lucrative employments. His majesty's letter arrived from London at the close of the session, and intimated that, to the sum of five hundred thousand pounds of the national debt the circulation was thus animsted, and the resentment of the populace subsiding, the kingdom retrieved its former tranquility.

§ XVII. The ambition and intrigues of the French court, by which the British interest was invaded and disturbed on the continent of America, had also extended itself for its plundering purposes to the British colonies in the West Indies. In particular, the English company with divers nabobs, or princes, who governed different parts of the peninsula in Ganges. That the reader may have a clear and distinct idea of these transactions, we shall exhibit a short sketch of the English forts and settlements in that remote country.

The first of these shall be mentioned is Surat, in the province so called, situated between the twenty-first and twenty-second degrees of north latitude; from hence the peninsula ranges into the east, with the latitude of eight north, ending in a point at Cape Comoren, which is the southern extremity. To the northward this peninsula joins to Indostan, and at its greatest breadth extends to the longitude of India, but towards the west it is more confined; and south it is washed by the sea. It comprehends the kingdoms of Malabar, Decan, Golconda, and Bijapur, with the principalities of Ging, Tanguor, and Madius. The western side is distinguished by the name of the Malabar coast; the eastern takes the denomination of Coromandel; and, in different parts of this long sweep, from Surat round Cape Comoren to the bottom of the bay of Bengal, the English and other European powers have, with the consent of the Mogul, established forts and trading settlements. All these kingdoms, properly speaking, belong to the Mogul; but his power was so weakened by the last invasion of Kuehi Khan, that he has not been able to assert his authority over the western districts of his dominions, of which, and even the nabobs, who were originally governors appointed under their authority, have rendered themselves independent, and exert an absolute dominion over their respective territories, without acknowledging his superiority either by tribute or homage. These princes, when they quarrel among themselves, naturally have recourse to the assistance of such European powers as are settled on or near their dominions, the British em-which happen to be at war with each other, never fail to interest the nabobs in the dispute.

§ XVIII. The next English settlement on Surat, on the coast of the peninsula, is Bombay, in the kingdom of Deccan, a small island, with a very convenient harbour, about five-and-forty leagues to the south of Surat. The town is very populous: but the soil is barren, and the climate unhealthy; and the commerce was rendered very precarious by the frequent change of the latter. Many of the English, until his port of Giria was taken, and his fortifications demolished. The English company likewise carry on some trade at Dabol, about forty leagues further to the south, in the province of Cuncun. In the same southerly progression, towards the point of the peninsula, we arrive at Carwar, in the latitude of fifteen degrees, where there is a small fort and factory, belonging to the company, standing on the south side of a bay, with a river, capable of receiving ships of pretty large burden. The climate here is remarkably salubrious; the country abounds with provisions of all sorts, and the best pepper of India grows in this neighbourhood. The next English settlement we find at Tiltcherry, where the company has erected a fort, to defend their commerce of pepper and cardamoms from the insults of the rajah, who governs this port of Malabar. Iither the English trade was removed from this place to another, a company maintaining a factory fifteen leagues to the southward of Tiltcherry, and as was well frequented as any port on the coast of the Indian peninsula. The most southerly settlement which the English possess on the Malabar coast is called Malacca, and the Chittagong, in the eleventh and ninth degrees of latitude. It is defended by a regular fort, situated on a broad river, which falls into the sea, and would be very commodious for trade, were not the water on the bar too shallow to admit ships of considerable burden. Then turning the cape, and passing through the strait of Chilao, formed by the island of Ceylon, we arrive on the coast of Coromandel, which forms the eastern side of the isthmus. Prospecting our course in the northern part of the island, we come to the trade of Fort St. David's, formerly called Topganat, situated in the latitude of eleven degrees forty minutes north, within the kingdom of Ging. It was about six-and-twenty years ago sold by a Mahatta prince to the East India company, and, next to Bombay, is the most considerable settlement we have yet mentioned. Its territory extends about eight miles along the coast, and half that space up the country, which is delightfully watered by a variety of rivers: its soil is fertile and the climate healthy. The fort is regular, well provided with cannon, ammunition, and a numerous garrison, which is more necessary, on account of the near approach of the ports of Coromandel and Pondicherry. But the chief settlement belongs to the trade; on this coast is that of Madras, or Fort St. George, standing farther to the northward, between the thirteenth and fourth degrees of latitude, and not a great way from the diamond mines of Golconda. It is seated on a flat, barren, scorching sand, so near the sea, that in bad weather the walls are endangered by the mighty surges rolled in from the ocean. As the soil is barren, the climate is so intensely hot, that it would be altogether uninhabitable, were not the heat mitigated by the sea breezes. On the land side it is defended by a salt-water river, which, while it contributes to the security of the place, robs the inhabitants of one of their great enjoyments, by obstructing the springs of fresh water. The fort is a regular square, the town surrounded with walls well mounted with artillery, and the place, including the Black Town, is very populous. Madras, with several villages in the neighbourhood, was purchased by the King of Golconda, before the Mogul became sovereign of this country. The governor of this place is not only president of Fort St. George, but also of all the other settlements on the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel; and the civil and military personages, being in the same hands, having inferior judges, who pass sentence of death occasionally on males of any nation, except the subjects of Great Britain. All the company's affairs are directed from him a reining officer in the East India Company's power of inflicting corporal punishment, short of life and member, upon such Europeans as are in the service, and dispose of all places of trust and profit. By virtue of an act passed in the course of this very session, the military officers belonging to the company were permitted to hold courts-martial, and punish their soldiers according to the degree of their delinquency. In a word, Madras is of the utmost importance to the company for its strength, wealth, and the great returns it makes in calicoes and muslins. Towards the latter period of the last century, another company had a flourishing factory at Masulipatam, standing on the north side of the river Nagundi, which separates the provinces of Golconda and Bissagar, in the latitude of sixteen degrees and thirty minutes; but now there is no European settlement here, except a Dutch factory, maintained for carrying on the chintz commerce. At Vizagapatam, situated still further to the northward, the English possess a factory, regularly fortified, on the side of a river, which, however, a dangerous bar has rendered unfit for navigation. The adjacent country affords cotton cloths, and the best striped muslins of India. It is chiefly for the use of this settlement that the company maintains a factory at Cachrar, the most eastern town in the province or kingdom of Golconda, situated in a country abounding with rice and sugar canes. Still further to the north coast, in the latitude of twenty-two degrees, the English possess a factory at Balacana, called formerly very considerable; but hath been of very little consequence since the navigation of the river Hugely was improved. At this place every European ship bound for Bengal takes in a cargo of sugar, the produce of this country, and the English regularly build on the spot a factory, erected with a certain number of soldiers. The adjacent country is fruitful to admiration, and here are considerable manufactures of cotton and silk. Without skilful pilots, the English would find it very difficult to navigate the different channels through which the river Ganges discharges itself into the sea at the bottom of the bay of Bengal. On the southern branch of this river, close to Cachnar, there is a factory maintained by the company of the William, which is a regular fortification, containing lodgings for the factors and writers, store-houses for the company's merchandise, and magazines for their ammunition. As for the governor's house, which likewise stands within the fort, it is one of the most regular structures in all India. Besides these settlements along the sea-coast of the peninsula, and on the banks of the Ganges, the English as a factory company have several small inland factories as posts for the convenience and defence of their commerce, either purchased of the nabobs and rajahs, or conquered in the course of the war. As the operations we propose to record were confined to the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, and the interior countries which form the peninsula in the Ganges, it will be unnecessary to describe the factory at Buneoden, on the island of Simatra, or any settlement which the English possess in other parts of the East Indies.

fulfilled in the sequel. Thus reinforced and joined by one Chunda Sahl, an active Indian chief, he took the field against his kinsman Nazirzing, who was supported by a body of English troops under Colonel Lawrence. The French, dreading an engagement, retired in the night; and Muzafzerzing, seeing himself abandoned by all his own troops, appealed to the clemency of his cousin, who, sped on by his French auxiliaries, and detained him as a hostage. In this situation he formed a conspiracy against his kinsman's life with Nazirzing's prime minister, and the Nabobs of Cadugab and Condenane, then in his camp; and the conspirators were encouraged in the enterprise by Duplex and Chunda Sah, who had retired to Pondicherry. Thus stimulated, they murdered Nazirzing in his camp, and proclaimed Muzafzerzing Viceroy of Decan. In the tents of the murdered viceroy they found an immense treasure, of which a great share fell to M. Duplex, whom Muzafzerzing appointed Chunda Sah Nabob of Arcot; Anaverdy Khan, the late nabob, had been, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, defeated and slain by Muzafzerzing and Chunda Sah, with the assistance of their French auxiliaries and Arjaw. Ali Khan had put himself under the protection of the English at Madras, and was confirmed by Nazirzing, as his father's successor in the nabobship, or government of Arcot, by a letter of appointment, therefore, to the English. Ali Khan, appointed by the legal Viceroy Nazirzing, supported by the English company, and Chunda Sah, nominated by the usurper Muzafzerzing, and Ressenhetz a Dyspert, who commanded at Pondicherry, Muzafzerzing did not long survive his usurpation. In the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one, the same nabobs who had promoted him to his kinsman's place, having been rendered ill rewarded for their services, fell upon him suddenly, routed his troops, and put him to death; and next day the chiefs of the army proclaimed Salabatzeh, brother to Nazirzing, Viceroy of Decan: on the other hand, the Mogul appointed Grazdez Khan, who was the elder brother of Salabatzeh; and this prince confirmed Mahommeh Ali Khan in the government of Arcot: but the affairs of the Mogul's court were then in such confusion, that he could not spare an army to support the prince, and the Mogul had made Chunda Sah Nabob of Arcot, having been deposed by the Great Mogul, who placed Anaverdy Khan in his room, he resolved to recover his government by force, and had recourse to the French general Muzafzerzing, who relieved him with twenty thousand sepoys, or soldiers of the country, sixty caffires, and four hundred and twenty French troops, an condition that, if he proved successful in his enterprise, he should cede the town of Vellore, and the neighborhood of Pondicherry, with its dependencies, consisting of forty-five villages. Thus reinforced, he defeated his rival Anaverdy Khan, who lost his life in the engagement, re-established the government of Arcot, and punctually performed the conditions which had been stipulated by his French allies.

§ XX. Mahommeh Ali Khan, at the death of his father, had fled to Timinsopallil, and solicited the assistance of the English, who supported him with a reinforcement of money, men, and ammunition, under the conduct of Major Lawrence, a brave and experienced officer. By dint of this supply he gained some advantages over the enemy, who were obliged to retreat; but no decisive blow was given. Mahommeh afterwards repaired in person to Fort St. David's to demand more powerful succours, alleging that his fate was connected with the interest of the English commerce, which would be endangered by his downfall. Upon these representations, he received another strong reinforcement under the command of Captain Cooper, but nothing of importance was attempted, and the English auxiliaries retired. Then Mahommeh was attacked by the enemy, who obtained a complete victory over him. Finding it impossible to maintain his footing by his own strength, he entered into a close alliance with the English, and ceded to them some commercial points, which had been long in dispute. Then they detached Captain Cope to put Timinsopallil in a posture of defence; while Captain de Genges, a Swiss officer, who had been promised by the English the nabob's assistance, The two armies being pretty equal in strength, lay encamped in sight of each other a whole month; during which nothing happened but a few engagements. At length they sent the nabob's son, with the English auxiliaries. In order to make a diversion, and divide the French forces, the company resolved to send a detachment into the province of Arcot; and this was one of the most extraordinary, as well as the most important, services of Mr. Clive were displayed. He had entered into the service of the East India company as a writer, and was considered as a person very indifferently qualified for succeeding in any civil station of life. He now offered his services in a military capacity, and actually began his march to Arcot, at the head of two hundred and ten Europeans with five hundred sepoys.⁴

§ XXI. Such was the resolution, secrecy, and despatch with which Mr. Clive acted, that it is said the enemy knew nothing of his motions until he was in possession of the capital, which he took without opposition. The inhabitants, expecting to be plundered, offered him a large sum of money to the English, as a guarantee of peace, and from the generosity and discretion of the conqueror. He refused the proffered ransom, and issued a proclamation, intimating, that those who were willing to remain in their houses, would be treated with lenity; and that the rest have leave to retire with all their effects except provisions, for which he promised to pay the full value. By this sige conduct he concluded the affections of the people, and obtained the surrender of the capital, which he had supplied him with exact intelligence of the enemy's designs, when he was besieged in the sequel. The town was in a little time invested by Raja Sahib, son of Chunda Sah, who invested the city and the openings of the siege were conducted by European engineers. Though their approaches were retarded by the repeated and resolute sallies of Mr. Clive, they at length effected two breaches supposed to be practicable; and on the fourteenth day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one, gave a general assault. Mr. Clive, having received intimation of their design, had made such preparations for their reception that they were repulsed in every place with irresistible impetuosity; and after an obstinate dispute, obtained a complete victory at a very small expense. The forts of Timins, Caujerem, and Aranu, surrendered to the terror of his name, rather than to the force of his arms; and he returned to Fort St. David's in triumph.

Mr. Clive had enjoyed a very few weeks of repose, when he was summoned to the field by fresh incursions of the enemy. In the beginning of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two he marched with a small detachment to Madras, where he was joined by a reinforcement from Bengal, the whole number not exceeding three hundred Europeans, and assembled a body of the natives, that he might have at least the appearance of an army. With these advantages he marched to Arcot, where he found the French and Indians, consisting of fifteen hundred sepoys, seventeen hundred horse, a body of natives, and one hundred and fifty Europeans, with eight pieces of cannon. Though they were vigorously posted and entrenched, and the day was already far advanced, Mr. Clive advanced against them with his usual intrepidity; but the victory remained for some time in suspense. It was now dark, and the battle doubtful, when Mr. Clive sent round a detachment to fall in the rear of the French battery. This attack was executed with great resolution, while the English in front entered the lists against the French from the hands of their officers. With little tincture with discipline, displayed the spirit and activity of hardy veterans. This double attack disconcerted the enemy in such a manner, that they soon desisted from all opposition. A considerable cannon ceased; yet the French did not flinch. On the contrary, they saved themselves by flight, under cover of the darkness. The French, to a man, threw down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war; and all the cannon and baggage fell into the hands of the victors.

§ XXIII. The province of Arcot being thus cleared of the enemy, Mr. Clive with his forces returned to Fort St. David's, where he found Major Laurence just arrived from England, to take upon him the command of the troops in the company's service. On the eighteenth day of March this officer, accompanied by Mr. Clive, took the field, and was joined by Captain de Gimigny at Tiruchirapally. From hence he detached Mr. Clive with four hundred European soldiers, a few Madras horse, and a body of sepoys, to cut off the enemy's retreat to Pondicherry. In the course of this expedition he disposed a strong body of the foe posted at Sussamareen, and obliged Chunda Saib to throw back the cannon, and fall into the pandaga, upon the river Koleeron, which was immediately invested. The commanding officer, in attempting to escape, was slain with some others, and the rest surrendered at discretion. They were still in possession of another fortified temple, which he also besieged in form, and reduced by capitulation. Having subdued these forts, he marched directly to Velloonda, whether he understood the French commander D'Anuelt had retired. He found that officer intrenched in a village, from whence he drew him with precipitation, and made himself master of the French cannon. The enemy attempted to save themselves in the neighbouring fort; but the gates being shut against them by the governor, who was apprehensive that they would be followed pelt-mell by the English, Mr. Clive attacked them with great fury, and made a considerable slaughter; but his humanity being shocked at this carnage, he sent a flag of truce to the vanquished, with terms of capitulation, which they readily embraced. These articles imported, that D'Anuelt, and three other officers, should remain prisoners on parole for one year, that the garrison should not be molested, none of them should be delivered to the nabob whom the English supported.

§ XXIV. During these operations Chunda Saib lay encamped with an army of thirty thousand men at Srin- ham, at a considerable distance from the English, which he longed eagerly to possess. Hither Major Laurence marched with his Indian allies, and took his measures so well, that the enemy's prevarications were entirely interrupted. Chunda Saib, in attempting to fly, was taken prisoner by the Nubob of Tanjore, an ally of the English company, who ordered his head to be struck off, in order to prevent the disputes which otherwise would have arisen among the captors. The main body of the army being attacked by Major Lawrence, and totally defeated, the island of Srinham was surrendered, and about a thousand European French soldiers, under the command of Mr. Law, nephew to the famous Law who schemed the Missis- sippian expedition, were taken prisoners, including thirty officers, with forty pieces of cannon, and ten mortars. M. Duplex, though exceedingly mortified by this disaster, resolved to maintain the cause which he had espoused, by running to his felicity. He induced Isph Saib, the son of Chunda Saib, Naloy of Arcot; and afterwards pretended that he himself had received from the Mogul some commissions, or appointing him governor of all the Carnatic, from

The river Krishnâ, to the sea; but these sounds appeared in the sequel to be forged. In order to complete the comedy, the supposed messenger who had delivered the letter from the Mogul, mounted on an elephant, preceded by mosque and dancing women, in the oriental manner, received in public his commission from the French government. He affected the eastern state, kept his dagger or court, where he appeared sitting cross-legged on a sofa, and received presents as prince of the country from his own council, as well as from the natives. In the meantime, hostilities continued between the two companies, of which the sequel belonged to the contesting nabobs. The English, under Major Kin- ner, made an unsuccessful attempt upon Ginge, a strong town situated to the west of Pondicherry. Major Laurence defeated a strong body of French and natives, commanded by Duplex's nephew, M. de Kerjean, in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, and took him prisoner, together with fifteen officers: after this success, Mr. Clive reduced the forts of Covelong and Chendraput, the last very strong, situated about forty miles to the southward of Madras. On the other hand, M. Duplex intercepted at sea Captain Schaub, with his whole Swiss company, whom he detained prisoners at Pondicherry, although the two nations were not at war. During these transactions Seringapatam, with a body of French under M. D. Bussy, advanced towards Aureangabad, which was the seat of government; but he was opposed by a chief of the Mahattas, at the head of a numerous band of horse. In the meanwhile, M. Khan, the elder brother of Sallatizing, whom the Mogul had appointed Viceroy of Decan, took possession of his government at Aureangabad, where, in fourteen days after his arrival, he was poisoned by his own uncle. The Mogul immediately appointed his son Shaik Aliako Khan to succeed his father; and this prince actually raised an army to come and take possession; but the Mogul's affairs re- mained in a state of confusion, and he was obliged to postpone his design, so that Sallatizing was left without a competitor, and made a present to the French of all the English settlements to the northward. Thus concluded the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-two. Next campa- ghn was chiefly confided to the neighbourhood of Trichin- nopoly, where Major Laurence made several vigorous attacks upon the enemy's army, and obtained many advan- tages, which, however, did not prove decisive, because he was so much out-numbered that he could never follow his blow.

§ XXV. In the course of this year, the Mogul was de- posed by his general Shaik Aliako Khan, the Viceroy of Decan, who raised another army, and threatened to become the prince of the blood. In the succeeding year, a negotiation was set on foot by Mr. Saunders, Governor of Madras, and M. Duplex; and conferences were opened at Sidras, a native town between Pondicherry and Fort George; but this proved abortive: and many other callant efforts were made by Major Laurence in the territory of Trichinopoly, which still continued to be the scene of action. In the course of this year Admiral Watson arrived on the coast of Coromandel with a squadron of ships of war, having on board a regiment commanded by Colonel Alderson: at the same time the ships from France brought over to Pon- dicherry the Sieur Godette, commissary-general and govern- or-general of all their settlements, at whose arrival Du- plex departed for Europe. The new governor immediately wrote a letter to Mr. Saunders, professing the most general incitements, and proposing a suspension of arms between the two companies till their disputes should be adjusted. This proposal was very agreeable to the govern- or and council at Madras; and a cessation of arms actually took place in the month of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four. Deputies being sent to Pondicherry, a provisional treaty and truce were De- clared, on condition that neither of the two companies should for the future interfere in any difference that might arise between the princes of the country. The other articles related to the places and settlements that should be removed or possessed by the respective companies, until fresh orders relating to this agreement should arrive from the courts of London and Versailles, transmitted by the two East India companies of France and England. Until such orders as should remain on the sea, the French should be allowed to procure any new grant or cession, or to build forts for the defence of new establishments; and that they should not proceed to any cession, retrocession, or evacuation of what they then possessed; but should be allowed to remain on the shores of the deits. How pacific soever the sentiments of the French subjects might have been at this period in the East Indies, certain it is, the designs of the French governors in America were now becoming more evident. The island of Illawara, the settlement of Canadas, and the Mequon island, were defended towards a rupture, which kindled up a bloody war in every division of the globe.

§ XXVI. As this war may be termed a native of America, and the principal scenes of it were acted on that continent, we shall, for the information of the reader, sketch out the situation of the then British colonies as they bordered on other, and extended along the sea-coast, from the gulf of St. Lawrence as far south as the coast of Florida. We shall enumerate the Indian nations that lie scattered about their confines, and delineate the manner in which the French hence made them in by a surprising line of fortifications. Should we comprehend Hudson's Bay, with the adjacent countries, and the coast of Newfoundland, in this geographical detail, we must affirm that Great Britain at that time possessed a territory along the sea-coast, extending seventeen hundred miles in a direct line, from the Bay of St. Lawrence to the mouth of the river Ohio; but as these two countries were not concerned in this dispute, we shall advance from the northward to the southern side of the gulf of St. Lawrence; and beginning with Acadia or Nova Scotia, describe our settlements as they lie in a southerly direction, as far as the gulf of Florida. This great tract of country, stretching fifteen degrees of latitude, is washed on the east by the Atlantic Ocean: the southerly limits of it may be said to extend throughout five hundred miles, from the mouth of the Ohio to the coast of Louisiana; but to the westward the limits are uncertain, some affirming that the jurisdiction of the colonies penetrates through the whole continent, as far as the South sea; while others with more moderation, think they are naturally bounded by the river Illinois that rises into the Mississippi, and in a manner connects that river with the chain of lakes known by the names of Michigan, Huron, Erie, and Ontario, the three first communicating with each other, and the last discharging its waters into the gulf of St. Lawrence, which running from Montreal and Quebec issues into the bay of the same denomination, forming the northern boundary of Nova Scotia. The French, who had no legal claim to any lands on the south side of this tract, nevertheless, had the ambition peculiar to themselves, not only extended their forts from the source of St. Lawrence, through an immense tract of that country, as far as the Mississippi, which is numerous itself into the gulf of Florida; but also by a series of unparalleled encroachments, endeavoured to contract the English colonies within such narrow limits as would have cut off almost one half of their possessions. As we have already given a geographical description of Nova Scotia, and mentioned the particulars of the new settlement of Halifax, we shall now only observe, that it is surrounded on three sides by the sea, the gulf, and river of St. Lawrence; that its original boundary to the west was the river Chebeague; but it is now contracted within the river St. Croix, because the crown of Great Britain did, in the year one thousand six hundred and sixty-three, grant to the Duke of York the territory of Ansgadack, situated on the mouth of this latter river. This provided by the name; which was in the sequel, by an express charter from the crown, annexed to the province of Massachusetts's-bay, one of the four governments of New England. This country, situation near the sea, was possessed by the respective companies, until fresh orders relating to this agreement should arrive from the courts of London and Versailles, transmitted by the two East India companies of France and England. Until such orders should remain on the sea, the French should be allowed to procure any new grant or cession, or to build forts for the defence of new establishments; and that they should not proceed to any cession, retrocession, or evacuation of what they then possessed; but should be allowed to remain on the shores of the deits. How pacific soever the sentiments of the French subjects might have been at this period in the East Indies, certain it is, the designs of the French governors in America were now becoming more evident. The island of Illawara, the settlement of Canadas, and the Mequon island, were defended towards a rupture, which kindled up a bloody war in every division of the globe.

§ XXVII. New England is composed of the four provinces known by the names of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, and bounded on the south by New York, extending northerly on both sides of the river Hudson, about two hundred miles into the country possessed by the Indians of the five nations, whom the French distinguish by the name of the Iroquois; but in this province this does not exceed fifty miles, though it comprehends Long-island, lying to the southward of Connecticut. The capital, which derives from the province the name of New York, is situated on an excellent harbour in the island of Manhattan, extending fourteen miles in length, and five in breadth, at the mouth of the noble river Hudson, which is navigable for above six hundred miles. Amsterdam, at a distance of fifty miles from New York stands the town of Albany up the same river. In this place all the treaties and other transactions were negotiated between the English and the Iroquois, a confederacy of five Indian nations, and to which they admitted the one thousand warriors, and some others, whom the English drove from the confines of Carolina. The Mohock Indians inhabit the country advanced from Albany. The northern extremities of New Hampshire and New York are divided by the lakes Champlain and Sacrament, between which the French had raised the fort of Crown Point.

§ XXVIII. Contiguous to New York, and lying along the coast, in a southerly direction, is the small province of New Jersey, which is divided from Pennsylvania, about one hundred and fifty miles in length, but in breadth not more than one third of that extent. The climate, soil, and productions of this province are similar to those of New England, tho' not in so great extent; they yield great quantities of grain, sheep, horses, hogs, and horned cattle; all kinds of poultry and game in great abundance; vegetables of every sort in perfection, and excellent fruit, particularly peaches and melons. Their vast forests abound with oak, ash, beech, chestnut, cedar, walnut-tree, cypress, hickory, sassafras, and pine; but the timber is not counted so fit for shipping as that of New England and Nova Scotia. These provinces produce great quantities of flax and hemp. New England exports mines of iron, and very rich copper ore is found in New Jersey.

§ XXIX. Pennsylvania, lying to the southward of New York and New Jersey, is bounded on the other side by Maryland, stretching two hundred and fifty miles in length, two hundred in breadth, and having no communication with the sea, except by the mouth of the river Delaware. This province is named in honor of the Gracious Signer of the celebrated William Penn, whose descend- ants are still proprietaries of the country. Philadelphia, the capital, stands on a tongue of land, at the confluence of the two rivers Delaware and Schuylkill, and is disposed in the form of a regular oblong, and designed by the original plan to extend from the one to the other. The streets, which are broad, spacious, and uniform, cross each other at right angles, leaving proper spaces for churches, markets, and other public edifices. The houses are neatly

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. (A. D. 1754.—Book III.)
The colonists of North Carolina carry on a considerable traffic in tar, pitch, turpentine, staves, shingles, lumber, corn, peas, pork and beef, tobacco, deer-skins, indigo, wheat, rice, bees-wax, tallow, bacon and hogs' lard, cotton, and squares of flax. They also raise another at some distance to the southward of the Riviere-au-Bouf, and made other encroachments on this colony.

The XIX. Adjoining to part of Pennsylvania, on the sea-coast, lies the province of Maryland, a tract of land situated along the bay of Chesapeake, in length about one hundred and forty miles, and nearly of the same breadth, bounded on the north by Pennsylvania, on the east by the Atlantic ocean, and on the west by the Bay of Chesapeake. This country was first planted with Roman cathedrals by Lord Baltimore, to whom Charles II. granted it by patent. In the sequel, however, people of all religions were admitted into this settlement, and indulged with liberty of conscience, and at present the reigning religion is that of the English church. The climate is very sultry in summer, and not very salubrious. The soil is fruitful, and produces a great quantity of tobacco, which the people cultivate as their staple commodity. The seat of government is established at Annapolis, a small town beautifully situated on the river Patuxent.

The XIXI. Settlement that still farther south, the next settlement is Virginia, watered on the north by the river Pottomack, which is the boundary between this and the colony last described, having the bay of Chesapeake to the east, bounded on the south by Carolina, and extending westward to the fifty-fifth parallel of latitude; the plains have reached no further than the great Alleghany mountains; so that the province as now possessed, stretches in length above two hundred and forty miles, and in breadth not above two hundred, lying between the fifty-fifth and fortieth degrees of latitude. In sailing to Virginia, navigators steer through a strait formed by two points, called the Capes, into the bay of Chesapeake, a large body of water that reaches from the mouth of the Potomack, from south to north, covered from the Atlantic ocean by the eastern side of Maryland, and a small portion of Virginia on the same peninsula. This noble bay is about eighteen miles broad for a considerable space, and seven at its narrowest part, yielding generally nine fathoms depth of water: on both sides it receives many navigable rivers, those on the Virginia side being known by the name of James river, York river, the Rappahanock, and Pottomack river, and stretching gradually towards the sea, lie wide, low and swampy, and the soil is extremely fertile. The air and weather are variable, the storms of winter excessive, the frosts of winter sudden and intensely cold; so that the plants on which they depend are not the most nor healthy, the people being particularly subject to agues and pleurisy disorders. The province abounds with vast forests of timber; the plains are covered with a surprising luxuriance of vegetables, flowers, and flowering shrubs, diffusing the most delicious fragrance. The ground yields plenty of corn, and every sort of fruit in greatest abundance and perfection. Horned cattle and hogs have here multiplied to admittance since those were first imported from Europe. The animals, natives of this and the neighbouring countries, are deer, panthers or tigers, bears, wolves, foxes, squirrels, racoons, and creatures called opossums, with an infinite variety of beautiful birds, and a diversity of fish and game, among which the rattle-snake is the most remarkable.

The XXII. Virginia is bounded to the south by the two Carolinas, situated between the forty-sixth and thirty-first degree of latitude; but as the value sent out of the province of Virginia to foreign countries does not exceed four hundred miles, and the breadth extending near three hundred, as far as the Indian nations called the Catawbas, the Creeks, and Cherokee. The country of Carolina is divided into two governments, of which the northern is the most inconsiderable. The climate in both is the same, as well as the soil; the first is warm, though not unhealthy; the last extremely fertile, yielding every thing in abundance of excellent grains, vegetables, and fruits, the race of oranges, and some commodities which are not found to the northward. North Carolina, though not so opulent, is more populous than the southern part.
within the Indian territories. It was in consequence of the measures here taken, that Colonel Washington was detached from Virginia with four hundred men, and occupied a post on the banks of the river Ohio, where he threw up some works, and erected a kind of occasional fort, in hopes of being able to defend himself in that situation, until he should be joined by a reinforcement from New York. This project, however, did not receive any attention.

§ XXXVI. While he remained in this situation, De Viller, a French commander, at the head of nine hundred men, being on his march to dissolve Washington, detached one James upon the banks of the river Ohio, where he threw up some works and a formal summons to Colonel Washington, requiring him to quit the fort, which he pretended was built on ground belonging to the French or their allies. So little regard was paid to this intimation, that the English fell upon this party, and, as the French affirn, without the least provocation, either slew or took the whole detachment. De Viller, incensed at these unprouoked hostilitys, marched to the attack, which Washington for some time sustained under manifold disadvantages. At length, however, he surrendered the fort upon capitulation, for the performance of which he left two officers as hostages in the hands of the French; and in his retreat was terriified by the flight of them, and his party. Hence it happened to this people. This event was no sooner known in England, than the British ambassador at Paris received directions to complain of it to the French ministry, as an open violation of the peace; but this representation had no effect.

§ XXXVII. Both nations by this time foresaw that a rupture would be inevitable, and each resolved to make suitable preparations. France continued to send reinforcements of men, and supplies of ammunition, to Quebec, for the prosecution of her ambitious projects; and the ministry of Great Britain transmitted salutary cautions to the governors of the provinces of North America, exhorting them to join their endeavours for repelling the incursions of the enemy. Such a union as seemed necessary for their common preservation was not easily effected. The different colonies were divided by different views and interests, both religious and political: besides every settlement was distracted into factions, formed by the governor and the demagogues of the assembly; in other words, an opposition like that in parliament, and a continual struggle between the interests of one province and the prejudices of the proprietor, whether sovereign or subject. Mr. Dinwiddie, Governor of Virginia, having demanded a certain perquisite or fee for every patent he should pass for land, the assembly voted his demand illegal, arbitrary, and oppressive. He declared, that every patentee should be deemed an enemy to his country; and sent over an agent to London, to solicit the suppression of this imposition. The representatives of the people in Pennsylvania, at the same time in vain delibaratins and violent disputes with their proprietors, while the enemy infested their frontiers. The colony of New York was filled with discontent and animosity. Sir Danvers Osborne, who had been appointed governor of this province, died immediately after his arrival at New York, and the instructions he had received were exposed to public censure. The preamble invaded severely against the want of duty, allegiance, loyalty, and unanimity, which had lately appeared so notorious in the assembly of that province, and which had violated the royal commission and instructions, by assuming to themselves the power to dispose of public money in the laws which they had occasionally passed. This gentleman was therefore directed to meet, upon the reformation of all those public abuses, and upon the establishment of a certain supply for the service of the government, as well as upon the settlement of a salary for himself. Moreover, his majesty, in those instructions, signified his will and pleasure, that all money raised for the supply and support of government, or upon any emergency for immediate service, should be disposed and applied properly to the use of which it ought to be granted, to the credit of the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council of the province, and no otherwise: that, nevertheless, the assembly should be permitted, from time to time, to view and examine the accounts of money disposed of, by virtue of laws which they had enacted: that if any member of the council, or officer holding place of trust or profit within the government, should, in any manner whatsoever, give his consent or assent in any case, or concur with the assembly in passing any act or vote, whereby the royal prerogative might be lessened or impaired, or any money be raised or disposed of for the public service, contrary to the directions of the instructions, such act or vote should be void: and if the....
and the archbishop, notwithstanding the king's express declaration to the contrary, still persisting in countermanding the recusant priests, was banished to Conflans-sous-Chaumes.

§ XL. In Spain, the interest of Great Britain was warmly espoused and so powerfully supported by Mr. Walr, who had been resident in England, that the French party, though countenanced by the queen-mother, and sustained with censure by the minister to be arrested and confined, and bestowed upon Mr. Wall the best part of his employments. Nevertheless, the Spaniards in the West Indies continued to oppress the subjects of Great Britain, employed in cutting indigo in the island of Hondur; and representations on this head being made to the court of Madrid, the dispute was amicably adjusted between Mr. Wall and Sir Benjamin Keene, the British ambassador. While the interest of Britain thus triumphed in Spain, it seemed to be given up at the court of Lisbon. His Portuguese majesty had formed vast projects of an active commerce, and even established an East India company; in the meantime he could not help manifesting his disapprobation of the scheme, by two or three yearly export of his dominions, as the balance due from his subjects on English commodities. In his endeavours to check this traffic, which he deemed so detrimental to his commerce, and this necessity of his British merchants settled at Lisbon; some were imprisoned on frivolous pretences; others deprived of their property, and obliged to quit the kingdom. He insisted upon laying an imposition of two per cent. on all the Portuguese gold that should be exported; but the profits of the trade would not bear such an execution. Meanwhile, there being a scarcity of corn in Portugal, the kingdom was supplied from England; and the people having nothing but gold to purchase their food, the necessity of conviving at the exportation of his coin, and the trade reverted into its former channel.

§ XLI. On the fourteenth day of November, the King of Great Britain opened the session of parliament with a harangue, which intimated nothing of an approaching rupture. He said, that the general state of affairs in Europe had undergone very little alteration since their last meeting; that he had been acquainted with the secret assurances from his good brother the King of Spain of friendship and confidence, which he would cultivate with harmony and good faith. He declared his principal view should be to strengthen the foundation, and secure the defense of his dominions. The advantages of it for promoting the trade of his good subjects, and protecting those possessions which constituted one great source of their wealth and commerce. Finally, he exhorted them to complete their plan for appropriating the forsted estates in the highlands to the service of the public. He probably avoided mentioning the encroachments of France, that he might supply no handle for debates on the address, which was carried in both Houses almost without opposition. The government seemed determined to humble the insolence of the French councils; and this disposition was so agreeable to the people in general, that they granted no expense, and heartily concurred with the decrees of that ministry.

§ XLII. The Commons granted for the service of the ensuing year four millions seventy-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine pounds; one million of that sum expressly given for enabling his majesty to augment his forces by land and sea. Thirty-two thousand pounds were allotted as a subsidy to the King of Poland, and twenty thousand to the Elector of Bavaria. These gratifications, as well as all others that were made, were the best sort of supply; because it was taken for granted, that, in case of a rupture, France would endeavour to avail herself of her superiority by land, in invading his Britannic majesty's General. This was the only reverse in this war; for, besides it to secure the assistance of such allies on the continent. That they prognosticated aright, with respect to the designs of that ambitious power, will soon appear in the course of this history; which will also demonstrate how little dependence is to be placed upon the professions of subordinate princes. The supplies were raised by the standing branches, the excise, the income tax, and a lottery for one million; one hundred thousand pounds of it to be dedicated for the service of the public, and the remaining nine hundred thousand to be charged on the produce of the sinking fund, at the rate of three per cent. per annum on the capital sum; this enacted in January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six. The civil transactions of this session were confined to a few objects. Divers new regulations were made for encouraging and improving the whale and whale-herring fishery, as well as for finishing and putting in a proper state of defence a new fort, lately built at Annapoabo on the coast of Africa.

§ XLI. Mr. Pitt, the paymaster-general of the forces, brought in a bill, which will ever remain a standing monument of his humanity. The poor disabled veterans who enjoyed the pension of Chelsea hospital, were so injudiciously opposed by a set of miscreants, who supplied for them with money and favours, at the most exorbitant of usury, that many of them, with their families, were in danger of starving; and the intention of government in granting such a comfortable subsistence was, in a great part, perverted. Mr. Pitt, perceiving that this sum originally flowed from the delay of the first payment, which the pensioner could not touch till the expiration of a whole year after he had been put upon the list, removed this hardship, by providing, that in the fifth, or half a year's pension should be advanced half a year before it is due; and the practice of usury was effectually prevented by a clause, entitling that all contracts should be void by which any pension might be mortgaged. This humane regulation was unanimously approved, and having passed through both Houses with uncommon expedition, received the royal assent.

§ XLI. Notwithstanding the unanimity manifested by the Commons, in their forwardness to the measures for acting vigorously against the common enemy of the nation, they were remarkably disturbed and divided by a contested election of members for Oxfordshire. In the course of this dispute, the strength and influence of what they called the old and new interest, or, to speak more intelligibly, of the toies and whigs in that county, were fully displayed. The candidates sustained on the shoulders of the old interest, were Lord Vincent Wemman and Sir James Dashwood; their competitors, whom the new interest supported, and of consequence the ministry court-stamped, were Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner. Never was any contention of this kind maintained with more spirit and animosity, or conducted on a grander scale; and even Pitt would have imagined that each side considered it as a dispute which must have determined, whether the nation should enjoy its ancient liberty, or tamely submit to the yoke of corruption. Noblemen and gentlemen, clergy- men and ladies, employed all their talents and industry in canvassing for either side, throughout every township and village in the county. Scandal emblazoned her whole quiver of aspersions, calumnies, and libels; corruption was not remiss in promises and presents; houses of entertainment were opened; and nothing was for some time to be seen but scenes of tumult, riot, and intoxication. The revenue of many an independent prince on the continent would not have been sufficient to afford such sums of money as were expended in the course of this dispute. At length they proceeded to election, and the sheriff made a double return of all the four candidates, so that not one of them could sit, and the county remained without a representative until this ambiguous affair could be decided in the House of Commons. About the middle of November, petitions being presented by the four candidates, as well as by the commonalty of the county, complaining of an undue election, and double return, the matter of these petitions was heard at the bar of the House on the third day of December. The counsel for Lord Vincent and Sir James were heard, and alleged, that they had the majority of votes upon the poll, and this circumstance was admitted by the counsel on the other side; then they proceeded to prove by evidence, that, after closing the poll, the sheriff declared the majority of votes to be in favour of these two candidates, and adjourned the court from the twenty-third day of April, the eighth of May; so that the scrutiny was only demanded, and granted on the behalf of Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner, could not be discussed before the last day in the month, when the writ was returnable; that the scrutiny did not last about the ninth of May, when the disputants were protracted by disputes about the manner in which it should be carried on; that Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner were allowed to object, through the whole poll, to the tenth side, on pretence that the competitors should be permitted to answer these objections, and, in their turn, object through the whole poll to the votes for Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner, who should, in the last place, have leave to answer; that Lord Wemunday and Sir James Dashwood had disapproved of this method, because they apprehended it might induce their competitors to make such a number of frivolous objections, that they should not have time to answer one half of them, much less to make objections on their own, before the writ should be returned; that they foresaw such a number of frivolous objections were made, as engrossed the attention of the court till the twenty-seventh day of May; so that they could not begin to answer any of these objections but the twenty-eighth; and on the thirtieth the sheriff, having closed the scrutiny, made the double return. The proof being exhibited, the counsel insisted, that, as they had exhibited the same on the poll, they demonstrated, that this majority neither was nor could be overthrown by such an unfinished scrutiny, it was immaterial on the other side to proceed upon the merits of the election, by endeavouring to overthrow that majority of which their clients were in possession. A question in the House being cast to the same purpose, Lord Wemunday and Sir James Dashwood objected to five hundred and thirty voters on the other side, whom they proposed to disqualify. Their counsel on the same side, being overruled, the sheriff, in favour of Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner, and to detect these candidates in the practice of bribery, for which purpose they produced a letter in their own handwriting. They afterwards proceeded to disqualify particular voters, and summed up their evidence on the twenty-first day of January. Then the counsel for the other side began to refute the charge of bribery and corruption, and to answer the objections that had been made to particular voters. They produced evidence to prove, that customary freeholders, or customary holders, had voted at elections in the counties of the west of England, Monmouth, Gloucester, Wilt, and Hereford: and the same evidence was given of the sheriff of Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, had been reputed capable of voting, and even voted at elections for that county. In a word, they continued to examine witnesses, argue and refute, until the day came, when, after some warm debates and divisions in the House, Lord Parker and Sir Edward Turner were declared duly elected; and the clerk of the crown was ordered to annul the return, by erasing the names of Lord Wemunday and Sir James Dashwood. Many, who presumed to think for themselves, without recollecting the power and influence of the administration, were astonished at the issue of this dispute; which, however, might have easily been foreseen; inasmuch as, during the course of the proceedings, most, if not all, of the many questions debated in the House were determined by a great majority in favour of the two. A great number of copyholders had been admitted to vote at this election, and the sheriff incurred no censure for allowing them to take the oath appointed by law to be taken by freeholders: nevertheless, the Commons carefully avoided determining the question of whether copyholders possessed all of the yearly value of forty shillings, clear of all deductions, have not a right to vote for knights to represent the shire within which their copyhold estates are situated? This point of the British provinces in America, by authority of the respective governors of those provinces, and the king, who confirmed it; because it became necessary that the majority should be considered more clear and explicit, if possible. Therefore, felt confidence in the advice, it was prepared with a new clause, "that all elections in the king's service, and by the people, shall be subject to the same laws, statutes, and ordinances, and shall be carried on with the same care, diligence, and precision, as if they were elections in the countries of England and Wales; and shall be subject to the same laws, and shall be carried on with the same care, diligence, and precision, as if they were elections in the countries of England and Wales."
Britain, roused by this information, immediately took the most expeditious methods for equipping a squadron; and towards the latter end of April, Admiral Boscaven sailed with a fleet, consisting of twenty-five ships of the line, besides frigates and transports, with a great quantity of warlike stores, and four thousand regular troops, commanded by the Baron Dieskau. Admiral Holbourne was detached with six ships of the line, and one frigate, to re- resumes the watch over the Channel. The whole number of capital ships were put in commission. In the beginning of May, the French fleet, commanded by Mr. Macnamara, an officer of Irish extraction, sailed from Brest, directing his course to North America; but, after having proceeded beyond the chaps of the English Channel, he returned with nine of the capital ships, while the rest of the armament continued their course, under the direction of M. Bois de la Motte.

§ XVII. On the twenty-fifth day of April, the king went to the House of Lords, where, after giving the royal assent to the bills then depending; for granting a certain sum out of the sinking fund, for the relief of insolvent debtors, for the better money necessaries, and for the better raising of marines and seamen, and to several other public and private bills: his majesty put an end to the session of parliament by a speech, in which he acquainted them that if they had not, since his accession, supported the honour, rights, and possessions of his crown, had afforded him the greatest satisfaction: That his desire to preserve the public tranquillity had been sincere and uniform: That he had adhered to the stipulations of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and made it his care not to injure or offend any power whatsoever; but that he never could entertain a thought of purchasing the name of peace at the expense of suffering encroachments upon, or of yielding to the most unjust demands of the powers mostly belonging to Great Britain, either by ancient possession or by solemn treaties: That the vigour and firmness of his parliament, on this important occasion, had enabled him to be prepared for such contingencies as might happen: That, if reasonable and honourable terms of accommodation could be agreed upon, he would be satisfied, and, at all events, rely on the justice of his cause, the effectual support of his people, and the protection of Divine Providence. The parliament was then prorogued to the twenty-seventh of May.

§ I. While Carr was in suspense about the fate of the English and French squadrons, preparations for a vigorous sea war were going forward in England with an unparalleled spirit and success. Still the French court flattered itself that Great Britain, out of the consideration of her dependencies to be exposed to so formidable a force, would abstain from hostilities. Mirepoix continued to have frequent conferences with the British ministry, who made no secret that their admirals, particularly Boscaven, had orders to attack the French ships wherever they should be. On the other hand, M. Macnamara declared, that his master would consider the first gun fired at sea in a hostile manner as a declaration of war. This menace, far from intimidating the English, animated them to the utmost efforts for war. For seven days, the French fleet was carried on with extraordinary vigour in all parts of this kingdom, as well as in Ireland; and great preparations were given not only by the government, but also, over and above his majesty's bounty, by almost all the considerable cities and towns in England, to such as should enlist voluntarily for sailors or soldiers. Other branches of the public service went on with equal alacrity: and such was the eagerness of the people to lend their money to the government, that instead of one million, which was to be raised by way of lottery, three millions eight hundred and eighty thousand pounds were subscribed immediately.

§ II. The situation of affairs requiring his majesty to go to Germany this summer, gave his majesty an opportunity of determining the minds of many, lest the French should either intercept him in his journey, or prevent his return. Earl Paulet had made a motion in the House of Lords, humbly to propose, that it was necessary to espouse the original act of settlement by which the succession of these kingdoms devolved to his electoral house, that the king should not go to his foreign dominions without the consent of parliament; and that this was a principal article in the compact between the crown and the people: that though this article was repealed in the late reign, yet, till of late, it had always been the custom for his majesty to acquaint the parliament with his intention to go, his German dominions, both in regard to the true sense and spirit of the act that placed him on the throne, as well as for the paternal kindness of his royal heart, and the concession he had been so good to show parliament on all occasions; but that his majesty's declaration of his design to visit his electoral states had always come on the last day of a session, when it was too late for the great constitutional council of the crown to offer such advice as might otherwise have been expedient and necessary: that his majesty's leaving his kingdoms in a conjuncture so pregnant with distress, so denunciative of danger, would not only give the greatest advantage to such as might be disposed to stir up defection and division, and subvert the constitutional and national enemies of England: but would also fill his loyal subjects with the most affecting concern, and most gloomy fears, as well for their own safety, as for that of their children, whose invaluable life at all times of the utmost consequence to his people, was then infinitely so, by reason of his great experience, the affection of every one to his royal person, and the majority of the hereditary.
the next day at Helvoetsluis, and arrived at Harwich on the second of May.

§ IV. Admiral Boweswen, with eleven ships of the line and a frigate, having taken on board two regiments at Plymouth, sailed from thence on the twenty-seventh of April for the banks of Newfoundland, and in a few days after his arrival there, the French fleet from Brest came to the southern extremity of that island under command of M. Eon de la Motte. But the thick fogs which prevail upon these coasts, especially at that time of the year, kept the two armaments from seeing each other; and part of the French squadron escaped up the river St. Lawrence, whilst another part was chased and ran aground. But the same return journey through the straits of Belleisle, by a way which was never known to be attempted before ships of the line. However, whilst the English fleet lay off Cape Race, it is the southern extremity of Newfoundland, and was thought to be the most proper situation for intercepting the enemy, two French ships, the Alcide, of sixty-four guns, and four hundred and eighty men, and the Lys pierced for fifty-four guns, but mounting only twenty-two, having eight companies of land forces on board, being separated from the rest of their fleet in the fog, fell in with the Dunkirk, Captain Howe, and the Defence, Captain Andrews, two sixty-gun ships of the line, and a smart engagement which lasted some hours, and in which Captain (afterwards Lord) Howe belied with the greatest skill and intrepidity, were both taken, with several considerable officers and engineers, and about eight thousand pounds in money. The possession of this prize justly increased the confidence of the nation, who now saw plainly that the government was determined to keep no further measures with the French, but justly to repel force by force, and not stop to their sending more men and arms to invade the property of the English in America, as they had hitherto done with impunity. The French, who, for some time, did not even attempt to make reprisals on our shipping, would gladly have chosen to avoid a war at that time, and to have continued extending their encroachments on our settlements till they had executed their grand plan of securing a communication from the Mississippi to Canada, by a line of forts, many of which they had already erected.

§ V. Upon the arrival of the news of this action at Paris, the French ambassador, M. de Mirpoix, was recalled from London, and M. de Bussy from Harwich, was immediately recalled, to attend the King in England in a public character. They complained loudly of Boweswen's attacking the ships, as a breach of national faith; but it was justly retorted on the part of England, that their encroachments in America had rendered reprisals both justifiable and necessary. The resolution of making them was the effect of mature deliberation in the English council. The vast increase of the French marine of late years, which in all probability would soon be employed against Great Britain, occasioned an order for making reprisals general in Europe as well as in America; and that all French ships, whether outward or homeward bound, should be stopped, and brought into British ports. To give the greater weight to these orders, it was resolved to send to those admirals who had distinguished themselves most towards the end of the last year. Accordingly on the twenty-first of July, Sir Edward Hawke sailed on a cruise to the westward, with eighteen ships of the line, a frigate and a sloop; but, not meeting with the French fleet, these ships returned to England about the latter end of September and the beginning of October; on the fourteenth of which last mentioned month in America had rendered reprisals both justifiable and necessary. § VI. While these measures were pursued, for the general security of the British coasts and trade in Europe, several new ships of war were begun, and finished with the utmost expedition, in his majesty's docks: twelve frigates or sloops, contracted for in private yards, were completed by the month of August; and twenty-four ships and twelve colliers were then taken into the service of the government, to be armed with at least twenty guns, and one hundred and twenty men each. In the meantime the French trade was so annoyed by the English cruisers, that before the end of this year three hundred of their merchant ships, many of which, from St. Domingo, laden with sugar, and amounting to a thousand of their sailors, were brought into English ports. By these captures the British ministry answered many purposes; they deserted the French of a great body of seamen, and furnished them with the evidences of the want of which greatly distressed their people and ruined many of their traders. Their outward-bound merchant ships were insured at the rate of thirty per cent whilst the English paid no more than the common insurance. This intolerable burden was felt by all degrees of people amongst them: their ministry was publicly reviled, even by their parliaments; and the French name, from being the terror, began to be a joke. This state of the French navy was also not a little heightened by new broils between their king and the parliament of Paris, occasioned by the obstinacy of the clergy of that kingdom, who seemed determined to support the church, in all events, against the secular power. The observance of the bull Unigenitus, which had long been the occasion of so many dispatches among them. However, the parliament continuing firm, and the French king approving of his minister, the latter was obliged to submit for the present; and in their general assembly this year granted him a free gift of sixteen millions of livres, which he demanded of them—a greater sum than they had ever given before, even in time of peace. If they were prepared to submit for the present; and in their general assembly this year granted him a free gift of sixteen millions of livres, which he demanded of them—a greater sum than they had ever given before, even in time of peace. § VII. In the beginning of this year the assembly of Massachusetts's Bay in New England passed an act, prohibiting all correspondence with the French at Louisbourg, and early in the spring they tried a body of troops, which was transported to Nova Scotia, to assist Lieutenant-Governor Laurence in driving the French from the encroachments they had made upon that province. Accordingly, towards the end of May, the governor sent a large detachment of troops, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Monckton, upon this service; and three frigates and a sloop were despatched up the bay of Fundy, under the command of Captain Bouc, to give their assistance in the same enterprise. The French, who were at Massaguash, found the passage stopped by a large number of regular forces, rebel neutrals, or Acadians, and Indians, four hundred and fifty of whom occupied a block-house, and were kept within it by three ships of war, whose eight guns were mounted on thirty-two ships of the line, and the rest were posted with a strong breast-work of timber, thrown up by way of outwork to the block-house. The English provincials attacked this place with such spirit, that the enemy was obliged to fly, and leave them in possession of the breast-work; then the garrison in the block-house deserted it, and left the passage of the river free. From thence Colonel Monckton advanced to the French fort of Bouougouar, which he invested, as far at least as the small part of his troops were posted, on the twentieth of June; and after four days' battering-hardwork obliged it to surrender, though the French had twenty-six pieces of cannon mounted, and plenty of ammunition, and the English had not yet placed a single cannon upon their batteries. The garrison was sent to Louisbourg, on condition of not bearing arms in America for the space of six months; and the Acadians, who had joined the French, were pardoned, in consideration of their being surprised upon their service. Colonel Monckton, after putting a garrison into this place, and changing its name to that of Cumberland, the next day attacked and reduced the other French fort upon the river, and likewise found a large quantity of provisiuns and stores of all kinds, that being the chief magazine for supplying the French Indians and Acadians with arms, ammunition, and other necessary. He then disarmed these last, to the number of fifteen thousand; and in the meantime, Capt.

tain Roux with his ships sailed to the mouth of the river St. John, to attack the new fort the French had erected there; but they saved him that trouble, by abandoning it upon his approach, after having burnt their cannon and up their magazine, and destroyed, as far as they had time, all the works they had lately raised. The English had but twenty men killed, and about the same number wounded, in the capture of which the success of which secured the tranquility of Nova Scotia.

§ VIII. While the New Englanders were thus employed in reducing the French in Nova Scotia, preparations were made for the next campaign; this winter, in the spring, had not been unexpectedly delayed by the Virginian contract for the army, who, when he was ready to march, had neither provided a sufficient quantity of provisions for his troops, nor a competent number of carriages for his army. This accident was foreseen by almost every person, but none would persuade them in that point of America; for the people of Virginia, who think of no produce but their tobacco, and do not raise corn enough for even their own subsistence, being by the nature of their country, much more subject to change of weather than the New Englanders, have but few wheel carriages or beasts of burden; whereas Pennsylvanians, which abound in corn, and most other sorts of provisions, but little water carriage, especially in great quantities, can supply in a short time great numbers of carts, wagons, and horses. Mr. Braddock should, therefore, certainly, in point of prudence, have landed in Pennsylvania: the contract for supplying his troops was not his fault; he with the whole body of the other planters there, who could easily have performed their engagements; and if his camp had been formed near Frank's town or somewhere upon the south-west borders of that province, he would not have had eighty miles to march from thence to Fort du Quense, instead of a hundred and thirty miles that he had to advance from Will's Creek, where he did encamp, through roads neither better nor more practicable than the other would have been. The error in the very beginning of the expedition, whether owing to an injudicious preference fully given to the Virginians in the lucrative job of supplying these troops, or to any other cause, delayed the march of the army for some weeks; but having the supplies the market, he without any great expense of all kinds; and would probably have defeated the expedition entirely for that summer, had not the contractors found means to procure some assistance from the back settlements of Pennsyl vania. But even when these supplies did arrive, they consisted of only fifteen wagons and a hundred draft horses, instead of a hundred and fifty wagons and three hundred horses, which the Virginia contractors had engaged to furnish, and the provisions were so bad that they could not be used. However, some gentlemen in Pennsylvania, being applied to in this exigency, amply made up for these deficiencies, and the troops were by this means supplied with every thing they wanted. Another and a still more fatal omission committed, in the choice of the commander for this expedition. Major-General Braddock, who was appointed to it, was undoubtedly a man of courage, and expert in all the punctuations of a review, hav ing been a general in the army of the Duke of Cumberland, and the strict military education in which he had been trained from his youth, and which he prided himself on scrupulously following, made him hold the American military men, in great contempt, but told his officers, gen rally very haughty, positive, and difficult of access; quali ties ill suited to the temper of the people among whom he was to command. His extreme severity in matters of dis cipline, ill-concealed, though he endeavored to cover it through his exercise with the same dexterity and regu larity as a regiment of guards in Hyde-Park; little know ing, or indeed being able to form an idea of the difference between the European manner of fighting, and an Ameri can expedition through woods, deserts, and mountains. Before he left England, he received, in the hand-writing of

 Colonel Naper, a set of instructions from the Duke of Cumberland. By these the attempt upon Niagara was, in a great measure, referred to him, and the reduction of Crown-Point was to be left chiefly to the provincial forces.

 But above all, his royal highness, both verbally and in his writing, frequently cautioned him carefully to beware of an ambush or massacre. Instead of regarding his caution, his consent of his own abilities made him disdain to ask the opinion of any under his command; and the Indians, who would have been his safest guards against ambush, were disguised by the very show of the management and the irregularity of his behaviour, that most of them forsook his ban ners. Under these disadvantages he began his march from Fort Cumberland on the tenth of June, at the head of about two thousand two hundred men, for the Meadows, where Colonel Washington was defeated the year before. Upon his arrival there, he was informed that the French at Fort du Quense, which had lately been built on the same river, made his conference with the Monongahela, expected a reinforcement of five hundred regular troops; therefore, that he might march with a greater despatch, he left Colonel

 Dunbar, with eight hundred men, to bring up the provisions, stores, and heavy baggage, as fast as the nature of the ser vice would permit, and with the other troops, to make his advance together with ten pieces of cannon, and the necessary ammunition and provisions, he marched on with so much expedition, that he seldom took any time to reconnoitre the woods or thickets he was to pass through; as if the nearer he approached the enemy, the further he was removed from dancer.

 § IX. On the eighth of July, he encamped within ten miles of Fort du Quense. Though Colonel Dunbar was then near forty miles behind him, and his officers, particu larly Sir Peter Halkett, earnestly entreated him to proceed with caution, and to employ the friendly Indians who were with the army, and get them to give the Indians the ornaments; yet he resumed his march the next day, with much as endavouring to obtain any intelligence of the situation or disposition of the enemy, or even sending out any scouts to visit the woods and thickets on both sides of him, as well as in front. With this carelessness he was advancing, when, about noon, he was saluted with a gen eral fire upon his front, and all along his left flank, from an enemy so artfully concealed behind the trees and bushes, that not a man of them could be seen. The vanguard immediately fell back upon the main body, and in an instant the panic and confusion became general; so that most of the troops fled with great precipitation, notwithstanding all the efforts that the officers on horseback could do to stop their career. As to Braddock himself, in-Peter Halket fell by the very first fire, at the head of his regiment; and the general's secretary, son to Governor Shirley, was killed by the same volley. Neither then the number of men which the enemy had in this engagement, nor the loss which they sustained, could be so much as guessed at: but the French afterwards gave out, that their number did not, in the whole, exceed four hundred men, mostly Indians, with five hundred savages, that they made; more? probably was, because they lay concealed in such a manner that the English knew not whither to point their mus-ketts. The panic of these last continued so long, that they missed many of their marks in returning; and when then they infected those troops with their terrors; so that the army retreated without stopping, till they reached Fort Cumberland, though the enemy did not so much as attempt to pursue, nor even to appear in sight, either in the battle, or after the defeat. On the whole, this was perhaps the most extraordinary victory that ever was obtained, and the farthest flight that ever was made.

X. Had the shattered remains of this army continued at Fort Cumberland, and fortified themselves there, as they might easily have done, during the rest of the summer, they would have been such a check upon the French and their scalping Indians, as would have prevented many of their ravages that were committed in the ensuing winter, upon the western borders of Virginia and Pennsylvania; but, instead of taking that prudent step, their commander left only the sick and wounded at that fort, under the protection of a number of the provincials of the principal militia, posted there by way of garrison, and began his march on the second of August, with about sixteen hundred men, from Philadelphia; where those troops could be of no immediate service. From thence they were ordered away to Albany, in New York, by General Shirley, on whom the chief command of the troops in America had devolved by the death of Major-General Braddock. Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, were by these means left exposed to a constant danger, and cut down, if they might have done effectually, had they been united in their counsels: but the usual disputes, between their governors and as-semblies, defeated every salutary plan that was proposed.
Pennsylvania, the most powerful of the three, was rendered quite impotent, either for its own defence, or that of its neighbours, by these unhappy contests; though, at last, the assembly of that province, sensible of the danger to which they were exposed, and seeing the absolute necessity of providing a standing military force, and of erecting some forts to defend their western frontier, passed a bill for raising fifty thousand pounds. But even this sum, sufficient to erect a dozen or twelve forts, was less than the richness of the province, and the extent of its frontier, could not be obtained; the governor positively refusing to give his assent to the act of the assembly, because they had taxed the proprietors' estates equally with those of the inhabitants. In a word, he said, that in his directions not to consent to, nor indeed any new tax upon the proprietors; and the assembly, consisting chiefly of members whose estates lay in the eastern or interior parts of the province, as positively refusing to alter their bill.
One would be apt to think, that, in a case of such urgent necessity, the governor might have ventured to give his assent to the bill under a protest, that it should not prejudice the limits of the proprietaries upon any future occasion; but as he did not, the bill was dropped, and the province left defenceless; by which means it afterwards suffered severely, to the destruction of many of the poor inhabitants of this frontier, and to their impressing the Indians with a contemptible opinion of the English, and the highest esteem of the French.

§ XI. Our colonies to the north of Pennsylvania were more active, and more successful in their preparations for war, than any other part of New England, for following the example of New England, passed an act to prohibit the sending of provisions to any French port or settlement on the continent of North America, or any of the adjacent islands; and also for raising for the service, not only troops, but also estates real and personal, for the better defence of their colonies, which lay more exposed than any other to a French invasion from Crown-Point. However, this sum, great as it ought seem to them, was far from being sufficient; nor, indeed, could they have provided properly for their security, without the assistance of our other colonies to the east of them; but with the consent of the assembly, the greatest part of the body of regular troops expected under Colonel Dunbar, they boldy resolved upon offensive measures, which, when practicable, are always the safest; and two expeditions, one against the French fort at Crown-Point, and the other towards New York, were resolved upon. The latter, consisting of two thousand five hundred men, under Colonel Erie, were set on foot at the same time. The former of these expeditions was appointed to be executed under the command of General Johnson, a native of Ireland, who had long resided upon the Mohawk river, in the western parts of New York, where he had acquired a considerable estate, and was universally beloved, not only by the inhabitants but also by the neighbouring Indians, whose language he had learnt, and whose affections he had gained by his humanity towards them. The expedition against Niagara was commanded by General Shirley himself.

§ XII. The rendezvous of the troops for both these expeditions was appointed to be at Albany, where most of them arrived before the end of June; but the artillery, boats, provisions, and other necessaries for the attempt upon Crown-Point, could not be prepared till the eighth of August. With General Johnson marching from Albany for the Carrying-place from Hudson's river to Lake George. There the troops had already arrived under the command of Major-General Lyman, and consisted of between five and six thousand men, under the command of the governments of Boston, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode-Island, and New York. Every thing was then prepared as fast as possible for a march; and towards the end of the month, General Johnson advanced with about fourteen miles forward with his troops, and encamped in a very strong situation, covered on each side by a thick wooded swamp, by Lake George in his rear, and by a mountainous district which formed a division of his front. Here he resolved to wait the arrival of his bat-taux, and afterwards to proceed to Ticonderoga, at the other end of the lake, from whence it was about fifteen miles to the fort at the south end of Lake Cohoes, or Champlain, called Fort Frederick by the French, and by us Crown-Point. Whilst he was thus encamped, some of his Indian scouts, of which he took care to send out numbers along both sides, and to the further end of Lake George, brought him intelligence that a considerable number of the enemy were then on their march from Tis-condonaga, by the way of the south bay, towards the fortified encampment, since called Fort Edward, which General Johnson ordered him to proceed with the utmost diligence to take. This intelligence, received by General Johnson, immediately excited in him the necessity of obtaining a body of troops, which, in a force from four or five hundred of the New Hampshire and New York men had been left as a garrison. Upon this information General Johnson sent two expresss, one after the other, to Colonel Blanchard, their commander, with orders to take the post, and if possible, to draw a body of troops from the intrenchments. About twelve o'clock at night, those who had been sent upon the second express returned with an account of their having seen the enemy within four miles of the camp at the Carrying-place, which they scarcely doubted his having by that time attacked.
Important as the defence of this place was for the safety of the whole army, and imminent as the danger seemed to be, it does not appear that the colonel was called to a council of war, or resolved upon any thing for its relief; but early the next morning he called a council, wherein it was unluckily resolved to detach a thousand men, with a sum of money to their particular care, to march to the fort at the south end of Lake Cohoes, or Champlain, aix as to signify ten thousand, or any greater number.

§ XIII. Between eight and nine o'clock in the morning a thousand men, with two hundred Indians, were detached under the command of Colonel Williams; but they had not been gone two hours, when those in the camp began to hear a close firing, at about three or four miles' distance, as they judged : as it approached nearer and nearer, they rightly supposed that the detachment was overpowered, and a retreat then attempted. This information was confirmed by some fugitives, and presently after by whole companies, who fled back in great confusion. In a very short time after, the enemy appeared marching in regular order up to the centre of the camp, where the consternation was very great. Having been misled under the impression directly, they might probably have thrown all into confusion, and obtained an easy victory; but, fortunately for the English, they halted for some time about a hundred and fifty yards from the French, who had begun their attack with platoon firing, too far off to do much hurt, especially against troops who were defended by a strong breast-work. On the contrary, this ineffectual fire served only to raise the spirits of those last, who, having prepared their artillery during the time that the French halted, began to play it so briskly upon the enemy, that the Canadians and Indians in their service fled immediately into the woods on each side of the camp, and there squatted under bushes, or skulked behind trees, from whence they continued firing with very little execution, most of their shot being intercepted by the brakes and thickets; for they never had the courage to advance to the verge of the wood. Baron Dieskau, who was thus alone, with his regular troops, at the front of the camp, finding he could not make a close attack upon the centre with his small number of men, moved first to the left, and then to the right, and continued fresh forces to force a passage, but was repulsed, being unsupported by the irregulars. Instead of retreating, as he ought in prudence to have done, he still continued his platoon and broad-swing firing, four o'clock in the afternoon of this day, when his regular troops suffered greatly by the fire from the camp, and were at last thrown into confusion; which was no sooner perceived by General Johnson's men, than they, without waiting for orders, leaped over their breast-work, attacked the enemy on all sides, and, after killing and taking a considerable number of them, entirely dispersed the rest. The French, whose numbers, at the beginning of this engagement, amounted to about two thousand men, including two hundred grenadiers, eight hundred Canadians, and the rest, Indians of different nations, had between seven and eight hundred men killed, and thirty taken prisoners; among whom the latter was Baron Dieskau himself, when he was shot at a little distance from the field of battle, dangerously wounded, and leaped upon the stump of a tree for his support. The English lost about two hundred men, and those chiefly of the detachment under Colonel Williams; for they had very few either killed or wounded in the action, and not any of distinction, except Colonel Titcomb, killed, and the general himself and Major Nichols wounded. Among the slain of the detachment, which would probably have been entirely cut off, had not Lieutenant-Colonel Cole been sent out from the camp with three hundred men, with which he stopped the enemy's pursuit, and covered the retreat of his friends, were Colonel Williams, Major Ashley, six captains, and several subalterns, besides private men: and the Indians reckoned that they had lost forty men, besides the brave old Hendrick, the Mohock Sachem, or chief captain.

When Baron Dieskau set out from Tecondog; his design was only to surprise and cut off the intrenched camp, now called Fort Edward, at the carrying-place, where there were but four or five hundred men. If he had executed this scheme, our army would have been thrown into great difficulties; for it could neither have proceeded further, nor have subsisted where it was, and he might have found an opportunity to attack it with great advantage in its retreat. But when he was within four or five miles of that place, the French opened fire with several cannon there, and none at the camp; upon which they all desired to be led on to this last, which he more readily consented to, as he himself had been told by a Frenchman that there was no fort between the river and fifty yards, before that, it was quite defenceless, being without any lines, and destitute of cannon; which, in effect, was true at that time; for the cannon did not arrive, nor was the breastwork erected, till about two days before the engagement. This misinformation, therefore, must be imputed this step, which would otherwise have been decided with the general character and information of Baron Dieskau, and the reliable error seems to have been committed by General Johnson, in not detaching a party to pursue the enemy when they were defeated and fled. Perhaps he was prevented from so doing by the ill fate of the detachment he had sent out in pursuit, under such a disadvantage. However that may be, his neglect, in this respect, had like to have been fatal the next day to a detachment sent from Fort Edward, consisting of a hundred and twenty men of the New Hampshire line, commanded by Captain Matthews, as a reinforcement to the army at the camp. This party fell in with between three and four hundred men of Dieskau's troops, near the spot where Colonel Williams had been defeated the day before; but Mr. Griffin having timely notice, by his scouts, of the approach of an enemy, made such a disposition, that he not only repulsed the assailants, but defeated and entirely dispersed them, with the loss only of two men killed, eleven wounded, and five missing. He himself unfortunately died of the wounds he received in this engagement, a few days after he arrived at the camp with his party.

§ XV. It was now judged too late in the year to proceed to the attack of Crown-Point, as it would have been necessary, in that case, to build a strong fort in the place where the camp then was, in order to secure a communication with Albany, from whence only the troops could expect to be reinforced, or supplied with fresh subsistence and provisions. They, therefore, set out upon their return soon after this engagement, having first erected a little stockaded fort, at the hither end of Lake George, in which they left a small garrison, as a forerunner for a misfortune which might easily have been foreseen, because this whole army, being country militia, was to be disbanded, and return to their respective homes, as they actually did soon after their retreat to Albany. Thus was all the glory, thus all the advantage, that the English nation acquired by such an expensive expedition. But so little had the English been accustomed of late to hear of victory, that they rejoiced at this advantage, as if it had been an action of the greatest consequence. The general was highly applauded for his conduct, and liberally rewarded; for he was created a baronet by his majesty, and presented with five thousand pounds by the parliament.

§ XVI. The preparations for General Shirley's expédition against Niagara were not only deficient, but shamefully slow; though it was well known that even the possibility of his success must, in a great measure, depend upon his setting out early in the year, as will appear to any person who considers the situation of the river, and the manner by which this is being the only way by which he could proceed to Niagara. Oswego lies on the south-east side of the lake Ontario, near three hundred miles almost due west from Albany in New York. The way to it from thence, though long and tedious, is the more convenient, as the far greatest part of it admits of water-carriage, by which the inhabitants called bateaux, which are a kind of light flat-bottomed boats, widest in the middle, and pointed at each end, of about fifteen hundred weight burden, and managed by two men, called bateaux men, with paddles and setting poles, the rivers being in many places too narrow to admit of oars. From Albany to the village of Oswego, about sixteen miles, is a good wagon road. From thence to the little falls in the Mohawk river, being fifty-six miles, the passages is by water-carriage up that river, and consequently against the stream, which, in many places, is somewhat rapid, and in others so shallow, that, when the river is low, the watermen are obliged to get out, and draw their bateaux over the riffs. At the little falls is a post or, land carriage, for about a mile, over a ground so marshy, that they could not have passed without an army. The colony of Germans settled there attend with sleighs, on which they draw the loaded bateaux to the next place of embarkation upon the same river. From thence they proceed by water to Oswego, on the left side, near the head of it, where there is another post or, and the length of which depends upon the dryness or wetness of the season, but is generally above six or eight miles over in the summer months. Here the batteaux are again carried upon sledges, till they come to a narrow river called Wood's Creek, down which they are wafted on a gentle stream, for about forty miles, into that part of the Lake Ontario, which stretches from east to west about thirty miles, and is passed with great ease and safety in calm weather. At the western end of the lake is the river Onondagas, which, after a course of between twenty and thirty miles, unites with the river Oswego, or Senechaug, and runs into the lake Ontario, at the place where Oswego was situated. But this river is so rapid as to be sometimes dangerous, besides its being full of rifts and rocks: and although there is a passage by which there is a fall of eleven feet perpendicular, where these is consequently a portage, which, however, does not exceed forty yards. From thence the passage is easy, quite to Oswego. The lake Ontario, on which this fort stands, is near two hundred and eighty leagues in circumference: its figure is oval, and its depth runs from twenty to twenty-five fathoms. On the north side of it there are several little gulfs. There is a communication between this lake and that of the Hurons by the river Tonawanda, from whence it is a land carriage of six or eight leagues to the river Tonawanda, which falls into it. The French have two forts of consequence on this lake: Frontenac, which commands the river St. Lawrence, and where the lake Ontario unites with the Oswego, and Niagara, which commands the communication between the lake Ontario and the lake Erie. But of these forts, and this last lake, which is one of the finest in the world, it will suffice to speak hereafter.

§ XVII. Though we had been long in possession of the fort Oswego, and though it lay greatly exposed to the French, particularly to those of Canada, upon any rupture between the two nations, we had been willing, as we were under the idea of safety, or even to build a single vessel fit for navigating the lake; nor was this strange neglect ever taken effectual notice of, till the beginning of this year, when, at a meeting which General Braddock had in April with the governors and chief gentlemen of several of our colonies at Alexandria, in Virginia, it was resolved to strengthen both the forts and garrison at Oswego, and to build some large vessels at that place. Accordingly a number of shipwrights and workmen were sent thither in May and June. At the same time, Captain Bradstreet marched thither with two companies of an hundred men each, to reinforce the hundred that were there before under Captain King, to which had now been added to, the great increase of the deposit made, the French began to grow serious. For a long time before, not above twenty-five men were left to defend the post, which, from its great importance, and the situation of affairs at this juncture, they thought required a much greater garrison than was put into it even at that period: but economy was the chief thing consulted in the beginning of this war, and to that, in a great measure, was owing its long duration.

§ XVIII. From the above description of the passage from Albany to Oswego, it is plain how necessary it was, that the troops intended for this expedition should have set out early in the spring. But instead of that, the very first of them, Colonel Schuyler's New-Jersey regiment, did not begin their march till the beginning of July, and just as Shirley's and Pepperell's regiments were preparing to follow, the melancholy account of Bradstreet's disaster arrived at Albany, where it so damped the spirits of the people, and spread such a terror, that many of the troops deserted, and most of the batteaux men dispersed, and ran home, by which means even all the necessary stores could not be carried along with the troops. Notwithstanding this disappointment, General Shirley set out from Albany before the end of July, with as many of the troops and stores as he could procure a conveyance for, hoping to be joined by that great number of the Indians of six nations, to whom he sent invitations to that effect as he passed by their settlements: but they, instead of complying with his desire, absolutely declared against all hostilities as to themselves, and insisted upon the safety of Oswego, being a place of traffic and peace, ought not to be disturbed either by the English or the French, as if they could have persuaded both parties to agree to such a local truce. Upon this refusal, Mr. Shirley proceeded forward, being joined by very few Indians, and arrived at Oswego on the seventeenth or eighteenth of August; but found the rest of his army was not to arrive until the last day of that month; and even then, their store of provisions was not sufficient to enable them to proceed against Niagara, though some tolerably good vessels had by this time been built and got ready for that purpose. The French, on the contrary, were assembled in great numbers for the attack of Niagara, and to leave the rest of his army, consisting of about fourteen hundred more, at Oswego, to defend that place, in case the French should attack in his absence, which there was reason to apprehend they might, as they then had a considerable force at Fort Frontenac, from whence they could easily cross over the lake Ontario to Oswego. However, he was still obliged to wait at Oswego for provisions, of which he was in want a small supply arrived on the twenty-sixth of September, barely sufficient to support his men during their intended expedition, and to allow twelve days' short subsistence for those he left behind. But this time the rainy and torrid summer had been so prodigious, that great assistance from their store was wanted. In the meantime, on the French having been imposed with the necessity of a truce, the British army were reduced to the condition of a garrison, and to be called Ontario fort; and the other, four hundred and fifty yards west of the old fort, to be called Oswego new fort.

mastery, who was then at Hanover, an offer of sparing, if he would agree to certain conditions of neutrality for that electorate, which he rejected with disdain. Then the Count D’Auverterre, envoy extraordinary from France at the court of the Elector of Hanover, presented to the ministers of the empress-queen. The secret articles of the treaty of Petersburg, between the two emperors, had stipulated a kind of partition of the Prussian territories, in case that prince should infringe the articles of the truce in Holstein, but his British majesty, though often invited, had always refused to accord to any such stipulation: and the King of Poland, however, he might be inclined to favour the scheme, did not dare to avow it formally, till matters should have reached that point. The court of Vienna, whose favourite measure this was, began to listen to D’Auverterre’s insinuations, and by degrees entered into negotiations with him, which, in the end, were productive of that unnatural confederacy between the empress-queen and the King of France, of which further notice will be taken in the occurrences of the next year, when the treaty between them, into which they afterwards found means secretly to bring the Emperor of Russia, was concluded at Versailles.

§ XXI. The King of England, taking it for granted that the French would invade Hanover, in consequence of their rupture with Great Britain, which seemed to be near at hand, resolved to place his chief reliance on his own electorate. To this end, during his stay at Hanover, he concluded, on the eighteenth of June, a treaty with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, by which his serious highness engaged to raise both these corps and garrisons, for his majesty’s service, a body of eight thousand men, to be employed, if required, upon the continent, or in Britain or Ireland; but not on board the fleet or beyond the seas; and also, if his Britannic Majesty should judge it necessary or advantageous for his service, to furnish and join to this body of eight thousand men, within six months after they should be demanded, four thousand more, of which seven hundred were to be horse or dragoons to be trained into regiments of infantry to have two field pieces of cannon. Another treaty was begun with Russia about the same time; but this did not take effect during his majesty’s residence at Hanover: that others were not concluded was the more surprising, as our subsidy treaty with Saxony had then expired, and that with Bavaria was near expiring, and as the securing of these two princes in our interest was at least as necessary towards forming a sufficient confederacy upon our side of Hanover, as it was to secure the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. If the reason of their not being engaged, and no other seems so probable, was, that they refused to renew their treaties with England upon the same terms: and accordingly, his Britannic Majesty, though he had received a subsidy from this kingdom for many years in time of peace, when they neither were nor could be of any service to the interest of Great Britain.

§ XXII. On the fifteenth of July an express arrived from Admiral Boscowen, with an account of his having taken the two French ships of war, the Alcide and the Lys. This was certainly contrary to the expectation of the court of France; for had they apprehended any such attack, they would not have ordered Mr. M’Namara to return to Brest with the chief part of their squadron; nor was it, perhaps, less contrary to the expectation of some of our own ministry, but, as matters were carried so far, it was then too late to retrench; and, therefore, orders were soon after given to all our ships of war to make reprisals upon the French, by taking their ships wherever they should be, or AT LEAST the vessels that were from Portsmouth on the twenty-first of July, with eighteen ships of war, to watch the return of the French fleet from America, which, however, escaped him, and arrived at Brest on the third day of September. Commodore Frankland sailed from Spithead for the West Indies on the thirteenth of August with four ships of war, furnished with orders to commit hostilities, as well as to protect our trade from the privateers and pupboats which would, it was said, be sent out. On the 29th of the same month, the Duke of Mirepoix, their ambassador at the court of London, set out for Paris on the twenty-second of July, without taking leave.

§ XXIII. A war being thus in some measure begun, his majesty thought proper, perhaps for that reason, to recommend to his British dominions sooner than usual; for he left Hanover on the eighth of September, and arrived on the fifteenth at Keasington, where the treaty of alliance between him and the Emperor of Russia, which he had begun during his absence, was concluded on the thirtieth of the same month. By this treaty his Russian majesty engaged to hold in readiness, on the fronts of Lithuania, a body of troops consisting of forty thousand infantry, with the necessary artillery, and fifteen thousand cavalry; and also on the coast of the same province, forty or fifty galleys, with the necessary crews; to be ready to act upon the first orders, in his majesty’s service, in case, said the fifth article, which was the most remarkable, that the dominions of his Britannic majesty in Germany should be invaded on account of the interests or disputes which regard his kingdoms: her imperial majesty would then look upon it as a case of law, if the case of the alliance of the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-two; and that the said dominions should be therein comprised in this respect; but neither these troops, nor this body of galleys, nor even his own dominions, his Britannic majesty, or his allies, should be somewhere attacked; in which case the Russian general should march, as soon as possible after requisition, to make a diversion with thirty thousand infantry and fifteen thousand cavalry; and should embark on board the galleys the other ten thousand infantry, to make a descent according to the exigency of the affair. On the other side, his Britannic majesty engaged to pay to her Russian majesty an annual subsidy of an hundred thousand pounds sterling a-year, to be paid in advance, and to be reckoned from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, to the day that these troops should upon requisition march out of Russia; and, if the annual subsidy to her imperial majesty was to be five hundred thousand pounds sterling, to be paid always four months in advance, until the troops should return into the Russian dominions, and for three months after their return. His Majesty’s council was to be at liberty to send once every year into the said province of Livonia a commissary to see and examine the number and condition of the said troops, further engaged, and to hear what in case her majesty should think fit, of flagrant ingratitude, as they had both received a subsidy from this kingdom for many years in time of peace, when they neither were nor could be of any service to the interest of Great Britain.

The King, on his rule, promised to pay to the Landgrave for these security, eight hundred men, by way of security, for every troop or squadron, as also annual subsidy. Twelve thousand pounds and five hundred crowns for each gallonier, the crown to be reckoned at fifty-three shillings of Holland, or at four shillings and sixpence of the crown, to be paid thenceforward, as the same shall remain; and, as also the same shall be stipulated, for the Landgrave, for the eight thousand men, an annual subsidy of an hundred thousand crowns; and at the expiration of the treaty, seven thousand crowns, or any equivalent, to be paid, and to be settled by a mutual contract, to consist of the day of signing the treaty, which subsidy was to be immediately to be paid into the Landgrave’s treasury, out of the price of the ships, and to be returned to his majesty, who now knew enough of the court of Vienna to be sensible that he could expect no assistance from thence, in case his German dominions were invaded, should enter into this convention with the Empress of Russia, in order to strengthen his defence against the, continent, was extremely natural; especially as he had lately lived in great friendship with her, and her transactions with the court of France had been so secret by passing through only that of Vienna, that little has been learned of the negotiations or the project of the treaty of Versailles then come to his knowledge, or to that of the King of Prussia, nor had either of these princes yet made any formal advance to the other.

§ XXIV. The first intimation that appeared publicly of the negotiations of France with the Empress of Germany, was, when the French minister, Count d'Aubeterre, declared that the warlike designs with which the king his master was charged, were sufficiently confuted by his great moderation, of which all Europe had manifold proofs: that his majesty was persuaded this groundless charge had given as much indignation to their imperial majesties as to himself; that he was firmly resolved to preserve to Christendom that tranquility which it enjoyed through his good faith, in religiously observing the treaty of Alt-shapelle: but that if his Britannic majesty's allies should take part in the war which was kindled in America, by furnishing succours to the English, his majesty would be authorized to consider and treat them as principals in it. France likewise made the same declaration to the court of Prussia.

§ XXV. The words and the stipulation in the above-mentioned clause, in the seventh article of the treaty of Great Britain with Russia, were looked on as a menace levelled at the King of Prussia, which, having some means to procure a copy of this treaty, and seeing it in that light, boldly declared, by his ministers at all the courts of Europe, that he would oppose, with his utmost force, the entrance of foreign troops into the empire, under any pretence whatever. This declaration was particularly dis- pleasing to the French, who had already marched large bodies of troops towards the frontiers of the empire, and entered on their march, and, sent in Mutmahla, with the permission of the Elector of Colong, for which the English minister at his court was, in August, ordered to withdraw from thence without taking leave. However, as soon as the declaration of the King of Prussia was notified to the court of Versailles, they sent an ambassador extraordinary, the Duke de Nivernois, to Berlin, to try to persuade his majesty to retract his declaration, and enter into a new alliance with them. His Prussian majesty received this ambassador with such a manner, as seemed to denote a disposition to agree to everything he had to propose. This awakened in England a jealousy that his declaration alone was not to be relied on, but that it was necessary to bring him to some solemn engagements. Hally as the French had by this time a numerous army near the Lower Rhine, with magazines provided for their march all the way to Hanover; and if the King of Prussia suffered them to pass through his dominions, that electorate might be swallowed up before the Russian auxiliaries could possibly be brought thither, or any army he formed for protecting it. For this reason a negotiation was set on foot by Great Britain at Berlin; but as it was not concluded before the beginning of the next year, we shall defer entering into the particulars of it, till we come to that period.

§ XXVI. Meanwhile the French made another attempt upon the court of Madrid, loudly complaining of the taking of Almeida, and, as the Spanish minister was so much engaged, the best way to prevent any declaration of war was made, representing it as a most unjustifiable proceeding, which threatened a dissolution of all faith amongst nations. This produced a strong memorial from Sir Benjamin Keene, our minister at that court, importing, "That it was well known that the French fleet carried troops, ammunition, and every thing necessary for defending the countries which the French had unjustly assumed in America, in which the English claimed the property; that the rules of self-defence authorize every nation to render fruitless any attempt that may tend to its prejudice; that this right had been made use of only in taking the two French ships of war, and of which the English claimed the property; that the declaration of war was made, not for the purpose of obtaining any thing, but to cover the French from the charge of war; and the dispatch of place might be interpreted in favour of the English, seeing the two ships were taken on the coasts of the countries where the contest arose." In answer to this observation, the French minister represented the vast number of ships that had been taken in the European seas; for in fact the English ports soon began to be filled with them in consignment. France, it was observed, was far from the court of Madrid was so far from being persuaded by any thing he could say, that it gave his Britannic majesty the strongest assurances of its friendship, and of its intentions to the court of Versailles not in the different methods, or in the spy of France, but such as should be conciliatory, and tending to restore the public tranquility.

§ XXVII. On the other hand his Britannic majesty required, as in the Great Treaty, that his Britannic majesty was commissioned to him by treaty from the empress-queen. But these were refused, under pretence, that as the contest between him and France related to America only, it was not a case of the alliance; though at the same time the French made an scruple of owning, that they intended to make a powerful descent on Great Britain early in the spring. When, a little while after, France being employed in making great preparations for a land war in Europe, the King of Eng- land required her to defend her own possessions, the barrier in the Low Countries, with the number of men stipulated by treaty, which countries, acquired by English blood, and England could not be given to her on that express condition, she declared that she could not concur in that purpose, on account of her dangerous enemy, the King of Prussia; and afterwards, when he was secured by his treaty with England, she urged that as a reason for her alliance, that she would not enter into a new negotiation, of historical truth, that this was no bad reason, considering the power, the genius, and the character of that prince, who hovered over her dominions with an army of one hundred and fifty thousand veterans. It must likewise be owned, that she undertook to procure the French king's consent to a neutrality for Hanover, which would have effectually secured that electorate from the invasion of every enemy, and it was afterwards, with the utmost reason, conjectured to suppose, that the dread of this very power was the true source of those connections in Germany, which entailed such a ruinous continental war upon Great Britain.

§ XXVIII. Though the English continued to make reprisals upon the French, not only in the seas of America, but also in those of Europe, by taking every ship they could meet with, and detaining them, their cargoes, and crews; yet this had only the effect of increasing their want of power by sea, or that they might have a more plausible plea to represent England as the aggressor, were so far from returning these hostilities, that their fleet, which had been taken at themouth of the lower Rhine in the month of August, taken the Blandford ship of war with Governor Lyttleton on board, going to Carolina, they set the govern- nork at liberty, as soon as the court was informed of the ship's being brought into Nantes, and shortly after re- leased both the ship and crew. However, at the same time, their preparations for a land war still went on with great diligence, and their utmost arts and efforts were fruitlessly exerted to persuade the Spaniards and Dutch to join with them against Great Britain.

§ XXIX. In England, the preparations by sea became greater than ever, several new ships of war were built in commission, and many others taken into the service of the government. The squadron, both in the Channel and in the Baltic, the bounties to seamen were continued, and the number of those that either entered voluntarily, or were pressed, increased daily, as did also the curtesies from the French, among which was the experience, of seventy guns, taken as she was going from Rochefort to Brest to be manned. The land forces of Great Britain were likewise ordered to be augmented; several new regiments were raised, and all the horse and dragoons, and the order was given to men belonging to Chelsea hospital, were directed to send in their names, ages, and time of service, in order that such of them as were yet able to serve might be employed again; and at this time, the English navy, so early as in the month of September of this year, consisted of one ship of a hundred and ten guns, five of a hundred guns each, thirteen of ninety, eight of eighty, five of seventy-four, twenty-six of seventy, four of sixty-six, one of sixty-four, thirty-three of sixty-three, three of fifty-four, twenty-eight of fifty, twenty-six of forty-two, twenty-four of forty, two of seventy-two, four of seventy, thirty-one of seventy-four, two of sixty, six of fifty, and thirty-two fragates.

§ XXX. Such was the situation of the two kingdoms, when, on the thirteenth of November, the parliament met, and his majesty opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he acquainted them—That the most proper measures had been taken to protect our possessions in America, and to regan such parts thereof as had been encroached upon, or invaded; that to preserve his people from the calamities of war, as well as to prevent a general war from being lighted up in Europe, he had been always ready to accept reasonable and honourable terms of accommodation. His majesty, therefore, proposed to France: that he had also confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or supporting those already made; to exert his people's right to a satisfaction for hostilities committed in time of peace; and, lastly, to give in all just and reasonable measures; which was opposed by France: that he greatly increased his naval armaments, and augmented his land forces in such a manner as to be able to maintain his losses. And, further, that he had concluded a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and another with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, which should be laid before them.

§ XXXI. In answer to this speech, both Houses voted most loyal addresses, but without a warm opposition, in each, to some of the particular expressions; for it had been proposed in the House of Lords, to insert in their address the words following, viz. "That they looked upon themselves as the strongest tutelary of the public tranquility, and had given assurances of his intention to continue in the same pacific sentiments; that he himself had greatly increased his naval armaments, and augmented his land forces in such a manner as to be able to maintain his losses." And, further, that he had concluded a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and another with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, which should be laid before them.

§ XXXII. Sir Thomas Robinson had not been long in possession of the office of secretary of state, before it was generally perceived, that, though an honest, well meaning man, and a favourite with the king, his abilities were not equal to the functions of that post. Much less were they so at this juncture, after the nation was being engaged in a difficult and expensive war, and plunged into foreign measures and connexions, which would require the utmost skill of an able politician to render them palatable to the people. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, though they scarce ever agreed in any other particular, had generally united in opposing his measures, and their superior influence in the House of Commons, and universally acknowledged abilities, though of very different kinds, had always prevailed; uncommon as it may seem to see two persons who held considerable places under the government, one of them being paymaster-general, and the other secretary at war, oppose, upon almost every occasion, a secretary of state who was held to be the representative of the sentiments of his master. Sir Thomas himself soon grew sensible of his want of sufficient weight in the senate of the nation; and, therefore, of his own accord, on the tenth of November, wisely and dutifully resigned the seals of his office to his majesty, who delivered them to Mr. Fox, and appointed Sir Thomas master of the wardrobes, with a pension to him during his life, and after his death to his sons. Lord Barrington succeeded Mr. Fox as secretary at war; and soon after Sir George Latham was made chancellor of the exchequer, and a lord of the treasury, in the room of Mr. Legge, who had declared himself against the new continental system. However, notwithstanding these changes, in the meantime, very warm debates arose in both Houses, when the treaties of Russia and Hesse-Cassel came to be considered by them: some of the members were for referring them to a committee; but this motion was overruled, in consideration of his majesty's having engaged in them to guard against any fresh encroachments upon this nation: and by the second part of these words it seemed to be resolved, to engage this nation in a continental connexion for the defence of Hanover, which it was impossible for England to support, and which would be so far from being of any advantage to it at sea, or in America, that it might at last disable the nation from defending itself in either of those parts of the world. But upon putting the question, the inserting of these words was agreed to, and the bill was passed; which after the bill stood as part of the address of the House upon that occasion.

§ XXXIII. To this remarkable address his majesty returned the following answer: *I give you my hearty thanks for this dutiful and affectionate address. I see, with the greatest satisfaction, the zeal you express for my person and government, and for the true interest of your country, which I am determined to adhere to. The assurances which you give me for the defence of my territories abroad, are a strong proof of your affection for me. And I am assured that the stability of the French monarchy being no less necessary for the peace of Europe, you will be sensible of the importance of maintaining the French monarchy, and themaintenance of the French monarchy, and that the House of Lords. The same, or nearly the same words, relating to the treaties concluded by his majesty, and to the defence of his foreign dominions, were proposed to be inserted in this address, which was opposed by William Pitt, Esq. then paymaster of his majesty's forces; the Right Hon. Henry Legge, Esq. then chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the commissioners of the treasury; and by several other gentlemen in high posts under the government, as well as by many others; but, upon putting the question, it was by a considerable majority agreed to insert the words objected to; and very some time before this, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, and the other gentlemen who had appeared in the opposition, were disavowed from their employments. In the meantime, a draft came over from Russia for part of her new subsidy stipulated to that crown; but some of the ministry, who had then been in office, declined refusing it at all, but before the treaty should be approved by the parliament.

§ XXXIV. The House of Commons then proceeded to consider of the several objections to the ratifications of the provisions for the former. Fifty thousand seamen, including nine thousand one hundred and thirty-eight marines, were voted, on the twenty-fourth of November, for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, together with two millions six thousand five hundred pounds for their maintenance, and for thirty-four thousand and two hundred and sixty-three hundred and sixty-six soldiers, with nine hundred and thirty thousand six hundred and three pounds, six shillings, and nine pence for their support. As hundred thousand pounds were voted as a subsidy to the Empress of Russia, for the maintenance of four thousand and one hundred and forty-two pounds, twelve shillings, and sixpence, to the Landgrave of Hassel-Cassel; and ten thousand pounds to the Elector of Bavaria.

On the twenty-fourth of December, the public was overwhelmed with consternation, by the tidings of a dreadful earthquake, which, on the first of November, shook all Spain and Portugal, and many other places in Europe, and laid the city of Lisbon in ruins. When the news of this great calamity first reached England, it was feared the consequences of it might affect our public credit, considering the vast interest which the English merchants had in the Portuguese trade; but fortunately, it afterwards proved insensible, in comparison of what had been apprehended: the quarter in which the English chiefly traded, and where they had their warehouses, having suffered the least of any part of the city; and most of the English merchants who were residing there, and their families being at their country-houses to avoid the insults to which they might have been exposed from the Portuguese populace, during the celebration of their auto-de-fe, which was kept there on the twelfth of January. The two first days of this dreadful catastrophe continued near a quarter of an hour, after which the water of the river Tagus rose perpendicularly above twenty feet, and subsided to its natural bed in less than a minute. Great numbers of houses, of which this city contains ten thousand, and two thousand, extending in length near six miles, in form of a crescent, on the ascent of a hill, upon the north shore of the mouth of the river Tagus, within nine miles from the ocean, were thrown down by the shock, and destroyed and swallowed up by the water. The houses were several magnificent churches, monasteries, and public buildings. But what entirely completed the ruin of this then most opulent capital of the Portuguese dominions, was a devouring conflagration, part fortuitous or natural, but chiefly occasioned by a set of impious villains, who, unawed by the tremendous scene at that very instant passing before their eyes, with a wickedness scarcely to be credited, set fire even to the falling edifices in different parts of the city, to increase the general confusion, that they might have the better opportunity to rob and plunder their already desolated fellow-citizens. Out of three hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, which Lisbon was then reckoned to contain, about ten thousand perished in this calamity; and the survivors, deprived of their habitations, and destitute even of the necessaries of life, were forced to seek for shelter in the open fields.

As soon as his majesty received an account of this deplorable event, from his ambassador at the court of Madrid, he sent a message to both Houses of parliament, on the twenty-eighth of November, acquainting them therewith, and desiring their concurrence and assistance towards speedily relieving the unhappy sufferers; and the parliament thereupon, to the honour of British humanity, unanimously voted, on the eighth of December, a gift of an hundred thousand pounds for the distressed people of Portugal. The king, on receiving the news of this act, thought that the English themselves were, at that very time, in great want of grain, a considerable part of the sum was sent in corn, flour, rice, and a large quantity of beef from Ireland; supplies which came very seasonably for the poor Portuguese, who were in actual want of the necessaries of life. Their king was so affected by this instance of British generosity, that, to show his gratitude, he, in his Majesty's name, sent a present of fifteen hundred and twenty pounds, to the British resident at his court, to give the preference, in the distribution of these supplies, to the British subjects who had suffered by the earthquake; accordingly, about a thirtieth part of the provisions, and two thousand pounds in money, were set apart for these same compensate for the loss of twenty thousand pounds on which he was restrained by some persons, who had found fault with his conduct. The British minister returned his thanks, in very warm terms, to the British crown and nation.

§ XXXV. The report of an intended invasion of these kingdoms by the French increasing daily, on the twenty-second day of January Lord Barrington, as secretary of state, proceeded to the house of commons, to propose the charge of ten new regiments of foot, over and above the thirty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-three hundred and sixty-six soldiers before ordered to be raised; and a sum of ninety-one thousand nine hundred and nineteen pounds, ten shillings, and four farthings, as the necessary expense thereof: another estimate presented a little after by the same lord, and founded upon the same reasons, for raising, for the further defence of the kingdom, eleven troops of light dragoons, for the sum of three thousand eight hundred and eighty pounds, eleven shillings, and three pence, were voted for the ensuing year; together with eighty-one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight pounds, sixteen shillings, for a regiment of foot to be raised in North America; two hundred and ninety-eight thousand five hundred and thirty-four pounds, seventeen shillings, and ten pence halfpenny, for the maintenance of our forces already established in our American colonies; and seventy-nine thousand nine hundred and fifteen pounds, six shillings, for six regiments of foot from Ireland, to serve in North America and the East Indies. Besides all these supplies, Mr. Fox, on the twenty-eighth of January, presented to the House a message from France, containing an intimation of their consideration the faithful services of the people of New England, and of some other parts of North America; upon which one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds were voted, for the maintenance of our forces there, for the benefit of Lord William Johnson in particular. In short, including several other sums, as well for defraying the expense of the army and navy, as for a subsidy of twenty thousand pounds to the King of Prussia, and one hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and forty-seven pounds, two shillings, and sixpence, for Hanoverian troops, of which two last articles further notice will be taken hereafter, the whole of the supplies granted by parliament in this session amounted to the sum of two hundred and thousand one hundred and seventeen pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, thirty three farthings. For raising this sum, besides the malt tax, and the land tax of four shillings in the pound, the whole produce of the sinking fund, from the fifth of January one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, till it should amount to one million five hundred and fifty-five thousand nine hundred and fifty-five pounds, eleven shillings, and eleven pence halfpenny, was ordered to be raised by loans or exchequer bills, at three per cent. interest; one million five hundred thousand pounds to be raised by the sale of redeemable annuities at three and a half per cent.; one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to be raised by a lottery, at three per cent. All which sums, with eighty-three thousand four hundred and twelve pounds, two shillings, and five pence halfpenny, then remaining in the exchequer, amounted to seven millions four hundred and twenty thousand two hundred and sixty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence.

§ XXXVIII. The clause inserted in the mutiny bill last year, subjecting all officers and soldiers raised in America, by authority of the respective governors or governments there, to the same rules, and articles of war, and the same penalties and punishments, as the British forces were liable to; the act passed at the same time for regulating the present maritime nation, was the most speedy and effectual means of our majesty's navy; were not only confirmed now; but it was further enacted, with respect to this last, as well as for the more speedy and effectual recruiting of his majesty's land forces, that the commissioners appointed by the present act should be empowered to raise and levy within their respective jurisdictions, such able-bodied men as did not follow any lawful calling or employment; or having other lawful means of subsistence, in the like manner as for raising such persons, in order to convey them before the said commissioners to be examined; that if any commissions should find any person, so brought before them, to be within the above description, and if the reason of the arrest be a matter fit for his majesty's service, they should cause him to be delivered to such officer, who might secure him in any place of safety provided by the justices of peace for that purpose, or even in any public prison; and that every such officer be from that time to take the precaution, and not to be taken out of his majesty's service by any process, other than for some criminal matter. Nothing could more plainly show either the zeal of the parliament for the benefit of the crown, or the confidence in the justice and moderation of our ministry, than their agreeing to this act, which was to continue in force till the end of the next session; and which, in the hands of a wicked and enterprising administration, would have been made such a use of, as would have been inconsistent with that security which, is provided by our happy constitution for the liberty of the subject.

§ XXXIX. The next object of the immediate attention of parliament in this session was the raising of a new regiment of foot in North America; for which purpose the sum of eighty-one thousand one hundred and seventy-eight pounds, sixteen shillings, to which the estimate thereon amounted, this regiment, which was to consist of four battalions of a thousand men each, was intended to be raised chiefly out of the Germans and Swiss, who, for many years past, had annually transported them- selves to North America, and the King of Prussia, where waste lands had been assigned them upon the fronts of the provinces; but, very injudiciously, no care had been taken to intermix them with the English inhabitants of the place. To this circumstance it is owing, that they have continued to correspond and converse only with one another; so that very few of them, even of those who have been born there, have yet learned to speak or understand the English tongue. However, as they were all zealous protestants, and in general strong hearty men, and accustomed to the climate, it was judged that a regiment of good and faithful soldiers might be raised out of them, particularly proper to oppose the French: but to this end it was necessary to appoint some officers, especially subalters, who understood military discipline, and could speak the German language; and as a sufficient number of such could not be found among the English officers, it was necessary to bring over and grant commissions to several German and Swiss officers and engineers; but as this step, by the act of settlement, could not be taken without the authority of parliament, an act was now passed for enabling him to order, at his pleasure, to raise in Ireland a regiment of protestants, who had served abroad as officers or engineers, to act and rank as officers or engineers in America only. An act was likewise passed in this session, strictly for the purpose of supporting the honest attempts of such subjects to serve as officers under the French king, or to enlist as soldiers in his service, without his majesty's previous licence; and also for obliging such of his majesty's subjects as should, in time to come, accept of commissions in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch service, to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, on pain of forfeiting five hundred pounds.

§ XL. As it had been resolved in the beginning of the preceding summer, to build vessels of force upon the lake Ontario, an act was now passed for extending the existing naval laws of England, relating to the government of his majesty's ships and forces by sea, to such officers, seamen, and others, as should serve on board his majesty's shipping officer attending should judge him to be a mercenary for the original purchase-money, and the remaining time such servant might have to serve.

§ XLI. The peace of the Indies was happily composed this year, by the prudent management of the Marquis of Hartington, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. By his steady and disinterested conduct, his candour and humanity, the Irish were not only brought to much better temper, even among themselves, than they had been accustomed to give in late outrageous riots and dangerous dissensions happened: but also prevailed upon to acquiesce in the measures of England, without this last being obliged to give up any one point of her sovereignty. The leading objects of the administration of Ireland were the first that were formed: and though the ferment continued very high for some time after, among the middle and lower ranks of people, it was at length entirely alloyed by the wisdom of the lord-lieutenant, and the excellent law, which he encouraged and passed for the benefit of that nation. The P—— of Ireland, who had been very busy in foisting many of the late disturbances, was, by his majesty's command, struck off the list of privy-counsellors: and the greatest part of those patriots whom faction had turned out of their employments there were reinstated with honour.

On the sixteenth of the same month, the treaty between his Britannic majesty and the King of Prussia for the Rhenish war was signed, and proving very important, that, for the defence of their common country, Germany, and in order to preserve peace and tranquillity, which it was feared was in danger of being disturbed on account of the disputes in America, the two kings, for that end only, entered into a convention of neutrality, by which they reciprocally bound themselves not to suffer foreign troops of any nation whatsoever to enter into Germany, or pass through it, during the troubles apprehended in the sequences that might result from them; but to oppose the same with their utmost might, in order to secure Germany from the calamities of war, maintain her fundamental laws and constitutions, and preserve her peace uninterrupted.

Thus, the late treaty with Russia was virtually renounced. Their majesties, moreover, seized this favourable opportunity to adjust the differences that had subsisted between them, in relation to the remainder of the Silesia loan, due to the subjects of his Britannic majesty, and to make the indemnification claimed by the subjects of his Prussian majesty for their losses by sea during the late war; so that the attaclement laid on the said debt was agreed to be taken off, as soon as the ratification of this treaty was met with. The conventions of 1756, which were for a better regulating of the militia forces in the several counties of England. A bill was accordingly prepared to that effect, and presented to the House on the thirteenth of March by the Hon. Charles Townshend, Esq. who, to his honour, was one of the chief promoters of it. After receiving many amendments in the House of Commons, it was on the tenth of May passed, and sent to the Lords: but several objections being made to it by some of the peers, and it seeming to them that some further amendments were still necessary, which they thought they could not in that session spare time to consider so maturely as the importance of the subject required, a negative of fifty-nine against twenty-three was voted upon the motion for leaving the bill; though every one must have been sensible, not only of the propriety, but even of the absolute necessity, of such a law, which was ardently desired by the whole nation.

§ XLIV. On the twenty-first of January they went in the House of Peers, and, after having given the royal assent to the bills then depending, thanked his parliament, in a speech from the throne, for their vigorous and effectual support. He acquainted them, that the injuries and hostilities which had been for some time committed by the French against his dominions and subjects, and then followed by the actual invasion of the island of Minorca, though guaranteed to him by all the great powers in Europe, and particularly by the French king: that he, therefore, found himself obliged, in vindication of the bounds of his rights, and of the rights of his people, to declare war in form against France; and that he relied on the divine protection, and the vigorous assistance of his faithful subjects, in so just a cause. The parliament was thereupon summoned to the sixteenth of June, and from thence afterwards to the eighteenth of July, and then it was prorogued.

A. D. 1756.

§ I. Is the month of January Mr. Fox, lately appointed secretary of state, received a letter from M. Bossu, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs to the king of France, expressing in the name of his sovereign, upon the orders and instructions for committing hostilities, which his Britannic majesty had given to General Braddock and Admiral Boscawen, in diametrical opposition to the most solemn assurances so often repeated by his late sovereign in writing. § II. A complaint of the insult which had been offered to his master's flag in attacking and taking two of his ships in the open sea, without any previous declaration of war; as also by their interposition on the conduct of his utmost christian majesty's subjects, in contempt of the law of nations, the faith of treaties, and the usages established among civilized nations. He said, the sentiments and character of his Britannic majesty gave the king his master room to expect that at his return to London he would conduct the order of his admittance; but that seeing, that instead of punishing, he rather encouraged those who had been guilty of such depredations, his most christian majesty would be entitled to the most dreadful defects in what he owed to his own glory, the dignity of his crown, and the defence of his people, if he deferred any longer demanding a signal reparation for the outrage done to the French flag, and the damage sustained by his subjects. He, therefore, demanded immediate and full restitution of all the French ships which, contrary to law and decorum, had been taken by the English navy, together with the officers, soldiers, mariners, guns, stores, and provisions. § III. He declared, that if such restitution be made, he should be willing to engage in a negociation for what further satisfaction he might claim, and continue desirous to see the differences relating to America determined by a solid and equitable accommodation; but if, contrary to all hopes, these demands should be rejected, he would consider such a denial of justice as the most authentic declaration of war, and as a formed design in the court of London to disturb the peace of Europe. To this peremptory remonstrance the British secretary was directed to answer, that though the King of England would regard the French commerce with the utmost indulgence, yet he would not comply with the demand of immediate restitution as a preliminary condition; for his majesty had taken no steps but such as were rendered just and indispensable by the hostilities which the French began in time of peace, and by the conduct of his sovereign in the most honourable way for his own honour, the rights and possessions of his crown, and the security of his kingdoms.

§ V. Without all doubt the late transactions had afforded sufficient cause for a further engagement; and from that period the conduct of each other. The French court, conscious of their encroachments in Nova Scotia, affected to draw a shade over these, as particularly belonging to a disputed territory; but, in the mean time, diverted the attention of the banks of the Ohio, where Jamonville and his detachment had been attacked and massacred by the English, without the least provocation. They likewise inveighed against the capture of their ships before any declaration of war, as flagrant acts of piracy; and some neutral powers of Europe seemed to consider them in the same point of view. It was certainly high time to check the insinuation of the French by force of arms, and surely this might have been as effectually and expeditiously executed under the usual sanction of a formal declaration; the omission of which exposed the administration to the censure of our neighbours, and fixed the imputation of fraud and freebooting on the beginning of the proceedings. But the French court was engaged in the ceremony of pronouncing war from political considerations, supposing that, should the French be provoked into the first declaration of this kind, the powers of Europe would consider his most christian majesty as the aggressor, and Great Britain would reap all the fruits of the conflict, and the alliances in which she had engaged. But nothing could be more weak and frivolous than such a conjecture. The aggressor as he who first violates the peace; and every ally well interests might be aggrieved in case of an unfortunate conjuncture and convenience. The administration maintained the appearance of candour in the midst of their hostilities. The merchant ships, of which a great number had been taken from the French, were not sold and divided among the captors, according to the practice of war; but carefully sequestered with all their cargoes and effects, in order to be restored to their right owners, in case the disputes between the two nations should not be productive of an open rupture. In this particular, however, it was said that a little common sense had not been blended with their honourable intention. Great part of the cargoes consisted of fish, and other perishable commodities, which were left to rot and putrefy in the hold of the ship, as a mark of disgrace and contempt; so that the owners and captors were equally disappointed, and the value of them lost to both nations.

§ II. The court of Versailles, while they presented recommendations on this occasion to the rest of Europe, and excused against the conduct of Great Britain with all the arts of calumny and exaggeration at every court in Christendom, continued nevertheless to make such preparations as designed a design to prosecute the war with equal vigour. They began to repair to Fortifby Denkirk; orders were published, that all British subjects should quit the dominions of France; many English vessels were seized in the different ports of that kingdom, and their crews sent to prison. At the same time an edict was issued, inviting the French subjects to equip privateers, offering a premium of forty livres for every gun, and as much for every man they should take from the enemy; and promising, that, in case a peace should be speedily concluded, the king would purchase the privateers at prime cost. They employed great number of artificers and seamen in equipping a formidable squadron of ships at Brest; and large numbers of soldiers, sailors, and a considerable number of transports, throughout the island of Great Britain with a dangerous invaeo.

§ IV. The English people were seized with consternation; the ministry were alarmed and perplexed. Colonel Yorke, the British resident at the Hague, was consituted by his majesty to make requisition of the six thousand men whom the States-general are obliged by treaty to furnish, when Great Britain shall be threatened with an invasion; and in February he presented a memorial for this purpose.

Monseigneur d'Affry, the French king's minister at the Hague, having received intimation of his demand, produced a counter-memorial from his master, charging the English and French nations with having not only the means within their power to assist the Dutch, but also having the means of assistance within their reach, and that, by the most manifest breach of promise and the violation of the sacred character of treaties, they had.been guilty of a high crime and a great violation of public faith. The English secretary of state, Sir Robertti, answered, that the powers of the kingdom of Great Britain were not equal to the task of enforcing the terms of the alliance, and that the treaty had become a dead letter. The French minister replied, that the alliance was a matter of prime importance to the French state, and that he would not be deterred from enforcing it by any considerations of that nature. The English minister then intimated, that the English government would not be bound to enforce the terms of the alliance, unless the French government would first comply with certain conditions.

defence: that, in order further to strengthen himself, he had made a requisition of a body of Hessian troops, pursuant to the late treaty, to be forthwith brought over, and for that purpose several transports were sent. He also doubted not of being enabled and supported by his parliament in taking such measures as might be conducive to an end so essential to the honour of his crown, the preservation of the protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of these kingdoms. This message was, however, conveyed to the National Assembly, as well as to both Houses, composed, and presented, very warm and affectionate addresses, in which his majesty was thanked for the resolution he had made of the Hessian troops; a measure on other occasions had been stigmatized with all the satiric and rhetoric of the opposition.

§ VI. Even this precaution was not thought sufficient to secure the island, and quiet the fears of the people. In a few days Mr. Fox, the new minister, encouraged by the unanimity which had appeared so conspicuous in the motions for the late addresses, ventured to move again, in the House of Commons, that another address should be presented to the king, beseeching his majesty, that for the more effectual defence of this island, and for the better security of the religion and liberties of his subjects, against the threatened attack by a foreign enemy, he would be graciously pleased to give his assent to the employment of such troops, together with the usual detachment of artillery, to be forthwith brought into this kingdom. There was a considerable party in the House, to whom such a motion was odious and unacceptable; but considering the state of affairs, they were afraid that a direct opposition might expose them to a more odious suspicion: they, therefore, moved for the order of the day, and insisted on the question's being put upon that motion; but it was carried in the negative by a considerable majority, which also acceded to the other proposal. The resolution of the House was communicated to the Lords, who unanimously concurred: and their joint address being presented, his majesty assured them he would immediately comply with their request. Accordingly, such expedition was used, that, in the course of the next month both Hanoverians and Hessians arrived in England, and encamped in different parts of the kingdom. As the fears of an invasion subsided in the minds of the people, their antipathy to these foreign auxiliaries emerged. They were beheld with the eyes of jealousy, suspicion, and disdain. They were treated with contempt, reserve, and rigour. The ministry was executed for having reduced the nation to such a low circumstance of disgrace, as that they should owe their security to German mercenaries. There were not wanting some incendiaries, who circulated hints and insinuations, that the kingdom had been defrauded of a part of the profit of the navigation, the officers of the enemy. In the meantime, as the experiment could not be immediately tried, and the present juncture demanded some instant determination, recourse was had to a foreign remedy.

§ V. Towards the latter end of March, the king sent a written message to parliament, intimating, that he had received repeated advices, from different persons and places, that a design had been formed by the French court to invade the coast of Great Britain, by the means of forces, ships, artillery, and watelike stores, then notoriously making in the ports of France opposite to the British coast, together with the language of the French ministers in their several addresses to the representatives of that country. The king's message was not without prominence: the States-general instantly ordered his forces both by sea and land, and taken proper measures and precautions for putting his kingdom in a posture of send thither a squadron of ships capable to protect the trade, and frustrate the designs of the enemy. That great province was left to a few considerable ships and frigates, which could be of no other use than that of carrying intelligence from port to port, and enquiring their commanders, by making prize of merchant vessels. Nay, the ministry seemed to pay little or no regard to the remonstrances of Lord North and Lord Bute, a deputy-governor of Minorca, who, in repeated advices, represented the weakness of the garrison which he commanded in St. Philip's castle, the chief fortress on the island. Far from strengthening the garrison or rendering it more secure, they did not even send thither the officers belonging to the islands, who were in great want upon leave of absence, nor give directions for any vessel to transport them, until the French armament was ready to make a descent upon that island.

§ VI. At length the ministry, it is true, having under the eyes of the fleet being universally known, the ministry seemed to musing from their lethargy, and, like persons suddenly waking, acted with hurry and precipitation. Instead of detaching a squadron that in all respects should be superior to the French fleet in the Mediterranean, and bestowing the command of it upon an officer of approved courage and activity, they allotted no more than ten ships of the line for this service; and thus they committed Mr. Byng, who had never met with any occasion to signalize his courage, and whose character was not very popular in the navy; but Mr. West, the second, in command, was a person universally respected for his probity, ability, and resolution. The ten ships destined for this expedition but were in very indifferent order, poorly manned, and unprovided with either hospital or fire-ship. They sailed from Spithead on the seventh day of April, having on board, as part of their complement, a regiment of soldiers to be landed at Gibraltar, with Major-General Stewart, Lord Effingham, and Colonel Cornwallis, whose regiments were in garrison at Minorca; about forty inferior officers, and near one hundred recruits, as a reinforcement to St. Philip's fortress.

§ IX. After all the intelligence which had been received, one would imagine the government of England was still ignorant of the enemy's descent or intention; for the instructions delivered to Admiral Byng import, that on his arrival at Gibraltar, he should inquire whether any French squadron had passed through the straits; and that being defined in the affirmative, as it was probably designed for North America, he should immediately detach Rear-Admiral West to Louisbourg, on the island of Cape-Breton, with such a number of ships as, when joined with those at Halifax, would constitute a force superior to the squadron then in the Mediterrenean. On the seventh day of May, the Admiral Byng arrived at Gibraltar, where he found Captain Edgcumbe, with the Princess Louisa ship of war, and a sloop, who informed him that the French armament, consisting of Minorca, changing to the number of thirteen ships of the line, with a great number of transports, having on board a body of fifteen thousand land forces, had sailed from Toulon on the tenth day of April, and made a descent upon the island of Minorca, from whence he (Captain Edgcumbe) had been obliged to retire at their approach. General Fowke, who commanded at Gibraltar, had received two successive orders from the secretary at war with respect to his sparing a battalion of troops to be transported by Mr. Byng, as a reinforcement to Minorca; but as the two orders appeared inconsistent or equivocal, a council of war was consulted, and the majority were of opinion that no troops should be sent from hence to Minorca, except a detachment to supply the deficiency in the little squadron of Captain Edgcumbe.

had left a good number of his seamen and marines under the command of Captain Scropo, to assist in the defence of Fort St. Philip's. These articles of intelligence the ministry, determined by an express order of the secretary of state, and by the order of the admiralty, to be shown to the Senate, and given to the public, in order to prevent the getting a footing on that island. He complained, that there were no magazines in Gibraltar for supplying the squadron with necessaries of war. The garrison was without arms and stores; the whole of the French batteries and storeshouses were entirely destroyed, so that he should find the greatest difficulty in cleaning the ships that were foul; and this was the case with some of those he carried out from England, as well as with those which had been for some time in a derelict state. He signified him, that, even if it should be found practicable, it would be very impolitic to throw any men into St. Philip's castle, which could not be saved without a land force sufficient to raise the siege; therefore, a small reinforcement would only add so many men to the number which must fall into the hands of the enemy. He observed, that such engineers and artillery-men in Gibraltar, as had seen service and was possible to him, it would be impossible to throw any number of men into St. Philip's if the French had erected batteries on the two shores near the entrance of the harbour, so as to bar all passage up to the salt-port of the fortress; and with this opinion he signified his concurrence. But the council, as part of this letter was downward imprisonment of the minister, for having delayed the expedition, for having sent out ships unfit for service, and for having neglected the magazines and wharfs at Gibraltar. In the latter part he seemed to prepare them for the subsequent account of his misconduct and miscarriage. It cannot be supposed that they underwent this accusation without apprehension and resentment; and, as they foresaw that the French men would not fail to excite a national clamour, perhaps they now began to take measures for gratifying their resentment, and transferring the blame from themselves to the person who had presumed to cast a slur upon their conduct; for this purpose they could not have found a fairer opportunity than Mr. Byng's subsequent behaviour afforded.

§ X. The admiral being strengthened by Mr. Edgcumbe, and reinforced by a detachment from the garrison, set sail from Gibraltar on the eighth day of May, and was joined off Majorca by his majesty's ship the Phoenix, under the command of Captain Hervey, who confirmed the intelligence that the French had sent a reinforcement to the destination of the French squadron. When he approached Minorca, he observed the British colours still flying at the castle of St. Philip's, and several bomb batteries playing upon it from different quarters; but the French did not display them. Thus informed, he detached three ships a-head, with Captain Hervey, to reconnoitre the harbour's mouth, and land, if possible, a letter for General Blakeney, giving him to understand the fleet was come in his assistance. Before this attempt could be made, the French fleet appearing to the south-east, and the wind blowing strong off shore, he recalled his ships, and formed the line of battle. About six o'clock in the evening, the enemy, to the number of seventeen vessels, appeared to approach, and to amount to above five hundred men of the Cape Male.
At day-light the enemy could not be described; but two tartanes appearing close to the rear of the English squadron, they were immediately chased by signal. One escaped, and the other being taken, was found to have on board two French captains, two lieutenants, and about one hundred and sixty men of his conduct; for had they been sent out in tartanes the preceding day, to reinforce the enemy's squadron. This soon re-appearing, the line of battle was formed on each side, and about two o'clock Admiral Byng then gave signal to bear two points from the wind and engage. At this time his distance from the enemy was so great, that Rear-Admiral West could not pursue his advantage without running the risk of seeing his communications with his fleet entirely cut off. In the beginning of the action, the Intrepid, in Mr. Byng's division, was so disabled to her rigging, that she could not be managed, and drove on the ship that was next in position to the Intrepid, on which one side of the enemy was all a-back, in order to avoid confusion, and for some time retarded the action. Certain it is, that Mr. Byng, though accommodated with a noble ship of ninety guns, made little or no use of his artillery, but kept aloof, either from an overstrained observance of discipline, or timidity. When his captain exhorted him to bear down upon the enemy, he was very coolly replied, that he would avoid the error of Admiral Matthews, who, in his engagement with the French and Spanish squadron off Tolus, during the preceding war, had broke the line by his own precipitation, and exposed himself singly to a fire that he could not sustain. Mr. Byng, on the contrary, was determined against acting, except with the line entire; and, on presence of rectifying this disorder, which had happened among some of the ships, hesitated so long, and kept at such a wary distance, that he never was properly engaged, though he received some few shots in his hull. M. de la Galissonière seemed equally averse to the continuance of the battle; part of his squadron had been fairly obliged to quit the line; and though he was rather superior to the English in number of men and weight of metal, he did not engage his vessels, but kept them in a scattered line, as an enemy so expert in naval operation: he, therefore, took advantage of Mr. Byng's hesitancy, and edged away with an easy sail to join his van, which had been discom­fited by the admiral, restoed. But as the enemy's ships were clean, he could not come up and close them there; so they retired at their leisure. Then he put his squadron on the other tack, in order to keep the wind of the enemy; and next morning they were altogether out of sight.

§ XI. While he lay-to with the rest of his fleet, at the distance of ten leagues from Mahon, he detached cruisers to look for some missing ships, which joined him accordingly, and made an inquiry into the condition of the squadron. The number of killed amounted to forty-two, including Captain Andrews, of the Defiance; and about one hundred and sixty-eight were wounded. Three of the capital ships were so damaged in their masts, that they could not keep the sea, with any regard to their safety; a great number of the seamen were ill, and there was no vessel which could be converted into a hospital for the sick. By the advice of Mr. Byng called a council of war, at which the land officers were present. He represented to them, that he was much inferior to the enemy in weight of metal and number of men; that they had the advantage of sending their wounded to Minorca, from whence at the same time they were refreshed and re­inforced occasionally; that in his opinion, it was imprac­ticable to relieve St. Philip's fort, and, therefore, they ought to make the best of their way back to Gibraltar, where, he thought, they might be more immediately con­nected with his sentinels, and thither he di­rected his course accordingly. How he came to be so well acquainted with the impracticability of relieving General Blakeney, it is not easy to determine, as no exper­i­ment was made for that purpose. Indeed, the neglect of such a trial seems to have been the least excusable part of the conduct of the English; for, so soon as the appearance of the enemy was discovered, all the officers and soldiers belonging to the garrison might have been landed at the salt-ports, without running any great risk; and a gentleman, then in the fort, actually passed and re­passed in a horse carriage on the bank of the river.

§ XII. Mr. Byng's letter to the admiral, containing a detail of the action, is said to have arri­ved some days before it was made public, and when it appeared, was cur­tailed of divers expressions, and some paragraphs, which either tended to his own justification, or implied a censure on the conduct of his superiors. Whatever use might have been made of his letter while it remained a secret to the public, we shall not pretend to explain: but sure it is, that on the sixteenth day of June, Sir Edward Hawke and Admiral Saunders sailed from Southeast to Gibraltar, to supersede the admiral Byng and West, in their commands of the Mediterranean squadron; and Mr. Byng's letter was not published till the twentieth day of the same month, when it produced all the effect which that gentle­man's bitterest enemies could have desired. The populace took fire like a train of the most hasty combustibles, and broke out into a chorus of remonstrance against the devoted admiral, as could not have been ex­ceeded if he had lost the whole navy of England, and left the coasts of the kingdom naked to invasion. This animosity was carefully fomented and maintained by artful emissaries, who mingled with all public assemblies, from the drawing-room at St. James's to the mob at Charing-cross. They expatiated upon the insolence, the folly, the coward­ice, and misconduct, of the unhappy admiral. They even presumed to make his sovereign a witness of their opinion, as an instrument of his column, by suggesting, that his majesty had prostituted Byng's misbehavior from the contents of his first letter, dated at Gibraltar. They ridiculed and re­futed the reasons he had given for remaining at anchor after his scandalous rencontre with the French squadron; and, in order to exasperate them to the most implacable resentment, they exaggerated the terrible consequences of losing Minorca, which must now be subdued through his treachery or want of resolution. In a word, he was devoted as the scape-goat of the ministry, to whose supine negligence, ignorance, and misconduct, the loss of that important fortress was undoubtedly owing. Byng's mis­behavior was thus brought before the court of judicature, to engage the attention of the people, that it might not be attracted by the real cause of the national misfortune. In order to keep up the flame which had been kindled against him, they wished to punish him at least. Agents were employed to verify his person in all public places of vulgar resort; and mobs were hired at different parts of the capital, to hang and burn him in effigy.

§ XIII. The two officers who succeeded to the com­mand in the Mediterranean, were accompanied by Lord Tyrwhale, whom his majesty had appointed to supersede General Popham in the government of Gibraltar, that gen­tleman having incurred the displeasure of the ministry, for not having understood an order which was unintell­ligible. By the same conveyance, a letter from the secret­ary to the admiral was transmitted to Mr. Byng, giving him notice that he was recalled. To this intimation he replied in such a manner as denoted a consciousness of having done his duty, and a laudable desire in vindicate his own conduct. His answer contained a further account of the engagement in which he was supposed to have misdemean, intertwined with a statement of the enemy's superiority in weight of metal, which served no other purpose than that of exposing his character still more to ridicule and abuse; and he was again so insolent as to hazarded certain expressions, which added fresh fuel to the resentment of his enemies. Directions were imme­diately dispatched to Sir Edward Hawke, that Byng should be sent home in arrest; and an order to the same pur­pose was lodged at every port in the kingdom: precau­tions, which, however, were ineffectual, to save the life of a man who longed ardently to justify his character by a public trial, were yet productive of considerable effect in augmenting the popular odium. Admiral Brng immediately embarked in the ship which had carried out his successor, and was accompanied by Mr. West, General Fowke, Sir Terence O'Brien, and twenty-four officers, who were also recalled, in consequence of having subscribed to the result of the council of war, which we have mentioned above. When they arrived in England, Mr. West met with such a gracious reception from his majesty as was though due to an extraordinary man; but Mr. West was committed close prisoner in an apartment of Greenwich hospital.

§ XIV. In the meantime, the siege of St. Philip's fort was prosecuted with undiminished vigour. The armament of Toulon, consisting of the fleet commanded by M. de la Galissonniere, and the troops under the Duke de Richelieu, arrived on the eighteenth day of April at the port of Cadizella, and that part of the island opposite to Mahon, or St. Philip's, and immediately began to disembark their forces. Two days before they reached the island, General Blakeney had, by a packet-boat, received certain intelligence of their approach, and began to make preparations for the defence of the castle. The fort by which he commanded was very extensive, surrounded with numerous redoubts, ravelins, and other outworks; and provided with subterraneous galleries, mines, and tunnels. The solid rock with which the fort was immediately laid, I join the whole, was one of the best fortified places in Europe, well supplied with artillery, ammunition, and provision; and, without all doubt, might have sustained the most severe siege, and been defended by a numerous garrison, conducted by able engineers, under the eye and auspices of an active and skilful commander. All these advantages, however, did not occur on this occasion. The number of troops in Minorca did not exceed four regiments, whereas the nature of the works required at least double the number; and, even of these, above forty officers were absent. The chief engineer was rendered lame by the gout, and the general himself oppressed with the infirmities of old age. The natives of the island might have been serviceable as pioneers, or day labourers, but, from their hatred to the Protestant religion, they were generally averse to the English government, although they had hived happily and grown wealthy under its influence.

§ XV. The governor ordered his officers to best up for volunteers in the adjacent town of St. Philip's; but few or none would enlist under his banners, and it seems he would not venture to compel them into the service. He received, however, a few advanced parties, and the company posted at Formelles, where a small redoubt had been raised, and five companies at Cadizella, a post fortified with two pieces of cannon, which were now withdrawn, and the place was being disembarked. The enemy's forces. At the same time Major Cunningham was detached with a party to break down the bridges, and break up the roads between that place and St. Philip's; but the task of destroying the roads could not be performed in such a hurry, on account of the hard rock which runs along the surface of the ground through this whole island; nor was there time to demolish the town of St. Philip's, which stood so near the fort, that the enemy could not fail to take advantage of its neighbourhood. The streets served them for trenches, which otherwise could not have been dug through the solid rock. Here they made a lodgment close to the works: here they found convenient barracks and quarters of refreshment, works for their batteries, and an effectual cover for their mortars and bombards. The general has been blamed for leaving the town standing; but if we consider his uncertainty concerning the destination of the French armament, the odious nature of such a precaution, which could not fail to exasperate the inhabitants, and the impossibility of executing such a scheme after the first appearance of the enemy, he will be found excusable, if not altogether blameless. Some houses which had been actually demolished, so as to clear the approaches and the approaches. All the wine in the cellars of St. Philip's town was destroyed, and the butts were carried into the castle, where they might serve for the defence. The beer; actually supplied vessels were actually supplied for the exposure. Two thousand bakers were hired, and a large number of cattle brought into the fort, for the benefit of the garrison. The ports were walled up, the posts assigned, the sentinels placed, and all the different guards appointed. Commodore Edgcumbe, who then anchored in the harbour of Mahon, close to the redoubts, received in the little squadron, consisting of the Chesterfield, Princess Louisa, Portland, and Dolphi, after having left all his men, a detachment from Gibraltar, the whole crew of the Fortspointe sloop, and the greater part of the Dolphi's, as a reinforcement; but Mr. Brevet, with his division and command of Captain S-roop, of the Dolphi, who, with great gallantry, offered himself for this severe duty, and bravely signalized himself during the whole siege, was detained on the land, and only sent up this harbour in such a manner, as would have prevented the escape of these ships, and divers other rich merchant vessels, which happened then to be at Mahon: but, in all probability, they purposely allowed them to abandon the place, which, in any emergency or assault, their crews and officers would have considerable reinforced. The enemy were perfectly acquainted with the great extent of the works, and the weakness of the garrison, from which circumstance it was derived the most encouraging hopes that the place might be suddenly taken, without the trouble of a regular siege. After Mr. Edgcumbe had sailed for Gibraltar, and General Blakeney had ordered a sloop to be sailed to Minorca, a French squadron made its appearance at this part of the island; but, without having attempted any thing against the fort, fell in leeward of Cape Mola. Next day they came in contact with the shore, and their vessels sailed towards, during the whole course of the siege, approached so near as to give the garrison the least disturbance.

§ XVI. On the twenty-second day of April, the governor sent a letter to the French general with a letter, desiring to know his reasons for invading the islands. To this an answer was returned by the Duke de Richelieu, declaring he was come with intention to reduce the island under the dominion of his most christian majesty, by way of retaliation for the conduct of his master, who had saved and detained the ships belonging to the King of France and his subjects. If we may judge from the first operations of this nobleman, he was but indifferently provided with engineers; for, instead of beginning his approaches on the side of St. Philip's town, close by the straits, where he might have been screened from the fire of the garrison, his batteries were erected at Cape Mola, on the other side of the island, where they were more exposed, their stores being at a great distance from his garrison. The vessel of St. Philip's town, which ought to have been the first object of their consideration, especially as they could find little or no earth to fill their gabions, and open their trenches in the usual form. On the twelfth of May, about one a.m., they opened two bomb batteries near the place where the windmills had been destroyed; and from that period an incessant fire was kept up on both sides, from mortars and cannon, the French continuing to raise new batteries in every situation from whence they could annoy the besieged.

§ XVII. On the seventeenth day of the month, the garrison were transported with joy at sight of the British squadron, commanded by Admiral Brng; and Mr. Bov, commissioner of the stores, ventured to embark in a small boat, with six oars, which passed from St. Stephen's cross, a creek on the west side of the fortification, through a shower of cannon and musketry from the fortification; but on the other side, and actually reached the open seas, his design being to join the squadron; but this being at a great distance, stretching away to the southward, and Mr. Bov perceived himself chased by two of the enemy vessels, which fired on him, and sent a message to the garrison, without having sustained the least damage. A circumstance which plainly confutes the notion of Mr. Bov, that it was impracticable to open a communication with the garrison, after the loss of twenty Minorca. News of the besieged, which had prognosticated a naval victory to the British squadron, a speedy relief to themselves, and no less than captivity to the assailants, were considerably damped by the appearance of the French fleet, which quietly returned to their station off the harbour of Mahon. The French, on being satisfied that the English fleet had been worsted in an engagement by M. de la Galissonnière; and this information was soon confirmed by a general discharge, or feu de joie, through the whole of the English line, in order to celebrate the success they had obtained. How little these had reason to boast of any advantage in the action, the retreat of the English squadron was undoubtedly equivalent to a victory; for had Mr. Bosc acquired and maintained the superiority which might have been obtained, and embarked in Minorca, would, in all probability, have been obliged to surrender prisoners of war to his Britannic majesty. The cause was now much altered in their favour: their squadron cruaded about the island without molestation; and they duly received, by means of their transports, reinforcements of men and ammunition, as well as constant supplies of provisions.

§ XVIII. The English garrison, however mortified at finding themselves thus abandoned, resolved to acquit themselves with gallantry in the defence of the place, not without some remaining hope that the English squadron would be reinforced, and return to their relief. In the meantime, their situation was rendered the more desperate by the increasing resolution. They remounted cannon, the carriages of which had been disabled: they removed them occasionally to places from whence it was judged they could do the greatest effect, and now and then refiired a few shots and laboured with surprising alacrity, even when they were surrounded by the numerous batteries of the foe; when their embrasures, and even the parapets, were demolished, and they stood exposed not only to the cannon and mortars, but also to the musketry, which fired upon them, without ceasing, from the windows of the houses in the town of St. Philip. By this time they were invested with an army of twenty thousand men, and plied incessantly from anti-24 battering cannon, twenty-one mortars, and four howitzers; besides the small arms; nevertheless, the loss of men within the fortress was very considerable, the garrison being mostly secured in the subterraneous works, which were inaccessible to shells or shot. By the twenty-seventh day of June they had made a practicable breach in one of the ravelins, and damaged the other outworks to such a degree, that they determined this night to give it the last blow. Accordingly, between the hours of ten and eleven, they advanced to the attack from all quarters on the land side. At the same time a strong detachment, in armed boats, attempted to force the harbour, and penetrate into the ulterior conditions of the place. Sir Charles and V. and the second attack upon Fort Marlborough, on the farther side of the creek, the most detached of all the outworks. The enemy advanced with great intrepidity, and their commander, the Duke de Richelieu, is said to have led them up to the works in person. Such an assault could not but be attended with great slaughter; they were mowed down as they approached, with grape shot and musketry; and several mines were sprung with great effect, so that the elains was almost covered with the dying and the dead. Nevertheless, they persevered with uncommon resolution; and though repulsed on every other side, at length made a lodgement in the Queen’s Redan, which had been a few hours ago the strongest post in the place. Whether their success in this quarter was owing to the weakness of the place, or the timidity of the defender, certainly, the enemy were in possession before it was known to the officers of the garrison; for Lieutenant-Colonel Jeffreys, the second in command, who had acquired himself since the beginning of the siege with equal courage, skill, and activity, in his visitation of this post, was suddenly surrounded and taken by a file of French grenadiers, at a time when he never dreamt that the enemy had made lodgement. Major Cunningham, who accompanied him, met with a severer fate, though he escaped captivity: he was run through the arm with a bayonet, and the piece being disengaged, he was conveyed to the hospital with the colours flying from the top of the staff, in such a manner, that he was maimed for life. In this shocking condition he retired behind a traverse, and was carried home to his quarters. Thus the governor was deprived of his two principal assistants, one being taken, and the other disabled.

§ XIX. The enemy having made themselves masters of Anstruther’s and King’s Redans, and the breach of the fort, they might have been dislodged, had a vigorous effort been made for that purpose, before they had leisure to secure themselves. The Duke de Richelieu ordered a parley to be held in person to that end; but as it was not permitted to remove the wounded. This request was granted with more humanity than discretion, inasmuch as the enemy took this opportunity to throw a reinforcement of men privately into the places where the lodgements had been made, and from these penetrations, though of the utmost difficulty, the enemy communicated with all the other outworks. During this short cessation, General Blakeney summoned a council of war to deliberate upon the state of the fort and garrison; and the majority declared for a capitulation. The works were in many places ruined; the body of the castle was shattered; many guns were dismounted, the embrasures and parapets demolished, the palisadoes broke in pieces, the garrison exhausted with hard duty and incessant watching, and the enemy in possession of the subterranean communications. Besides, the governor had received information from prisoners, that the Duke de Richelieu was alarmed by a report that the Marshal Duke de Bléville would be sent to assume the command in the inelocity, and for that reason would hazard another desperate assault, which it was the opinion of the majority the garrison could not sustain. These considerations, added to the despair of being relieved, induced a council of war to determine a capitulation. The measure was not taken with the unanimous consent of the council. Some officers observed, that the garrison was very little diminished, and still in good spirits: that no breach was made in the body of the castle; nor was the cannon erected in breach: that the loss of an outwork was never deemed a sufficient reason for surrendering such a fortress: that the countercarp was not yet taken, nor, on account of the rocky soil, could be taken, except by assault, which would cost the enemy a greater number than they had lost in their late attempt: that they could not attack the ditch, or batter in breach before the countercarp should be taken, and even then they must have recourse to galleries before they could pass the fosse, which was furnished with mines and countermines; finally, they suggested, that in all probability the British squadron would be reinforced, and sail back to their relief; or, if it should not, it was the duty of the governor to defend the place to extremity, without having any regard to the consequences. These remarks were overruled, the chamade was beat, a conference ensued, and very honourable conditions of capitulation established. The garrison capitulated, that the garrison should march out with all the honours of war, and be conveyed by sea to Gibraltar. The French were put in possession of one gate, as well as Fort Charles and Marlborough redoubt; but the English troops remained in the other works till the seventh day of July, when they embarked. In the meantime reciprocal civilities passed between the commanders and officers of the two nations.
the island, and intercept the supplies which were daily sent to the enemy. Had he reached Minorca sooner, he might have discomfited the French squadron: but he could not, or he would have raised the siege of St. Philip's. Duke de Richelieu had received word of this, and such a train of artillcry as no fortification could long withstand. Indeed, if the garrison had been only reinforced, and the communication with it opened by sea, the defence would naturally have been repulsed, and so might have been made, that their assailants would have had cause to repent of their enterprise.

§ XXI. When the news of this conquest was brought to Versailles, the amount of rejoicing from the Duke de Richelieu had despatched for that purpose, the people of France were transported with the most extravagant joy. Nothing was seen but triumphs and processions: nothing heard but anthems, congratulations, and hyperbolical encomiums upon the conqueror of Minorca, who was celebrated in a thousand poems and studied orations; while the conduct of the English was vilified and ridiculed in ballads, farces, and pamphlets. Nothing more assuages the dignity of a warlike nation than the pride of such mean triumphs, for an advantage, which, in more vigorous times, would scarce have been distinguished by the ceremony of a Te Deum laudamus. Nor is this childish exultation inconsistent with the servility of the conqueror, confined to the small extent of the kingdom of France. Truth obliges us to own, that even the subjects of Great Britain are apt to be elevated by success into an illogical mixture of self-applause and contempt of their conquerors. This may be considered as a proof of unmanly arrogance and absurd self-conceit, by all those who coolly reflect, that the events of war generally, if not always, depend upon the genius or misconduct of one individual. The loss of Minorca was severely felt as a national disgrace; but, instead of producing dejection and despondence, it excited a universal clamour of rage and resentment, not only against Mr. Byron, who had retreated from the French squadron; but against his country, which was taxed with having neglected the security of Minorca. Nay, some politicians were inflamed into a suspicion, that this important place had been negatively betrayed into the hands of the enemy, that, in case the arms of Great Britain should prosper in other parts of the world, the French king might have some sort of equivalent to restore for the conquests which should be abandoned at the peace. This notion, however, appears to have been conceived from prejudice and party, which now began to appear with more acrimony than before, and not only throughout the united kingdoms in general, but even in the sovereign's councils.

§ XXII. Sir Edward Hawke, being disappointed in his hopes of capturing La Galissonerie, and relieving the English garrison of St. Philip's, at least asserted the empire of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, by annulling the commerce of the enemy, and blocking up the squadron to the harbour of Toulon. Understanding that the Austrian government at Leghorn had detained an English privateer, and imprisoned the captain, on pretence that he had violated the neutrality of the port, he detached two ships of war to insist in a peremptory manner, on the release of the ship, effects, crew, and captain; and they thought proper to comply with his demand, even without waiting for orders from the court of Vienna. The person in whose behalf the admiral thus interposed, was one Foulke Wright, a native of the island of Jersey; and the stranger to a sea-life, had, in the last war, equipped a privateer, and distinguished himself in such a manner, by his uncommon vigour and celerity, that, if he had been indulged with a command suitable to his genius, he would have deserved as honourable a place in the annals of the navy, as that which the French have bestowed upon their boasted Guis Tronin, Du Bart, and Thurot. An unassuming spirit was the recommendation of his being thus detained at this juncture. While he lay at anchor in the harbour of Leghorn, commander of the St. George privateer of Liverpool, a small ship of twelve guns and eighty men, a large French xebec, mounted with sixteen cannon, and manned by a number of his complements, chose for station in view of the harbour, in order to intercept the British commerce. The gallant Wright could not endure this insult: notwithstanding the enemy's superiority in metal and number of men, he weighed anchor and engaged with all the vigour of the shore, and after a very obstinate dispute in which both the captain, lieutenant, and above threescore of the men belonging to the xebec were killed on the spot, he obliged them to sheer off, and returned to the harbour in triumph. This brave corsair would, no doubt, have signallized himself by many other exploits, had he not, to the sequel, been overtaken in the midst of his career by a dreadful storm, in which the ship foundered, and all his crew perished.

§ XXIII. Sir Edward Hawke, having secured the Mediterranean, and insulted the enemy's ports, returned with the homeward-bound trade to Gibraltar; from whence, about the latter end of the year, he set sail for England with part of his squadron, leaving the rest in that bay, for the protection of our commerce, which, in those parts, soon began to suffer extremely from French privateers, that now swarmed in the Mediterranean. General Blakeney had arrived with the garrisons of Minorca, at Portsmouth, in the month of November, and been received with expressions of tumultuous joy: every place through which he passed celebrated his return with bonfires, illuminations, salutes, and salutes, crowned by a sword of adoration, while the other sunk into an object of reproach; and they were viewed at different ends of a false perspective, through the medium of prejudice and passion; of a perspective artfully contrived, and applied by certain ministers for the purposes of self-interest and deceit. The sovereign is said to have been influenced by the prepossessions of the ——t. Mr. Blakeney met with a gracious reception from his majesty, who raised him to the rank of a peer; and of Blakeney, which was milled into the order of knighthood, for his services, while some malcontents murmured at this mark of favour, as an unreasonable sacrifice to popular misapprehension.

§ XXIV. In the beginning of the year, the measures taken by the government in England seem to have been chiefly dictated by the dread of an invasion, from which the ministers did not think themselves secured by the guard ships and cruisers on different parts of the coast, or the stationary troops of the kingdom, though reinforced by the two bodies of German auxiliaries. A considerable number of new troops was levied: the success in recruiting was not only promoted by the landholders throughout the kingdom, but improved all services, and the better service; but for that reason encouraged their dependants to engage in the service; but also in a great measure owing to a dearth of corn, which reduced the lower class of labourers to such distress, that some insurrections were raised, and many enlisted with a view to obtain a livelihood, which otherwise they could not earn. New ships of war were built, and daily put in commission; but it was found impracticable to man them, without having recourse to the odious and illegal practice of impressing sailors, which must always be a reproach to every free people. Notwithstanding large bounties, granted by the government to volunteers, it was found necessary to lay an embargo upon all shipping and impress all seamen, which was done, without any regard to former protections: so that all the merchant ships were stripped of their hands, and foreign commerce for some time wholly suspended. Nay, the expedient of compelling men into the service was carried to an unusual degree of oppression; for rewards were publicly offered to those who should discover where any seamen lay concealed: so that those unhappy people were in danger of being haled from their houses, and their families and connections to confinement, mutilation, and death, and totally cut off from the enjoyment of that liberty, which, perhaps, at the expense of their lives, their own arms had helped to preserve, in favour of their ungrateful country.

§ XXV. About eighty ships of the line and threescore frigates, Levant, and others, formed themselves into a very laudable association.
frigates were already equipped, and considerable bodies of land forces assembled, when, on the third day of February, a proclamation was issued, requiring all officers, civil and military, upon the first appearance of any hostile attempt to land upon the coasts of the kingdom immediately to drive all horses, oxen, or cattle, which might be found for draught or burden, and not actually employed in the king's service, or in the defence of the country, and also (so far as it was possible) to deprive the respective owners, of all cattle and provisions, ca.

been driven and removed twenty miles at least from the place where such hostile attempt should be made, and to secure the same, so as that they might not fall into the hands or power of those who should make such attempt: realised, however, that the respective owners should suffer as little damage as might be consistent with the public safety.

§ XXVI. As the ministry were determined to make their chief efforts against the enemy in North America, where the first hostilities had been committed, and where the strongest impression could be made, a detachment of two regiments was sent thither, under the conduct of General Abraham, appointed as successor to General Shirley, whom they had recalled, as a person no ways qualified to conduct military operations: nor, indeed, could any success in war be expected from a man who had not been trained to arms, nor ever acted but in a civil capacity. But the ministry of that time rejected the proposition, and the king's commission was conferred upon the Earl of Loudoun, a nobleman of an amiable character, who had already distinguished himself in the service of his country. Over and above this consideration there was the further observation, that the government and colonel of a royal American regiment, consisting of four battalions, to be raised in that country, and disciplined by officers of experience, invited from foreign service. Mr. Abercrombie set abroad for America in March; but the Earl of Loudoun, who directed in chief the plan of operations, and was vested with power and authority little inferior to those of a viceroys, did not embark till the latter end of May.

§ XXVII. All these previous measures being taken, his majesty, in the course of the same month, thought proper to publish a declaration of war against the French king, importing, that, since the treaty of Als-Chappele, the usurpations and encroachments made upon the British territories in America had been notorious: that his Britannic majesty had, in divers serious representations to the court of Versailles, complained of these repeated acts of violence, and demanded satisfaction; but notwithstanding the repeated assurances given by the French king, that every thing should be settled agreeably to the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, and particularly that the evacuation of the four neutral islands in the West Indies should be performed at once, and, as a mark of good faith, and of the treaties on which they were founded, had been evaded under the most frivolous pretences: that the unjustifiable practices of the French governors, and officers acting under their authority, were still continued, until they broke out in open acts of hostility in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four; when, in time of profound peace, without any declaration of war, without any previous notice given, or application made, a body of French troops, commanded by an officer bearing the French king's commission, attacked in a hostile manner, and took possession of an English fort on the river Ohio, in North America: that great naval armament were prepared in the ports of France, and a considerable body of French troops embargoed for that country: that although the French ambassado had sent a long series of despatches containing propositions of a desire to accommodate those differences, it appeared their real design was only to amuse and gain time for the passage of troops and reinforcements, which they intended should swell the strength of the enemy in America, and enable them to carry their ambitious and oppressive projects into execution: that in consequence of the just and necessary measures taken by the King of Great Britain for preventing the success of the latter, and the mischiefs which an immediate recall of the French ambassador was immediately recalled from England, the fortifications of Dunkirk were enlarged, great bodies of troops marched down to the sea-coasts of France, and the British dominions threatened with an invasion: that the King of England, in order to frustrate such intentions, had given orders for seating at sea the ships of the French king and his subjects, yet he had hitherto contented himself with detaining those ships which had been taken, and preserving their cargoes entire, without proceeding to confiscation: but it being at last evinced, from the hostile invasion of Minorca, that the court of Versailles was determined to reject all proposals of accommodation, and carry on the war at home and abroad: that the French crown might no longer, consistently with the honour of his crown, and the welfare of his subjects, remain within those bounds, which from a sense of peace he had been led to demand, be resolved to pursue the war with a still more consistent and unwavering conduct, and was concluded with an assurance, that all the French subjects residing in Great Britain and Ireland, who should demean themselves dutifully to the government, might depend upon its protection, and be safe in their persons and effects.

§ XXVIII. In the beginning of June the French king declared war in his turn against his Britannic majesty, and his declaration was couched in terms of uncommon severity. He artfully threw a shade over the beginning of hostilities in North America, referring to a memorial which had been delivered to the several courts of Europe, containing a summary of those facts which related to the present war, and the negotiations by which it had been preceded. He insisted on the attack made by the King of England, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four, on the French possessions in North America; and afterwards by the English navy on the navigation and commerce of the French subjects, in contempt of the laws of nations, and direct violation of treaties. He complained that the French soldiers and sailors underwent the harshest treatment in the British isles, exceeding those bounds which are prescribed by the laws, both by the law of nature, and common humanity. He affirmed, that while the English ministry, under the appearance of sincerity, imposed upon the French ambassador with false protestations, others diametrically opposite to these deceitful assurances of a speedy accommodation were actually carrying into execution in North America: that while the court of London employed every caballing art, and squandered away the subsidises of England, to instigate other powers against France, his most Christian majesty did not even ask of these powers the succours which guarantees or Neve Scoria; and all the land between the rivers Ohio and Oushabako. A memorial was afterwards presented on the same subject, including the case of the neutral islands in the West Indies, but this was simply referred to another paper, with which the ambassador's despatches were also at this very opening of the negotiations established at Paris, for terminating the war. In the same month the French king extended his voice to the five neutral islands in the West Indies, which he declared were to be immediately evacuated by the English. This would have threatened the destruction of the British settlements and commerce in the northern parts of America, and the French king, without any shadow of right, prohibited the English from trading there. He ordered his troops in America to embark. He also made an offer for the cession of the island of Saint Domingo, which the English refused. It was represented to the ministry, that a great body of troops, under the command of General Shirley, had been landed in the province of Carolina, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three, and that they were in possession of all the lands which they had invaded: that his Britannic majesty had complained of those hostilities; that his Britannic majesty had found himself obliged to defend the security of his subjects and that the success which the French had met with at that time had forced him to employ the French ships and sailors, in order to deprive that court of the means of projecting on the English dominions which they much desired in all the courts of Europe had endured England.

and defensive treaties authorized him to demand; but recommended to them such measures only as tended to their own peace and security: that while the English navy, by the most violent successes, and sometimes by the vilest arts and subterfuges, made captures of French vessels, navigating in full view of the English coast, the British majesty released an English frigate taken by a French squadron; and British vessels traded to the ports of France without molestation: that the striking contrast formed by these different circumstances of proceeding would convince all Europe that one court was guided by motives of jealousy, ambition, and avarice, and that the conduct of the other was founded on principles of honour, justice, and moderation: that the vague imputations contained in the late and ill-timed declaration, in reality no foundation; and the very manner in which they were set forth would prove their falsity and falsehood: that the mention made of the works at Dunkirk, and the troops assembled on the coasts of the ocean, implied the most gross attempts to deceive mankind into a belief that these were the points which determined the King of England to issue orders for seizing the French vessels; whereas the works at Dunkirk were not begun in the year 1680, two French ships of war had been taken by an English squadron; and deputations had been committed six months upon the subjects of France before the first battles began their march for the sea-side. In a word, the most Christian king, in a perfect political system which had rendered people value themselves above all the nations upon the face of the earth, very roundly taxes his brother monarch's administration with piracy, perfidy, inhumanity, and deceit.

A charge conveyed in such reproachful terms, against one of the most respectable crowned heads in Europe, will appear the more extraordinary and injurious, if we consider that the accusers were well acquainted with the falsity of their own imputations, and, at the same time, conscious of having practised those very arts which they affected so much to decry. For after all, it must be allowed, that nothing could be justly urged against the English government, with respect to France, except the omission of a mere form, which other nations might interpret into an irregularity, but could not construe into perfidious dealing, as the French had previously violated the peace by their insurrection and encroachments.

§ XXXIX. Whatever might have been the opinion of other nations, certain it is, the subjects of Great Britain heartily approved of the hostilities committed and intended against a people, whom they have always considered as their friends, neighbours, and the members of the family of Europe. They cheerfully contributed to the expense of armaments, and seemed to approve of their destination, in hopes of being able to wipe off the disgraces they had sustained in the defeat of Bredwood, and the loss of Minorca. The last event was essentially important to the honour of the community. An address was presented to the king by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, containing strong hints to the disadvantage of the ministry. They expressed their apprehension that the loss of the important fortress of St. Philip and island of Minorca, possessions of the utmost consequence to the commerce and naval strength of Great Britain, without any attempt to timely and effectual succours to prevent or defeat an attack, after such early notice of the enemy's intentions, and when his majesty's navy was so evidently superior to theirs, would be an indelible reproach on the honour of the British nation. They stated the danger to which the British possessions in America were exposed, by the mismanagement and delays which had attended the defence of those insalubrious colonies, the subject and object of such numerous depredations on the wealth and strength of these kingdoms. They lamented the want of a constitutional and well regulated militia, the most natural and certain defence against all invaders whatsoever. They signified their hope, that the authors of the late losses and disappointments would be detected, and brought to condign punishment: that his majesty's known intentions of protecting and defending his subjects in their rights and possessions might be faithfully and vigorously carried into execution; and the large supplies so necessarily demanded, and so cheerfully granted, might be religiously applied to the defence of these kingdoms, their colonies, and their commerce, as well as to the augmentation of those British forces and armories, the only sure means of obtaining a lasting and honourable peace.

In answer to this address the king assured them, that he would not fail to do justice upon any persons who should have been wanting in their duty both in the conduct and execution of his majesty's designs in the fleets and armies; and to support the authority and respect due to his government. Remonstrances of the same kind were presented by different counties and corporations; and the populace clamoured aloud for inquiry and justice.

§ XXX. The first vicissitudes offered to the enraged multitude was the unfortunate General Fowke, who had been deputy-governor of Gibraltar and been tried for the breach of a conduct and integrity in the exercise of that important office, till that period, when he fell under the displeasure of the government. He was now brought to trial before a board of general officers, and accused of having disobeyed the orders he had received from the secretary at war, in three successive letters, touching the relief of Minorca. Mr. Fowke alleged in his own defence that the orders were confused and contradictory, and implied a discretionary power; that the whole number of his garrison did not exceed three thousand six hundred men, after he had spared two hundred and seventy-five to the ships commanded by Mr. Edgecumbe: that the ordinary duty of the garrison required the supply of his officers for the navy, and the number of men sufficient for three reliefs; that, if he had detached a battalion on board the fleet, he should not have had above two reliefs, at a time when he believed the place was in danger of being attacked, for good reasons, which he did not think himself bound to mention unless he should be being doubtful, he held a council of war, which was of opinion, that as undersold intelligence was received of the French army's being landed at Minorca, to the number of between thirteen and sixteen thousand men, and that a French squadron of sixteen ships was stationed off the harbour, sending a detachment equal to a battalion from

That immediately after the declaration of war, the British ships and caravages which had been taken, were tried, and condemned at several courts of admiralty, and their owners bound to bring them into the port. But in the year 1680, the said prisoners were discharged, and the

Gibraltar would be an ineffectual supply for the relief of the place, and a weakening of the garrison from which they must be sent. He observed, that supposing the orders to have been positive, and seven hundred men detached to Miltia, it would appear that the number would not have exceed one thousand five hundred and sixty-six: a deduction of seven hundred more, according to the order of May the twelfth, would have left a remnant of only two hundred and forty, to be on duty in the garrison, including artificers and labourers in the king's works, amounted to eight hundred and twenty-nine; so that if he had complied with the orders as they arrived, he would not have had more than seventeen men in his force. His principal duty now, was the work of the garrison: thus the important fortress of Gibraltar must, at this critical conjuncture, have been almost left naked and defenceless to the attempts of the enemy; and had those detachments been actually sent abroad, it afterwards appeared that they could not have been landed on the island of Minorca. The order transmitted to General Wolfe to detain all empty vessels, for a further transportation of troops, seems to have been superfluous; for it can hardly be supposed he could have occasion for them, unless to embark the whole garrison and abandon the place. It seems likewise to have been unnecessary to exhort the general to keep the garrison as alert as possible, distrusted and under suspicion: it was, however, impossible for the men to have enjoyed the least repose or intermission of duty, had the orders been punctually and literally obeyed. What other assistance it might have been desirable to give was immediately ordered by General Fauconnier, at the head of the garrison, or in what manner he could avoid exhausting his garrison, while there was an impossibility of relieving the guards, it is not easy to comprehend. Be that as it may, when the trial was finished, and the question put to acquit or suspend for one year, the court was equally divided; and in such cases the casting vote being vested in the president, he threw it into the scale against the prisoner, whom his conduct and the facts of the case rendered liable to punishment.

§ XXXI. The expectation of the public was now eager, turned towards America, the chief if not the sole scene of our military operations. On the twenty-fifth day of June, Mr. Abercrombie arrived at Albany, the frontier of New York, and assumed the command of the forces there assembled, consisting of two regiments which had served under Braddock, two battalions raised in America, two regiments now transported from England, four independent companies, and the troops which had been in New York, the New Jersey regiment, four companies serving in North Carolina, and a body of provincial forces raised by the government of New England. Those to the southward, indeed, had been divided, but was yet determined on any regular plan of operation, and were moreover hard pressed in defending their western frontiers from the French and Indians, who, in skulking parties, made frequent irruptions upon their unguarded settlements, burning, plundering, and massacring with the most savage inhumanity. As for South Carolina, the proportion of negro slaves to the number of white inhabitants was so great in that colony, that the government could not, with any regard to the safety of the province, spare any reinforcement for the general enterprise. The plan of this undertaking had been settled in the preceding year in a council of war, held at New York. There it was resolved to attack the fort of Niagara, which had been for many years maintained in New York, Ontario and Erie, in order to cut off the communication between Canada and Louisiana, and prevent the French from supporting their new fortresses on the Ohio: to reduce Trois-Rivières, however, from which the St. Lawrence mouth could be maintained, and by a direct attack upon the frontiers of New York might be delivered from the danger of an invasion, and Great Britain become master of the lake Champlain, over which the forces might be transported in any future attempt to besiege Fort Duquesne, upon the Ohio: and to detach a body of troops from the river Connecticut, to aid the capital of Canada. This plan was too extensive for the number of troops which had been prepared: the season was too far advanced before the regiments arrived from England, to permit the supply of provisions necessary to maintain the army in action, and Mr. Abercrombie postponed the execution of any important scheme till the arrival of Lord Loudoun, who was daily expected. The reasons that delayed the reinforcement, and detained his lordship so long, we do not pretend to explain, though we may be allowed to observe, that many fair opportunities have been lost, by the neglect and dawdling of that part of the army. Certain it is, the unaccountable delay of this armament rendered it useless for a whole year, afforded time and leisure to the enemy to take their precautions against any subsequent attack. For this reason, it is not sufficient to mean the need no molestation in distressing the British settlements. Even before this period, they had attacked and reduced a small post in the country of the Five Nations, occupied by twenty-five Englishmen, who were cruelly butchered to a man, in the midst of those Indians whom Great Britain had long numbered among her allies.

§ XXXII. Soon after this expedition, having received intelligence that a considerable convoy of provisions and stores for the garrison of Oswego, would in a little time set out for Schenectady, and be conveyed in batteaux up the river Onondaga, they formed an ambuscade among the woods and thickets on the north side of that river; but understanding the convoy had passed before they reached the place, they resolved to wait the return of the detachment. Their design, however, was frustrated by the vigilance and valour of Colonel Bradstreet, who expected such an attempt, and had prepared for it accordingly. On the third day of July, while the enemy were marching with their batteaux from Oswego, with a few of the foremost took possession of a small island, where he was forthwith attacked by a party of the enemy, who had forded the river for that purpose; but these were soon repulsed. Another body having passed a mile higher, be advanced to them at the head of two hundred men, and fell upon them, sword in hand, with such vigour, that many were killed on the spot, and the rest driven into the river with such promptitude that number of them were drowned. Having received information that a third body of them had passed at a ford still higher, he marched thither without hesitation, and pursued them to the other side, where they were entirely routed and dispersed. In this action, which lasted near three hours, about seventy of the batteaux men were killed or wounded, but the enemy lost double the number killed, and above seventy taken prisoners. In all probability the whole detachment of the French, amounting to several hundred men, would have been cut off, had not a heavy rain interrupted, and disabled Colonel Bradstreet from following his blow; for that same night he was joined by Captain Patten with his detachment of the New York men, which had marched from Oswego, and next morning reinforced with two hundred men, detached to his assistance from the garrison of Oswego; but by this time the rainets were so swelled by the rain, that it was found impracticable to pursue the enemy through the woods and thickets. Patten and his grenadiers accompanied the detachment to Oswego, while Bradstreet pursued his voyage to Schenectady, from whence he returned to Albany, and communicated to General Abercrombie the intelligence he had received from the prisoners, that a large body of the enemy were encamped on the eastern side of the lake Ontario, provided with artillery, and all other implements to besiege the fort of Oswego.

§ XXXIII. In the attack on the fort of Niagara, Major-General Webb was ordered to hold himself in readiness to march with one regiment to the relief of that garrison: but, before they could be provided with necessaries, the Earl of Loudoun arrived in a party of two hundred men on the twentieth day of July. The army at this time is said to have consisted of regular troops to the number of two thousand six hundred, about seven thousand provincials, supposed to be in readiness to march from Fort William Henry, under the command of General Winslow, and above a considerable number of bateau men at Albany and Schenectady. The garrison at Oswego amounted to fourteen hundred soldiers, besides three hundred workmen and sailors, either for the fort or in the fleet. The post was between the fort and place called Burnet's Field, to secure a passage through the country of the Six Nations, upon whose friendship there was no longer any reliance. By the best accounts received of the enemy's force, they had about three thousand men at Crown Point and Ticonderoga, upon the lake Champlain: but their chief strength was collected upon the banks of the lake Ontario, where they found the navy and the garrison in a state of expected to reduce to the English fort at Oswego. The immediate object, therefore, of Lord Loudoun's attention was the relief of this place; but his design was sternly opposed by the province of New York, which was then under the government of Captains Vail and Fox, who more aptly to secure the reduction of Crown Point, and the security of their own frontiers, which they apprehended was connected with this conquest. Their insistence upon Winslow's demand for a further advance of twenty miles, before he should march against this fortress; and stipulated that a body of reserve should be detained at Albany, for the defence of that frontier, in case Winslow should fail in his enterprise, and be defeated. At length they agreed, that the regiment which Mr. Abercorn had destined for that purpose should be detached for the relief of Oswego: and on the twelfth day of August, Major-General Webb began his march with it from Albany; his arrival at the Currying-place, between the Mollock's river and Wood's creek, he received the disagreeable news that Oswego was taken, and the garrison made prisoners of war. Mr. Webb, apprehending himself in danger of being attacked, and being on the verge of any, hastened to render the creek impassable, even to canoes, by felling trees, and throwing them into the stream; while the enemy, ignorant of his numbers, and apprehensive of a lake visitation of the very same kind of prevention, in his approach: in consequence of this apprehension, he was permitted to retire unmolested.

§ XXXIV. The loss of the two small forts, called Ontario and Oswego, was a considerable national misfortune. They were erected on the south side of the great lake Ontario, standing on the opposite sides, at the mouth of the Ondada river, that discharges itself into the lake, and constituted a post of great importance, where vessels had been built, to cruise upon the lake, which is a kind of Irish land, and interrupt the commerce as well as the motions and designs of the enemy. The garrison, as we have already observed, consisted of four hundred men, chiefly militia and new-raised recruits, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Mercer, an officer of courage and experience; but the situation of the forts was very ill chosen; the materials mostly timber or logs of wood; the defences were lately contracted, disorganized; and, in a word, the place altogether untenable against any regular approach. Such were the forts which the enemy wisely resolved to reduce. Being under no apprehension for Crown Point, they assembled a body of troops and a fleet, numbering thirty-two hundred regulars, seven hundred Canadians, and a considerable number of Indian auxiliaries, under the command of the Marquis de Montcalm, a vigilant and enterprising officer, to whom the conduct of the siege was intrusted by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, governor and lieutenant-general of New France. The first step taken by Montcalm was to block up Oswego by water, with two large armed vessels, and post a strong body of Canadians on the road between Albany and the forts, to cut off all communication of succour and intelligence. In the meantime, he embarked his artillery and stores upon the lake, and landed them in the bay of Narsou, the place of disembarkation for Oswego, where he landed the twenty-two hundred barrels of powder, two hundred large morts, and other stores of the like destination. On the twenty-seventh day of July, Commodore Holmes, being in the same latitude, with two large ships and a couple of sloops, engaged two French ships of the line and four frigates, and obliged them to sheer off, after an obstinate duel of two and a half days, accounted for two of them in this country, as well as in the West India islands belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and as those seas swarmed with French vessels, their cruises proved very advantageous to the cause of the British.

§ XXXVII. Scenes of higher import were this year acted by the British arms in the East Indies. The cessation of hostilities between the English and French companies in the West India Islands, had given them an opportunity to visit their native country, was not of long duration; for in a few months both sides recommenced their operations, no longer as auxiliaries to the princes of the country, but as principals and rivals, both in arms and commerce. Major Lawrence, who now enjoyed the chief command of the English force, obtained divers advantages over the enemy; and prosecuted his success with such vigour, as, in all probability, would, in a little time, have transmitted this country to his own, when the progress of his arms was interrupted and suspended by an unfortunate event at Calcutta, the cause of which is not easily explained: for extraordinary pains have been taken by the English in their settlement, to mitigate the calamity, whenever that calamity was immediately or remotely derived.

§ XXXVIII. The old Suba or Vicerey of Bengal, Bazar, and Orixa, dying in the month of April, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, was succeeded by his adopted son, Sur Raja al Dowlat, a young man of great passions, without principle, fortitude, or good faith, who began his administration with acts of perfidy and violence. In all probability, his design against the English settlements was suggested by his rapacious disposition, on a belief that they abounded with treasure; as the pretences which he used for commencing hostilities were altogether inconsistent, false, and frivolous. In the month of May, he caused the English families of Cassimbar to be invested, and inviting Mr. Watts, the chief of the factory, to a conference, under the sanction of a safe conduct, detained him as prisoner; then, by means of fraud and force, intermingled, made himself master of the factory. This exploit being achieved, he made no secret of his design to deprive the English of all their settlements. With this view he marched to Calcutta, at the head of a numerous army, and invested the place, which was then in no posture of resistance.

§ XXXIX. The governor, intimidated by the number and power of the enemy, abandoned the fort, and, with some principal persons residing in the settlement, took refuge on board the ships, leaving them their most valuable effects, and the books of the company. Thus the defence of the place devolved upon Mr. Holwell, the second in command, who, with the assistance of a few gallant officers, and a very feeble garrison, maintained it with uncommon courage and resolution against several attacks, until he was overpowered by numbers, and the enemy had forced their way into the castle. Then he was obliged to submit; and the suba, or vicerey, promised, on the word of a soldier, that no injury should be done to him or his garrison. Nevertheless, they were all driven, to the number of one hundred and forty-six persons of both sexes, into a place called the black-hole prison, a cube of about sixteen feet, walled up to the eastward and southward, the only quarters from which they could expect the least refreshing air, and open to the westward by two windows strongly barred with iron, through which there was no perceptible circulation. The humane reader will conceive what horror the miserable situation to which they must have been reduced, when thus screwed up in a close, strait night under such a climate as that of Bengal, especially when he reflects that many of them were wounded, and all of them crowded with hardship. Transported with rage to find themselves thus barbarously caught up in a place where they must be exposed to suffocation, those hapless victims endeavoured to force their way to the window, and to gain their escape, but with very great difficulty. The barbarians by whom they were surrounded; but all their efforts were ineffectual; the door was made to open inwards, and being once shut upon them, the crowd pressed upon it so strongly as to render all their efforts abortive: then they were overwhelmed with distraction and despair. Mr. Holwell, who had placed himself at one of the windows, to look about, or see if there were any means of escape, was accosted by the guard, and having endeavoured to excite his compassion, by drawing a pathetic picture of their sufferings, promised to gratify him with a thousand rupees in the morning, if he could find means to rescue one half of those wretched sufferers alone such a step could be taken, was asleep, and no person durst disturb his repose. By this time a profuse sweat had broke out on every individual, and this was attended with an insatiable thirst, which became the more intolerable as the body was drained of its moisture. In vain those miserable objects stripped themselves of their clothes, squatted down on their hams, and fanned the air with their hats, to produce a refreshing evaporation. Many were unable to rise again from this posture, but fell down were to death, or suffocated. The dreadful symptom of thirst was now accompanied with a difficulty of respiration, and every individual gasped for breath. Their despair increased their agony, and those who attempted to force the door, and provoke the guard to fire upon them by execution and abuse. The cry of "Water! Water!" issued from every mouth. Even the Jemmoutaar was moved to compassion at their distress. He ordered his soldiers to bring some skins of water, which served only to enrage the appetite, and increase the general agitation. There was no other way of convey ing it through the windows but by hats, and this was rendered ineffectual by the eagerness and transports of the wretched general, who, at sight of it, struggled and raved even in fits of delirium. In consequence of these contests, very little reached those who stood nearest the windows, while the rest at the further end of the place were totally excluded, and all relief, and continued calling upon their friends for assistance, and conjuring them by all the tender ties of pity and affection. To those who were indulged, it proved perilous; for, instead of allaying their thirst, it enraged their impatience for more. The confusion became general and horrid: all was clamour and contest; those who were at a distance endeavoured to force their passage to the window, and the weak were pressed down to the ground, never to rise again. The multitude of prisoners received entertainment from their misery: they supplied the prisoners with more water, and held up lights close to the bars, that they might enjoy the infinite pleasure of seeing them fight for the precious fluid; some of them, at times, seeing all his particular friends lying dead around him, and trampled upon by the living, finding himself wedged up so close as to be deprived of all motion, begazed, as the last instance of their regard, that they would remove the pressure, and allow him to retire from the window, that he might die in peace. Even in those dreadful circumstances, which might be supposed to have levelled all distinction, the poor delirious wretches manifested a respect for his rank and character; they forthwith gave way, and he forced his passage into the centre of the place, which was not crowded so much, because, by this time, about one-third of the number had perished, and lay in little compass on the floor, while the rest still crowded to both windows. He returned to a platform at the further end of the room, and laying down upon some of his dead friends, recommended his soul to Heaven. Here his thirst grew insupportable; his difficulty in breathing increased, and he was seized with a strong palpitation. These violent symptoms, which he could not bear, urged him to make another effort: he forced his way back to the window, and cried aloud, "Water! for God's sake!" He had been supposed already dead by his wretched companions, but finding him still alive, they exhibited another extraordinary proof of tenderness and regard to his person: "Give him water," they cried; nor would any of them attempt to touch it until he had drank. He was soon quite refreshed, the palpitation ceased; but finding himself still more thirsty after drinking, he abstained from water, and moistened his mouth from time to time, by sucking the perspiration from his shirt sleeve. The miserable prisoners, perceiving the water rather aggravated than relieved their distress, grew clamorous for air, and repeated their insults to the guard, for the suba and his governor, with the more vent to return to Calcutta, were immediately released, for all who could not approach the windows were suffocated. Mr. Holwell, being weary of life, retired once more to the platform, and stretched himself by the large and the dead, as pungent and volatile as spirits of hartshorn; so that all who could not approach the windows were suffocated. Mr. Holwell knew the place where it was deposited. That gentleman, who, was conscious he was seized with a putrid fever, immediately upon their release, was dragged in that condition before the inhuman suba, who questioned him about the treasure, which existed no where but in his own imagination; and would give no credit to his proceedings, nor would furnish the deposit. Mr. Holwell and three of his friends were loaded with fetters, and conveyed three miles from the Indian camp, where they lay all night exposed to a severe rain; next morning they were brought back to town, still manacled, under the scourching beams of a sun intensely hot; and must infallibly have expired had not nature expelled the fever in large purulent boils, that covered almost the whole body. In this pitious condition they were embarked in an open boat for Muxaladav, the capital of Bengal, and undertook such cruel treatment and misery in their passage, as would shock the humane reader, should he pretend to imagine it. They were marched through the city in chains, as a spectacle to the inhabitants, lodged in an open stable, and treated for some days as the worst of criminals. At length the suba's grandmother interceded her nephation in their behalf; and as that prince was then in collecting intelligence that their secre which he meant to destroy at Calcutta, he ordered them to set off liberty. When some of his sympatists opposed the indulgence, representing that Mr. Holwell had still enough left to pay a considerable ransom, he replied, with some marks of compunction and generosity, 41 If he has any thing left, let him keep it; his sufferings have been great; he shall have his liberty. Mr. Holwell and his friends were so soon unfettered, than they took water for the Dutch tankall or mint, in the neighbourhood of that city, where they were received with great tenderness and humanity. The reader, we hope, will excuse us for having thus particularized a transaction so interesting and extraordinary in all its circumstances. The suba having destroyed Calcutta, and dispersed the inhabitants, extorted large sums from the French and Dutch factories, that he might display a spirit of impartiality against all the Europeans, even in his own opposition and return to his native Muxaladav in triumph. By the reduction of Calcutta, the English East India company's affairs were so much embroiled in that part of the world, that perhaps nothing could have retrieved them but the aid of an internal force, and the good fortune of a Clive, whose enterprizes were always crowned with success.

§ XLI. As the English East India company had, for a while, to pay a considerable expense in maintaining a marine force at Bombay, to protect their ships from the piracies of the Angrias, who had rendered themselves independent princes, and fortified Gerah in that neighbourhood; many unsuccessful attempts had been made to destroy their naval power, and reduce the fortress, under the most formidable attacks, with the most venturesome and approved. From failing, they had recourse to prayer, beseeching Heaven to put an end to their misery. They now began to drop on all hands; but then a storm arose from the land and the sea, as pungent and volatile as spirits of hartshorn; so that all who could not approach the windows were suffocated. Mr. Holwell, being weary of life, retired once more to the platform, and stretched himself by the large and the dead, as pungent and volatile as spirits of hartshorn; so that all who could not approach the windows were suffocated. was set on fire by another shell; and soon after the firing ceased on both sides. The admiral, suspecting that the governor of the place would surrender to the Mahattsar rajah, directed his officers to open fire on all the troops under Mr. Clive, that he might be at hand, in case of emergency, to make a rapid retreat. In the meantime, the fort was bombarded; the line of battle ships were warped near enough to batter in breaches; and then the admiral sent an officer, with a flag of truce, to the governor, requiring him to surrender. His proposal being again rejected, the English ships renewed their fire next day with resounding rage, and their greater quantity of the fort blew up, and at four the garrison hung out a white flag for capitulation. The parley that ensued proved ineffectual, the engagement began again, and continued till fifteen minutes after five; when the white flag was again displayed, and now the governor submitted to the terms which were imposed. Angra's flag was immediately hauled down; and two English captains, taking possession of the fort with a detachment, forthwith hoisted the British ensign. To these captains, whose names were Buchanan and Forbes, the Mahattsars offered a bribe of fifty thousand rupees, if they would allow them to pass their guards, that they might take possession of the fort for themselves; but this offer was rejected with disdain, and immediately disclosed to Colonel Clive, who took effectual measures to frustrate their design. In this place, which was reduced with very incon siderable loss, the conquerors found above two hundred cannon, some of the most important of ammunition, a money and effects to the value of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. The fleet which was destroyed consisted of eight galleys, one ship finished, two upon the stocks, and a good number of galleons. Among the prisoners, the admiral found Angra's wife, children, and mother, towards whom he demeaned himself with great humanity. Three hundred European soldiers, and as many sepoys, were left to guard the fort; and four of the company's armed vessels remained in the harbour for the defence of the place, which was extremely well situated for commerce.

§ XLIII. The admiral and Mr. Clive sailed back to Madras in triumph, and there another plan was formed for restoring the company's affairs upon the Ganges, recovering CALCUTTA, and taking vengeance on the cruel Viceroys of Bengal. In October they set sail again for the bottom of the bay; and about the beginning of December arrived at Balsore, in the kingdom of Bengal. Having crossed the Baces, they proceeded up the river Ganges as far as Fulta, where they found Governor Drake, and the other persons who had escaped on board of the ships when Clive attacked Angra, and who had continued his course with his forces to attack the fort of Bhusudga, by land, while the admiral batted it by sea; but the place being ill provided with cannon, did not hold out above an hour after the firing began. This conquest being achieved at a very easy purchase, two of the greatest ships anchored between Tarnit fort and a battery on the other side of the river, which were abandoned before one shot was discharged against either; thus the passage was laid open to Calcutta, the reduction of which we shall record among the transactions of the ensuing year.

CHAP. VI.

173. Measures taken by the Emperor of Russia to frustrate the plans of the French and British. XVII. Emperor of Russia was informed of the attack on the viceroys of Bengal. XVIII. Emperor of Russia sends to the Mahattsars a marquis to negotiate between them and the British. XIX. Angra's money and effects taken to the value of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. XX. Fort taken by the English captains; the admiral and Mr. Clive return to Madras. XXI. Measures taken by the French and British to recover the lost provinces. XXII. Peace concluded between the French and British.
The Netherlands, acquired with infinite labour, by the blood and treasure of the maritime powers: it gave birth to a confederacy of despotic princes; sufficient, if their joint force was fully exerted, to overthrow the liberties of all the free states in Europe; and, after all, Hanover has been overrun, and subdued by the enemy; and the King of Prussia put the bar to the empire. All these consequences were, fairly deducible from the resolution which his Prussian majesty took at this juncture, to precipitate a war with the house of Austria. The apparent motives that prompted him to this measure we shall unfold. In the meantime, the defensive treaty between the empress-queen and France was no sooner ratified, than the czarina was invited to accede to the alliance, and a private minister sent from Paris to Petersburg, to negotiate the conditions of this accession, which the Empress of Russia accordingly embraced: a circumstance so agreeable to the court of Versailles, that the Marquis de L'Hopital was immediately appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the court of Russia. Applications were likewise made to the courts of Madrid and Turin, soliciting their concurrence: but their catholic and Sardinian majesties wisely resolved to observe a neutrality. At the same time, intrigues were being propagated: the great state of Sweden was in order to kindle up a war between that nation and Prussia; and their endeavours succeeded in the sequel, even contrary to the inclination of their sovereign. At present, a professor is employed for altering the ideal of government by increasing the power of the crown; and several persons of rank were convicted on trial, were beheaded as principals in this conspiracy. Although it did not appear that the king or queen were at all concerned in the scheme, his almighty majesty himself hardly coveted his diet, that he threatened to resign his royalties, and retire into his own hereditary dominions. This design was extremely disgraceful to the people in general, who exposed him in opposition to the diet, by whose orders they conceived themselves more oppressed than they should have been under an unlimited monarchy.

The King of Prussia, alarmed at these formidable alliances, ordered all forces to be completed, and held in readiness to march at the first notice; and a report was industriously circulated, that by a secret article in the late treaty between France and the house of Austria, these two powers had obliged themselves to declare war against the Protestant religion, and overturn the freedom of the empire, by a forced election of a King of the Romans. The cry of religion was no impotent measure: but it no longer produced the same effect as in times past. Religion was made the subject of both sides for the partitions of the empress-queen intimated, on all occasions, that the ruin of the catholic faith in Germany was the principal object of the new alliance between the Kings of Great Britain and Russia. There was in consequence of such suggestions, that his Britannic majesty ordered his electoral minister at the diet, to deliver a memorial to all the ministers at Ratisbon, expressing his surprise to find the treaty he had concluded with the King of Prussia industriously represented as a ground of apprehension and uneasiness, especially for religion. He observed, that as France had made open dispositions for invading the electorate of Hanover, and disturbing the peace of the empire; that as he had been denied, by the empress-queen, the succours stipulated in treaties of alliance; and as he was refused assistance by certain states of the empire, who even seemed disposed to favour such a diversion: he had, in order to provide for the security of his own dominions, to establish peace and tranquillity in the empire, and maintain its system and privileges, without any prejudice to religion, concluded a defensive treaty with the King of Prussia: that, by this instance of conciliation to the interests of Germany, he had done an essential service to the empress-queen, and performed the part which the head of the empire, in dignity and duty, ought to have acted: that turning his eyes from the interests of the empress-queen, to engage in a strict alliance with a foreign power, which, for upwards of two centuries, had ravaged the principal provinces of the empire, maintained repeated wars against the archdotal house of Austria, and always endeavoured, as it suited her views, to excite distrust and dissension among the princes and states that compose the Germanic body.

The court of Vienna formed two considerable armies in Bohemia and Moravia; yet pretended that they had nothing in view but self-preservation, and solemnly disclaimed both the secret article, and the design which had been laid for recovering the dominions of the empress-queen, declared, by his minister as Berlin, that he had no other intention but to maintain the public tranquillity of Europe; and this being the sole end of all his measures, he beheld them as so fair and just, that he was the first to offer his forces, agreeably to his engagements, for the assistance of his ally, in case her dominions should be attacked: finally, that he would act in the same manner in behalf of all the other powers with whom he was in alliance. This information made very little impression upon the King of Prussia, who had already formed his plan, and was determined to execute his purpose. What his original plan might have been, it is difficult to say; but we believe he imparted it to any confidant or ally. It must be confessed, however, that the intrigues of the court of Vienna furnished him with a specious pretence for drawing the powers of Europe together. The empress-queen had some reason to be jealous of such a formidable neighbour. She remembered his usurpation into Bohemia, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, at a time when she thought that country, and all her other dominions, secure from invasion, by the treaty of Breslaw, which she had in no particular continued. She calabbed against him in different courts of Europe: she concluded a treaty with the czarina, which, though it was immediately dissolved, had the effect of preventing his conquests upon this monarch: she endeavoured to engage the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, as a contracting power in this confederacy; and, if he had not been afraid of a sudden visit from a host of Prussians, he would, perhaps, be supposed but he would have been pleased to contribute to the humiliation of a prince, who had once before, without the least provocation, driven him from his dominions, taken possession of the capital, and obliged him to pay a million and a quarter of crowns to indemnify him for the expense of this expedition; but he carefully avoided taking such a step as might expose him to another invasion, and even refused to accede to the treaty of Petershagen. He therefore concluded the article of Fertdena being his Prussian majesty's attacking either of the contracting parties. It appears, however, that Count de Breul, prime minister and favourite of the King of Poland, had been charged with the casting off his king, and, as the ministers of Russia, had been invited to join the alliance, and invade Prussia. The ministers, carried on certain scandalous intrigues, in order to embold the King of Prussia with the Empress of Russia, between whom a misunderstanding had long subsisted.

The court of Vienna, receiving the military preparations of the court of Vienna, and having obtained intelligence of their secret negotiations with different powers of Europe, ordered M. de Klingern, his minister, at the imperial court, to demur to all these preparations for war, on the frontiers of Silesia, were designed against him, and what were the intentions of her imperial majesty? To this demand the empress replied, That in the present juncture she had found it necessary, to make armaments, as well for her own defence, as for that of her allies; but that they did not tend to the prejudice of any person or state whatever. The king, far from being displeased with this answer, sent fresh supplies to Linzgrauf, to represent, that after the king had assembled, as long as he thought consistent with his safety and honour, the bad designs imputed to the empress would not suffer him to remain longer without a knowledge of the offensive projects which the two courts had formed at Petersburg; that he knew they had engaged to attack him suddenly with an army of two hundred thousand men; a design which would have been executed. in the spring of the year, had not the Russian forces wanted recruits, their fleet mariners, and Livonia a sufficient quantity of corn for their support; that he constituted all necessary preparations in the most prudent manner for the former, he required a clear and formal declaration, or positive assurance, that she had no intention to attack him, either this year or the next; but he should look upon an ambiguous answer as a declaration of war; and he called Heaven to witness, that the emperor alone would be guilty of the innocent blood that should be spilt, and all the dismal consequences that would attend the commission of hostilities.

V. A declaration of this nature might have provoked a less amiable mind than his, but such a one, which indeed seems to have been calculated on purpose to exasperate the pride of her imperial majesty, whose answer he soon received to this effect: that his majesty the King of Prussia had already been employed, for some time, in all kinds of the most considerable preparation of war, and the most disquieting with regard to the public tranquillity, when he thought fit to demand explanations of her Majesty, touching the military dispositions that were making in her dominions; dispositions on which she had not resolved till after the preparations of his Prussian majesty had been made; that though her majesty might have declined explaining herself on those subjects, which required no explanation, as taking up her correspondence with his, she had opened her own mouth, to M. de Klingnraff, that the critical state of public affairs rendered the measures she had taken absolutely necessary for her own safety, and that of her allies; but that she had no intention of being exposed in any manner, or in any person whatsoever; that her imperial majesty had undoubtedly a right to form what judgment she pleased on the circumstances of the times; and likewise, that it belonged to none but herself to estimate her own danger; that her declaration was so clear; she never imagined it could be thought otherwise; that being acustomed to receive as well as to practise, the decorums which sovereigns owe to each other, she could not scruple, without abandoning the principles of the memoirs now presented by M. de Klingnraff; so extraordinary both in the matter and expressions, that she would find herself under the necessity of transgressing the bounds of that moderation which she had prescribed to herself, were she to answer the whole of its contents; nevertheless, she thought proper to declare, that the information communicated to his Prussian majesty, of an offensive alliance against him, subsisting between herself and the Empress of Russia, together with the circumstances and pretended stipulations of that alliance, was absolutely false and forged, for no such treaty did exist, or ever had existed. She had ordered a declaration, signed with her own hand, which would enable all Europe to judge of what weight and quality those dreadful events were which Klingnraaff's memorial announced; and to perceive that, in any case, they could not be imputed to her imperial majesty. This answer, though seemingly explicit, was not deemed sufficiently categorical, or, at least, not suitable to the purposes of the King of Prussia, who, by his resident at Vienna, once more declared, that if the empress-queen would sign a positive assurance that she would not attack his Prussian majesty, either this year or the next, he would directly withdraw his troops, and let things be restored to their former footing. This demand was evaded, on pretence that such assurance could not be more binding than the solemn treaty by which he was already secured; a treaty which the empress-queen had no intention to violate. But, before an answer could be delivered, the king had actually invaded Saxony, and published his declaration against the court of Vienna. The court of Vienna, believing that the King of Prussia was bent upon employing his arms some where; being puzzled at the dictatorial manner in which his demands were conveyed; unwilling to lay the only barriers to controversy; and, by the concert of the two nations, giving unbridge to their allies, and confident of having provided for their own security, resolved to run the risk of his resentment, not without hopes of being indemnified, in the farther progress of his enterprise. The empress-queen had been obliged to cede in the treaty of Breslau.

§ VI. Both sides being thus prepared, and perhaps equally eager for action, the King of Prussia would no longer suspend his operations, and the storm fell first upon Saxony. He resolved to penetrate through that country into Bohemia, and even to take possession of it as a fronter, as well as to retain what he had possessed by the treaty of Vienna, and to and from the Austrian dominions. Besides, he had reason to believe the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, was connected with the czarina and the empress-queen; therefore, he thought it would be an impietie to leave at his prince in any condition to give him the least disturbance. His army entered the Saxony territory towards the latter end of August, when he published a declaration, importing that the unjust conduct and dangerous views of the court of Vienna were the occasion of the present action of Saxony; that his majesty felt it under the necessity of taking proper measures for protecting his territories and subjects; that for this purpose he could not forbear taking the disagreeable resolution to enter with his troops the hereditary dominions of his majesty the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony; but he protested before God and man, that, on account of his personal esteem and friendship for that prince, he would not have proceeded to this extremity, had he not been forced to it by the laws of war, the fatality of the present conjuncture, and the necessity of prevailing for the defence and security of his subjects. He reminded the public of the tenderness with which he had treated the Elector of Saxony, during the course of the latter's existence, besides numerous and seven hundred and forty-four, and of the bad consequences resulting to that monarch from his engagements with the enemies of Prussia. He declared that the apprehensions of his majesty, on that occasion, were founded on nothing; that in attempting to oust him from his dominions, he made himself to take those precautions which prudence dictated: but he protested, in the most solemn manner, that he had no hostile views against his Polish majesty, or his dominions; that his troops did not enter Saxony as enemies, and had taken care that they should observe the best order and the most exact discipline; that he desired nothing more ardently, than the happy minute that should procure to him the satisfaction of restoring to his Polish majesty his hereditary dominions, which he had hitherto been only as a sacred depositum. By his minister at Dresden, he had demanded a free passage for his forces through the Saxon dominions; and this the King of Poland was ready to grant, with reasonable limitations, to be settled by commissions appointed for that purpose. But these were formalities which did not at all suit with his Prussian majesty's disposition or design. Even before that requisition was made, a body of his troops, amounting to fifteen thousand, under the command of Prince Ferdinand, brother to the Duke of Brunswick, took possession of Lepzig, on the twentieth day of September. Here he published a declaration, signifying, that his majesty would pursue his intention to consider and defend the inhabitants of that electorate as if they were his own subjects; and that he had given precise orders to his troops to observe the most exact discipline. As the first mark of his affection, he ordered them to provide the army with all sorts of provisions, according to a certain rate, on pain of military execution. That same evening notice was given to the corporation of merchants, that their deputies should pay all taxes and customs to the King of Prussia; then he took possession of the custom-house, and excuse-office, and ordered the magazines of corn and meal to be opened for the use of his soldiers.

quarters. His Polish majesty did not like to be so tutored in his own dominions: he depended for his own safety more upon the valour and attachment of his troops than the friendship of a prince who had invaded his dominions, and sequestered his revenue without provocation; and he trusted too much to the situation of his camp at Pirna, which was deemed impregnable. In the meantime, the King of Prussia fixed his head-quarters at the village of Morsinski, and the vanguard actually seized the passes that lead to the circles of Satsor and Leuentsm in that kingdom; while Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick marched with a body of troops along the Elbe, and took post at this last place without opposition. At the same time, the king covered his own dominions, by assembling two considerable bodies in Upper and Lower Silesia, which occupied the passes that communicated with the circles of Bautz and Koniggratz. Headquarters were commenced on the thirteenth day of September, by a detachment of Prussian hussars, which attacked an Austrian escort to a convoy of provisions, designed for the Saxon camp; and having routed them, carried off a considerable number of baggage. The same evening, the Saxons at Dresden were filled with an immense quantity of provision and forage for the Prussian army, and the bakers were ordered to prepare a vast quantity of bread, for which purpose three ovens were erected. When the King of Prussia first arrived at Dresden, he lodged at the house of the Count Mocinski, and gave orders that the Queen and royal family of Poland should be treated with all due consideration and respect; even while the Saxons were blocked up on every side, he sometimes permitted a wagon, loaded with fresh provision and came, to pass unobserved, for the use of his Polish majesty.

§ VIII. During these transactions, the greatest part of the Austrian army engaged at Breslau, under the command of Veldt-Mareschall Keith, who reduced the town and palace of Tetschen, took possession of all the passes, and encamped near Ausa, a small town in Bohemia, at no great distance from the imperial army, amounting to fifty thousand men, commanded by Count Brown, an officer of Irish extract, who had often distinguished himself in the field by his courage, vigilance, and conduct. His Prussian majesty having left a considerable body of troops for the blockade of Pirna, assumed in person the command of Mareschal Keith's corps, and advanced to give battle to the enemy. On the twenty-ninth day of September, his troops in two columns, and in the evening arrived with them near Wolschina, where he saw the Austrian army posted with its right at Lowoschutz, and its left towards the Egra. Having occupied with six battalions a hollow way, and some rising grounds, which commanded the town of Lowoschutz, he remained all night under arms at Wolmina; and on the first day of October, early in the morning, formed his whole army in order of battle: the first line, consisting of the infantry, occupying two hills, and a bottom between them; the second line being formed of some battalions, and the third composed of the whole cavalry. The Austrian general had taken possession of Lowoschutz, with a great body of infantry, and placed a battery of cannon in front of the town: he had formed his cavalry chequerwise, in a line between Lowoschutz, and the village of Sanchsort; and posted about two thousand Croats and irregulars in the vineyards and avenues on his right. The morning was dark with a thick fog, and then the Prussian cavalry advanced to attack the enemy's horse; but received such a fire from the irregulars, posted in vineyards and ditches, as well as from a numerous artilhry, that the King ordered the guards to be doubled, and sent an officer in demand of her majesty the keys of the secret cabinet. The queen despatched this officer, who was the first to seck the door, but after some time more advanc'd for his watchful steadiness than animosity in his dispositions.

a prince to whom friendship was pretended, thought it superfluous to allege any pretext, to colour the usurpation of his territories and revenues.—Though this was certainly the case in his Prussian majesty's first exposition of the motives, the other three were afterwards confirmed, and the subsequent memorial to the States-general; in which he charged the King of Poland as an accomplice in, if not an accessory to, the treaty of Petersburgh; and even taxed him with having agreed to a partition of some of his territories, when they should be conquered. This treaty of partition, however, appears to have been made in time of actual war, before all cause of dispute was removed by the peace of Dresden.

§ XI. While the Austrain and Prussian armies were in the field, their respective ministers were not idle at Hutsion, where three imperial decrees were published against his Prussian majesty; the first, summoning that prince to withdraw his troops from the electorate of Saxony; the second, commanding all the vassals of the empire employed by the King of Prussia to quit that service immediately; and the third, forbidding the members of the empire to suffer any levies of soldiers, for the Prussian service, to be raised within their respective jurisdictions. The French minister declared to the dey, that the proceedings of his Prussian majesty having disclosed to the world the secret concert between himself and the King of England, to execute in the empire a religio-political project, which might be favourable to their particular views, his most christian majesty, in consequence of his engagement with the empress-queen, and many other princes of the forthwith send such a number of troops to their aid, as might be thought necessary to preserve the liberty of the Germanic state, which might be favourable to their particular views, his most chr to be derived from that quarter: he claimed, in all the usual forms, the assistance of the Germanic body, as guarantee of the pragmatic sanction and treaty of Dresden; and Sweden was also addressed on the same subject.

§ XV. The King of Prussia did not passively bear all the imputations that were fixed upon his conduct. His minister at the Hague presented a memorial, in answer to that of the Saxon resident, in which he accused the court of Saxony of having adopted every part of the scheme for which his enemies had formed for his destruction. He affirmed that the Saxon ministers had, in all the courts of Europe, played off every engine of unwarrantable politics, in order to promote that misfortune to the cause of Saxony, by which they had endeavoured to give an odious turn to his most innocent actions: that they had spared neither malicious insinuations, nor even the most atrocious calumnies, to alienate all the world from his majesty, and raise up enemies against him every where. He said he had received information that the court of Saxony intended to let his troops pass freely, and afterwards wait for events of which they might avail themselves, either by joining his enemies, or by making a diversion in his dominions; that in such a situation he could not avoid having recourse to the only means which were left him for preventing his inevitable ruin, by putting it out of the power of Saxony to injure his property or person. He asserted, that the measures he had pursued in that electorate were but the necessary consequences of the first resolution he was forced to take for his own preservation; that he had done nothing to provoke the court of Saxony to the measure of hurting him; and that this had been done with all possible moderation: that the country enjoyed all the security and all the quiet which could be expected in the very midst of peace, the Prussian troops observing the most exact discipline: that all due respect was shown to the Queen of Poland, who had been prevailed upon, by the most suitable representations, to suffer some papers to be taken from the Paper Office, of which his Prussian majesty already had a passage for his assistance; that he had not made the dangerous design of the Saxon ministry against him, to secure the originals; the existence and reality of which might otherwise have been denied. He observed, that every man has a right to prevent the mischief with which he is threatened, and to retort it upon its author; and that neither the constitutions nor the laws of the empire could obstruct the exertion of a right so superior to all others as that of self-preservation and self-defence; especially when the depository of these laws is so closely united to the enemy, as manifestly to abuse his power in her favour.

§ XVI. But the most important step which his Prussian majesty was able to take, was that of publishing another memorial, specifying the conduct of the courts of Vienna and Saxony, and their dangerous designs against his person and interest, together with the original documents adduced as proofs of these minister intentions. As a knowledge of these pieces is requisite to form a distinct idea of the motives which produced the dreadful war upon the continent, it will not be amiss to usher the substance of them to the reader's acquaintance. His Prussian majesty affirms, that to arrive at the source of the vast plan upon which the courts of Vienna and Saxony had been employed against him ever since the peace of Dresden, we must trace it as far back as the war which preceded that event: that the fond hopes which the two allied courts had conceived upon the success of the campaign in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, gave occasion to a treaty of eventual partition, stipulating that the partition should be made between the duchies of Silesia and the county of Glitz; while the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, should share the duchies of Magdeburg and Brunswick; the circles of Zullichow and Swibors, together with the Prussian part of Luxemburg; that after the peace of Dresden, concluded in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-five, there was no further room for a treaty of this nature: yet the court of Vienna proposed to that of Saxony a new alliance, in which the treaty of eventual partition should be altered, which Saxony was disposed to accede to, provided that it should be thought necessary, in the first place, to give a greater consistency to their plan, by grounding it upon an alliance between the empress-queen and the czarina. Accordingly, these two powers did, in fact, conclude a defensive alliance at Petersburg in the course of the ensuing year: but the body, or ostensible part of this treaty, was composed merely with a view to conceal from the knowledge of the public its secret articles, the fourth of which was leveled singly against Prussia, according to the exact copy of it, which appeared among the documents. In this article, the Empress-Queen of Hungary and Bohemia sets out with that the people of Prussia should be attacked, as if they had been of Dresden; but explains her real view of thinking upon the subject, a little lower, in the following terms: "If he King of Prussia should be the first to depart from the peace, he is determined to accept of the alliance of Hungary and Bohemia, or her majesty the Empress of Russia, or even the republic of Poland; in all these cases, the rights of the empress-queen to Silesia and the counts of Glitz would again take place, and recover their full effect: the two contracting parties should mutually assist each other with sixty thousand men, to achieve these conquests." The king observes upon this article, that every war which can arise between him and Russia, or the republic of Poland, would be looked upon as a manifestation of the peace of Dresden, and a revial of the rights of the house of Austria to Silesia; though neither Russia nor the republic of Poland is at all concerned in the present negociation. He observed, that in the course which the king lived in the most intimate friendship, was not even in alliance with the court of Vienna; that according to the principles of the law of nature, received among all civilized nations, the same is the case as between the court of Saxony and the empress-queen of Germany; that an alliance which was authorized to do in such cases, would be to send these succours to her allies which are due to them by treaties, without her having the least pretence, on that account, to free herself from the particular engagements subsisting between her and the king: he appealed, therefore, to the judgment of the impartial world, whether in this secret article the contracting powers had kept within the bounds of a defensive alliance; or whether this article did not rather express an immediate prospect of that war, which the King of Prussia. He affirmed it was obvious, from this article, that the court of Vienna had prepared three pretences for the recovery of Silesia; and that she thought to attain her end, either by provoking the king to commence hostilities against her, or to kindle a war between his majesty and Russia, by her secret intrigues and machinations; he alleged that the court of Saxony, being invited to accede to this alliance, eagerly acceded to the mania, furnishing its ministers at Petersburg with full powers for that purpose; and ordered them to declare that their master was not only ready to accede to the treaty itself, but was disposed to see it ratified immediately; that the partitions which might be made on Prussia, by laying down, as the basis of it, the treaty of Leipsic, signed on the eighteenth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-five, without his approbation, which was owned it had been supposed, through the whole of this negociation, that the King of Prussia should be the aggressor against the court of Vienna; but he insisted, that even in this case the King of Poland could have no right to make a partition, without his approbation: he likewise acknowledged, that the court of Saxony had not yet acceded in form to the treaty of Petersburg; but he observed, its allies were given to understand again and again that it was considered: but he was bound, not to have paid what was withheld, whenever this could be done without risk; and the advantages to be gained should be secured in its favour; circumstances proved by divers authentic documents, particularly by a letter from Count Fleming to Count de Brühl, informing him that Count Uhlefeld had charged him to represent afresh to his court, that they could not take too secure measures against the ambitious views of the King of Prussia; that Saxony in particular ought to be cautious, as the court of Dresden, without having intended in form to the treaty of Petersburgh, was not less an accomplished in the dangerous designs which the court of Vienna had grounded upon this treaty; and that having been deceived and woefully imposed upon, it had only waited for that moment when it might, without running any great risk, conquer in effect, and share the spoils, of its neighbour. In expectation of this period he saw the Austrian ministers laboured in concert and underhand with the more adroit, to bring the Casa Federica into existence; for being laid down as a principle in the treaty, that any war whatever between him and Russia would authorize the emperor-queen to take some steps against Poland, which, as he could kindle such a war; for which purpose no method was found more proper than that of embowling the king with the Empress of Russia; and to provoke that princess with all sorts of false intimations, impostures, and the most atrocious calumnies, in laying to his majesty's charge a variety of designs, sometimes against Russia, and even the person of the czarina; sometimes views upon Poland, and sometimes intrigues in Sweden. By these and other such contrivances, he affirmed they had kindled the animosity of the empress to such a degree, that in a council held in the month of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-three, she had resolved to attack the King of Prussia, and, whether he should fall upon any of the allies of Russia, or one of them should begin with him: a resolution which for that time was frustrated by their want of seamen and magazines; for, being engaged in the suddenness of keeping themselves in a condition to fulfil their engagements, contracted in the last subsidiary convention with England; and when all were finished, the storm would fall on the King of Prussia.

§ XV. This is the substance of that famous memorial published by his Prussian majesty, to which the justifying pieces or authentic documents were annexed; and to which a circumstantial answer was exhibited by the ministers of her imperial majesty. Spectious reasons may, doubtless, be adduced on either side of almost any dispute, by writers of ingenuity: but, in examining this contest, it must be observed that both are adoptet illicit practices. The emperor-queen and the Elector of Saxony had certainly a right to form defensive treaties for their own preservation; and, without all doubt, it was their interest and their duty to secure themselves from the enterprises of such a formidable neighbour; but, at the same time, the contracting parties seem to have carried their views much further than defensive measures. Perhaps the court of Vienna considered the cession of Silesia as a circumstance altogether sufficient to justify her proceedings, and the loss of the rights of natural equity. She did not at all doubt that the King of Prussia would be tempted by his ambition and great warlike power, to take some step which might be annually increased and augmented, and the sacrifice of Dresden; and in that case she was determined to avail herself of the confession she had formed, that she might retrieve the countries she had lost by the unfortunate events of the last war, as well as bridle the dangerous power and disposition of the Prussian monarch: and, in all probability, the King of Poland, over and above the same consideration, was desirous of some indemnification for the last rapine into his electoral dominions, and the sums he had paid for the subsequent peace. Whether they were authorized by the law of nature and nations to make reprisals by an actual partition of the countries they then possessed, and which it might be supposed he might conquer, is a question which we shall not pretend to determine: but it does not at all appear, that his Prussian majesty's danger was such as entitled him to take those violent steps which he now attempted to justify. By the fourth article of the treaty underhand to a blaze that soon filled the empire with rum and desolation; and the King of Prussia had drawn upon himself the resentment of the three greatest powers in Europe, who had assiduously pursued them, and every consideration of that balance which it had cost such blood and treasure to preserve, in order to compose his destruction. The king himself could not but foresee this confederacy, and know the power it might exert; but probably he confided so much in the number, the valour, and discipline of his troops; in the skill of his officers; in his own conduct and activity; that he hoped to crush the house of Austria by one rapid endeavour at the latter end of the season, or at all events, to dishearten his enemies, before he should move to his assistance. In this hope, however, he was disappointed by the vigilance of the Austrian councils. He found the empress-queen in a condition to make head against him in every army she had in dominions; and in a fair way of being assisted by the catholic king. Thus the King of England exchanged the alliance of Russia, who was his subsidiary, and the friendship of the empress-queen, his old and natural ally, for a new connexion with his Prussian majesty, who could neither act as an auxiliary in Great Britain, nor as a protector to Hanover: and for this connexion, the advantage of which was merely negative, such a price was paid by England as had never been given by any other prince of Europe, even for services of the greatest importance.

§ XVI. About the latter end of November, the Saxton minister at Ratisbon delivered to the diet a new and ample memorial, explaining the lamentable state of that electorate, and imploring aid against the invincible strength of the King of Prussia. He had also addressed a letter to the diet, demanding succour of the several states, agreeable to their guarantees of the treaties of Westphalia and Dresden: but the minister of Brandenburg refused to lay it before that assembly, the minister of Brandenburg ordered it to be printed, and sent to his court for further instructions. In the meantime his Prussian majesty thought proper to intimate to the King and Senate of Poland, that should the Russian troops be permitted to march through that kingdom, they might expect to see their country made a scene of war and desolation. In France, the prospect of a general and sanguinary war did not at all alloy the disturbance which springing from the dissension between the clergy and parliament, touching the hull Unigenitus. The king being again brought over to the ecclesiastical side of the dispute, received a brief from the pope, laying it down as a fundamental point, that whosoever refuses to submit to the hull Unigenitus, is in the way of damnation: and certain cases are specified, in which the sacraments are to be denied. The parliament of Paris, considering this brief or bull as a declaración ion the rights of the Gallican church, issued an arret or decree, suppressing the said bull; reserving to themselves the right of providing against the inconveniences with which it might be supposed it was to the interest of the king to maintain in their full force the prerogatives of the see, the power and jurisdiction of the bishops, the liberties of the Gallican church, and the customs of the realm. The king, dissatisfied at the direction given to the archbishop of Rheims, that the middle Francia, on the twelfth day of November, the whole body of his guards, amounting to ten thousand men, took post in the city of Paris: and next day the king repaired to the usual ceremony to the palace, where the bed of justice was held. Upon other regulations, an edict was made; for suppressing the fourth and fifth, and sixteenth houses, the members of which had remarkably distinguished themselves by their opposition to the bull Ungetus.

§ XVII. The great danger of England, arising in a great measure from the iniquitous practice of engrossing, was so severely felt by the common people, that insurrections were raised in Shropshire and Warwickshire by the poor, armed with the cutlers, who seemed to believe all the provision they could find; pillaging without distinction the millers, farmers, grocers, and butchers, until they were dispersed by the gentlemen of the country, at the head of their tenants and dependants. Disorders of the same nature were supplied by the counties, and a grand council being assembled at St. James's on the same subject, a proclamation was published, for putting the laws in speedy and effectual execution against the forestallers and engrossers of corn.

§ XVIII. The fear of an invasion having now subsided, and Hanover being supposed in greater danger than Great Britain, the auxiliaries of that electorate were transported from England. This was done chiefly at the latter end of the season, when the weather became severe, and the inhabitants of England refused to admit the Hessian soldiers into winter-quarters, as no provision had been made for that purpose by act of parliament; so that they were obliged to quit their camp, and remain in the open fields till January: but the rigor of this uncomfortable situation was softened by the hand of generous charity, which liberally supplied them with all manner of refreshment, and other conveniences; a humane unexceptionable measure, which reeceived the national character from the imputation of cruelty and ingratitude.

§ XIX. On the second day of December, his majesty opened the session of the parliament, with a speech that seemed to be dictated by the genius of England. He expressed his confidence, that, under the guidance of Divine Providence, the union, fortune, and affection of his people would enable him to surmount all difficulties, and vindicate the dignity of his crown against the ancient enemy of Great Britain. He declared, that the success and preservation of America constituted a main object of his attention and solicitude; and observed, that the growing difficulties of the Indian colonies might stand exposed to future losses in that country, demanded resolutions of vigour and dispatch. He said, an adequate and firm defence at home should maintain the chief place in his thoughts; and to this end, he would sum nothing so much at heart as to remove all grounds of dissatisfaction from his people; for this end, he recommended to the care and diligence of the parliament the framing of a national militia, planned and regulated with equal regard to the just rights of his crown and people; an institution which might become one good resource in time of general danger. He took notice that the unnatural union of councils abroad, the calamities which, in consequence of this unhappy conjunction, might, by incursions of foreign armies into the empire, shake its constitution, overturn its system, and threaten oppression to the Protestant interest on the continent, were events which must sensibly affect the minds of the British nation, and had fixed the eyes of Europe on this new and dangerous crisis. He came to understand that the body of his electoral troops, which were brought hither at the desire of his parliament, he had now directed to return to his dominions in Germany, relying with perfect pleasure on the spirit of his person and realm. He told the Commons that he confided in their wisdom for preferring more vigorous efforts, though more expensive, to a less effectual and cheaper one; and he appealed to them, that he had placed before them the dangers and necessities of the public; and it was their duty to lay the burdens they should judge unavoidable in such a manner as least disturb and exasperate his people. He expressed his concern for the sufferings of the poor, arising from the present dearth of corn, and for the disturbance to which it had given rise; and he assured his parliament to consider of proper provisions for the poorer sort of the people. He thus concluded, remarking, that unprosperous events of war in the Mediterranean had drawn from his subjects signals proof how dearly they tendered the honour of his crown; therefore, they could not, on his part, fail to meet with just returns of unwearied care, and unceasing endeavours for the glory, prosperity, and happiness of his people.

§ XX. The king having retired from the House of Peers, the speech was read by Lord Sandy's, appointed to act as speaker to that House; then Earl Cowper moved for an address, which, however, was not carried without objection. In one part of it his majesty was thanked for having caused a body of electoral troops to come into England, and this article was extremely disagreeable to those who had disapproved of the request in the last session. They said they wished to see the present address unanimously agreed to by the Lords; a satisfaction which his majesty was determined to insert: for they still thought the bringing over Hanoverian troops a preposterous measure; because it had not only loaded the nation with an enormous expense, but furnished the court of France with a plausible pretext for invading the electorate, which otherwise it would have no shadow of reason to attack; besides, the expedition was held in reprobation by the subjects in general, and such a paragraph might be considered as an insult to the nation. Notwithstanding these objections, which did not seem to be very important, the address, including the paragraph, was approved by a great majority.

§ XXI. In the address of the Commons no such paragraph was inserted. As soon as the speaker had read his majesty's speech, Mr. C. Townshend proposed the heads of an address, to which the House unanimously agreed; and it was presented accordingly. Thus necessary form was no sooner discussed, than the House, with a warmth of humanity and benevolence, suitable to such an assembly, resolved itself into a committee, to deliberate on that part of his majesty's speech which related to the representation of the nation; and the work was intrusted to a class of people. A bill was now immediately framed to prohibit, for a time limited, the exportation of corn, malt, meal, flour, bread, biscuit, and starch; and a resolution unanimously passed to the effect that the cargo might be forthwith laid upon all ships laden or to be laden with these commodities to be reported from the ports of Great Britain and Ireland. At the same time, Vice-Admiral Boscawen, from the board of admiralty, informed the House, that the king and the board had been dissatisfied with the conduct of Admiral Bung, in a late action with the French fleet in the Mediterranean, and for the appearance of his not having acted agreeably to his instructions. He added, that for the relief of the king, in custody of the marshal of the admiralty, in order to be tried by a court-martial: that although this was no more than what is usual in like cases, yet as Admiral Bung was then a member of the House, and as his conduct might detain him some time from his duty there, the board of admiralty thought it a respect due to the House to inform them of the commitment and detention of the said admiral. This message being delivered, the journal of the House, in relation to General Knowles, was read: that the said Knowles remained on board the ship Conway with his forces, who having been disappointed, he had remained, before a council of war, from the orders of the field marshal, for his behavior in not relating an action which happened on the 29th of October, the preceding year; that the court, on the 7th of November, on the report of the major-general of his regiment, ordered him to be cashiered, and to languish in the prison ofibr. but, after some days, the court decided that, but for the major-general's express opinion, upon her being cashiered, she might have been removed, and that, by a different disposition of his situation, he might have been the more fortunate than the action, the court did unanimously agree that he fell under part of the action, the court did unanimously agree that he fell under part of the action. was read, and what Mr. Boscawen now communicated was also inserted.

A. D. 1757.

§ XXII. The committees of supply, and of ways and means, being appointed, took into consideration the necessities of the state, and made very ample provisions for establishing his Majesty to discharge the expenses of the war with vigour. They granted fifty-five thousand men for the sea service, including eleven thousand four hundred and nineteen men for the land service; forty-five thousand four hundred for many new regiments; and apart from this, hounding four thousand and eight invalids. The supply was granted for the maintenance of these forces, as well as for the troops of Hesse and Hanover; for the ordnance; the levy of new regiments; for assisting his Majesty in forming and settling the numerous settlements in America; to strengthen the necessary defence and preservation of his electoral dominions, and those of his allies; and towards enabling him to fulfill his engagements with the King of Prussia; for the security of the empire against the irruption of foreign armies, as well as the support of the common cause, for building and repairs of ships, hiring of transports, payment of half-pay officers, and the pensions of wounded and sick who served with the troops; a sum, raised in pursuance of an act passed in the last session of parliament, and charged upon the first aids or supplies to be granted in this session; for enabling the governors and guardians of the hospital of the martyred houses of the young poor children, to receive all such children under a certain age, as should be brought to the said hospital within the compass of one year, for maintaining and supporting the new settlement of Nova Scotia; for repairing and finishing military roads; for making good his Majesty's engagements with the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; for the expense of marching, recruiting, and remounting German troops in the pay of Great Britain; for empowering his Majesty to defray any extraordinary expenses of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the service of the ensuing year, and to take all such measures as might be necessary to suppress or defeat any enterprises or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs should require; for the payment of such persons, in such a manner as his Majesty should direct, for the use and relief of his subjects in the several provinces of the North and South Carolina and Virginia, in recompense for such services as, with the approbation of his Majesty's commander-in-chief in America, they respectively had performed, or should perform, either by putting these provinces in a state of defence, or by acting against and against the enemies, for enabling the East India company to defray the expense of a military force in their settlements, to be maintained in them, in lieu of a battalional of his Majesty's forces withdrawn from those forts, and for defraying the expenses of the extension of the forts on the coast of Africa; for widening the avenues, and rendering more safe and commodious the streets and passages, leading from Charing-cross to the two Houses of parliament, the courts of justice, and the new bridge at Westminster. Such were the articles under which we may specify the supplies of this year, on the whole amounting to eight millions three hundred fifty thousand three hundred and twenty-five pounds, nine shillings, and three pence; the funds established amounted to eight millions six hundred eighty-nine thousand five hundred forty pounds, nineteen shillings, and seven pence; so that there was an overplus of three hundred thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-six pounds, ten shillings, and four pence; an excess greater, in case of payment of this fund, which was founded on a new plan, should not succeed.

§ XXIII. Some of these impositions were deemed grievous hardships by those upon whom they immediately fell, and many of them were opposed to the establishment of the projected army of observation in Germany, as the commencement of a ruinous continental war, which it was neither the interest of the nation to undertake, nor in their power to maintain, without starving the operations of sea, land, and in America, at the same time; and the British principles; without contracting such an additional load of debts and taxes, as could not fail to terminate in bankruptcy and distress. To those dependants of the ministry, who observed that, as Hanover was threatened by France for its connexion with Great Britain, it ought, in common gratitude, to be protected, they replied, that every state, in assisting any ally, ought to have a regard to its own preservation: that, if the King of England enjoyed by inheritance, or conquest, a province in the heart of France, it would be equally absurd and unjust, in case of a rupture with that kingdom, to exhaust the treasures of Great Britain in the defence of such a province; and yet the inhabitants of it would have to support the expenses of the war, which the Hanover stood solitary, like a hunted deer avoided by the herd, and had no other shelter but that of shrinking under the extended shield of Great Britain: that the reluctance expressed by the German princes to undertake the defence of these dominions flowed from a firm persuasion, founded on experience, that England would interpose as a principal, not only to draw her sword against the enemies of the electorate, but concentrate her chief strength in that object, and waste her treasures in purchasing their concurrence; that exclusive of an ample revenue drained from the sweet of the people, great part of which had been expended in continental efforts, the whole national debt incurred, since the accession of the late king, had been contracted in pursuance of measures totally foreign to the interest of these kingdoms: that, since Hanover was the favourite object, England would save money, and great blood, by all the alliances and co-operatives of the states, and of the co-estates; and another good consequence of the supply of Hanover, was that it would enable the elector of Hanover to improve the condition of his people; he became more contented and independent, and the spirit. The sums granted by the committee of supply did not exceed eight millions three hundred fifty thousand three hundred and twenty-five pounds, nine shillings, and three pence; the funds established amounted to eight millions six hundred eighty-nine thousand five hundred forty pounds, nineteen shillings, and seven pence; so that there was an overplus of three hundred thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-six pounds, ten shillings, and four pence; an excess greater, in case of payment of this fund, which was founded on a new plan, should not succeed.

immediately bent against his majesty's electoral dominions, and those of his good ally, the King of Prussia; his majesty confided in the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful Commons, that they would cheerfully assist him in forming and maintaining an army of observation, for the just and necessary defence and preservation of those territories, and enable him to fulfill his engagements with his Prussian majesty, for the security of the empire against that foreign enemy, and in support of the common cause. Posternity will hardly believe, that the emperor and all the Princes of Germany were in a conspiracy against their country, except the King of Prussia, the Elector of Hanover, and the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; by no means delivered him from the necessity of the moment. He was allowed, that Great Britain, after all the treaties she had made, and the numberless subsidies she had granted, should not have an ally left, except one prince, so embarrassed in his own affairs, that he could grant her no succour, whatever assistance he might demand. The king's message met with as favorable a reception as he could have desired. It was read in the House of Commons, together with a copy of the treaty between his majesty and the King of Prussia, including the secret and separate article, and the declaration signed on each side by the plenipotentiaries at Westminster: the request was granted, and the convention approved. With equal readiness did they gratify his majesty's inclinations, supplied his request of men and means delivered him from the day of May, by Lord Bateman, intimating, That in this critical juncture, emergencies might arise of the utmost importance, and be attended with the most pernicious consequences; to which may be immediately applied to prevent or defeat them; his majesty was therefore desirous that the House would enable him to defray any extraordinary expenses of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the service of the commonwealth; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to disappoint or defeat any enterprises or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require. The committee of supply forthwith granted a very large sum for these purposes, including the charge of German mercenaries. A letter message being at the same time communicated to the upper House, their lordships voted a very loyal address upon the occasion; and when the article of supply, which it produced among the Commons, fell under their inspection, they unanimously agreed to it, by way of a clause of appropriation.

§ XV. We have already observed, that the first bill which the Commons passed in this session, was for the relief of the poor, by prohibiting the exportation of corn; but this remedy not being judged adequate to the evil, another bill was framed, removing, for a limited time, the duty then payable upon foreign corn and floor imported; as was permitted for a certain time to the importation of corn, grain, meal, bread, biscuit, and flour, as had been or should be taken from the enemy, to be landed and expended in the kingdom, duty free. In order still more to reduce the high price of corn, and to prevent any supply of provisions from being sent to our enemies in America, a third bill was brought in, prohibiting, for a time therein limited, the exportation of corn, grain, meal, malt, flour, bread, biscuit, starch, beef, pork, bacon, or other victual, from any of the British plantations, unless to Great Brit- ain or Ireland, or from one colony to another. To this act two clauses were added, for allowing those necessary, mentioned above, to be imported in foreign-built ships, and from any state as amity with his majesty, either into Great Britain or Ireland; and for exporting from South- ampton or Exeter to the Isle of Man, for the use of the inhabitants, a quantity of wheat, barley, oats, meal, or flour, not exceeding two thousand five hundred quarters. The Commons would have still improved their humanity, had they construed and established some effectual method to punish those unfeeling villains, who, by engrossing and hoarding corn, have raised the price of provisions to the utmost, by artificial scarcity, and deprived their fellow-creatures of bread, with a view to their own private advantage. Upon a subsequent report of the committee, the House resolved, that, to prevent the high price of wheat and bread, no spirituous liquors should be distilled from wheat. While the bill formed on this resolution was in embryo, a petition was presented to the House by the brewers of London, Westminster, Southwark, and parts adjacent, representing, that, when the resolution passed, the price of malt, which was before too high, immediately rose to such a rate, as the distilling of it was rendered incapable of carrying on business at the price malt then bore, occasioned, as they conceived, from an apprehension of the necessity the distillers would be under to make use of the best barley and the least of the barley of wheat; that, in such a case, the markets would not be able to supply a sufficient quantity of barley for the demands of both professions, besides other necessary uses: they, therefore, praved, that in regard to the public revenue, to the interest of the province of Barry, and to the interest of the others employed in the trade of maltling. Particular interests, however, must often be sacrificed to the welfare of the community; and the present distress prevailed over the prospect of this disadvantage. It was accordingly resolved, that the act should be so construed as to prevent the distilling of every kind. The prohibition was limited to two months: but at the expiration of that term, the scarcity still continuing, it was continued by a new bill, the eleventh day of December, with a proviso, empowering his majesty to put an end to it at any time after the eleventh day of May, if such a step should be judged for the advantage of the kingdom.

§ XVI. The next bill that engaged the attention of the Commons was a measure of the utmost national importance, though secretly disliked by many individuals of the legislature, who, nevertheless, did not venture to oppose their disapprobation. The establishment of a militia was a very popular and desirable object, but attended with numberless difficulties, and a competition of interests which it was impossible to reconcile. It had formerly been an experiment worthy of the observation of the crown and the Commons; but now both apparently con- curred in rendering it serviceable to the commonwealth, though some acquiesced in the scheme, who were not at all beauty in its favour. On the fourth day of December, a motion was made, and a bill such foreseen, for the militia of Great Britain and Ireland, was read a first time, and referred to a committee of the whole House; and the bill was presented to the House by Mr. Townshend, and a considerable number of the most able members in the House, comprehending his own brother, Mr. Charles Townshend, whose genius shone with distinguished lustre: he was keen, discerning, eloquent, and accurate; possessed of a remarkable vivacity of parts, with a surprising solidity of understanding: was a gentleman, without arrogance, a patriot without prejudice, and a cour- tier without dependence.

§ XVII. While the militia bill remained under considera- tion in the House, a petition for a committee of the well regulated militia was presented by the mayor, jorists, and commonalty of the king's town and parish of Maid- stone, in Kent, in common-council assembled. At the same time the body of dissenting ministers of the three denominations in and about the cities of London and Westminster; by the pro- testant dissenters of Shrewsbury; the dissenting ministers of Devonshire; the protestant dissenters, being freeholders and lords proprietors, of a limited time past, in the county of Con- tingham, joined with other inhabitants of the church of England, expressing their apprehension, that, in the bill then depending, it might be proposed to exact, that the said militia should be exercised on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, and holding general courts-martial throughout the kingdom, they should pass into a law. Though nothing could be more ridiculously fanatic and impertinent than a declaration of such a scrape against a practice so laudable and necessary, in a country where that day of the week is generally spent in merry-making, riot, and debauchery, the House said so much regard to the squeamish consciences of those puritanical petitioners, that Monday was pitched upon for the day of exercise to the militia, though on such working days they might be made more profitably employed, both for themselves and their country: and that no religious pretence should be left for opposing the progress and execution of the bill, proper clauses were inserted for the relief of the dissenters. Another petition and counter-petition were delivered by the magistrates, freeholders, and burgesses of the town of Nottingham, in relation to their particular franchise, which were accordingly considered in framing the bill.

§ XXVIII. After mature deliberation, and divers alterations, it passed the lower House, and was sent to the Lords for their concurrence: here it underwent several amendments, one of which was the reduction of the number of the militia to such a proportion as was considered salutary; namely, to thirty-two thousand three hundred and forty men for the whole kingdom of England and Wales. The amendments being canvassed in the lower House, met with some opposition, and divers conferences with the House of Commons, and the act would have become a money-bill in which the Lords could have made no amendment; in order, therefore, to prevent any difference between the two Houses, on a dispute of privileges not yet obtained, they obtained nothing essentially different from what passed in the last session. The next law enacted was, for further preventing embezzlement of goods, and apparel, by those with whom they are intrusted, and putting an end to the practice of gaming in public-houses. By this bill a penalty was inflicted on gaming in public-houses, and two Houses agreed to every article, and the bill soon received the royal sanction. No provision, however, was made for clothes, arms, accoutrements, and pay: had regulations been made for these purposes, the act would have become a money-bill in which the Lords could have made no amendment; in order, therefore, to prevent any difference between the two Houses, on a dispute of privileges not yet obtained, they obtained nothing essentially different from what passed in the last session. After the bill was passed, the Commons left the expense of the militia to be regulated in a subsequent bill, during the following session, when they could, with more certainty, compute what sum would be necessary for these purposes. After all, the bill seemed to be crude, imperfect, and ineffectual, and the promoters of it were well aware of its defects; but they were apprehensive that it would have been dropped altogether, had they resisted the pressure, and being executed in the full and honest manner, they were eager to seize this opportunity of trying an experiment, which might afterwards be improved to a greater national advantage; and therefore they acquiesced in many of the alterations, which otherwise would not have been adopted.

§ XXIX. The next measure that fell under the consideration of the House was rendered necessary by the inhospitable perseverance of the publicans and innholders, who conceived themselves not obliged by law to receive or give quarters in their houses to any foreign troops, and accordingly refused admission to the Hessian auxiliaries, who began to be dreadfully incommoded by the severity of the weather. This objection, implying an attack upon the prerogative, the government did not think fit, at this juncture, to dispute any other war, than by procuring a new law in favour of those foreigners. It was intimated, "A bill to make provision for quartering the foreign troops now in this kingdom," that by the quartering act, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the collector-general, and immediately passed without opposition. This step being taken, another bill was brought in for the regulation of the marine forces while on shore. This was almost a transcript of the mutiny act, with this material difference: it empowered the admiralty to grant commissions for impressing for the service, and to dismiss those that were in the same manner, as his majesty is empowered to do by the usual mutiny bill: consequently, every clause was adopted without question.

§ XXX. The same favourable reception was given to a bill for the more speedy and effectual recruiting his majesty's land forces and fisheries; a law which threw into the hands of many worthless magistrates an additional power of oppressing their fellow-creatures: all justices of the peace for the land forces, and the officers of the customs and corporations and boroughs, were empowered to meet by direction of the secretary at war, communicated in precepts issued by the high sheriffs, or their deputies, within their respective divisions, and at their usual places of meeting, to qualify themselves for the execution of the act: then they were required to appoint the times and places for their succeeding meetings; to issue precepts to the proper officers for the succeeding meetings; and to give notice of the time and place of every meeting to such military officers as, by notice from the secretary at war, should be directed to attend that service. The annual bill for preventing mutiny and desertion, met with no objections, and indeed contained nothing differently from what the act passed in the last session. The next law enacted was, for further preventing embezzlement of goods, and apparel, by those with whom they are intrusted, and putting an end to the practice of gaming in public-houses. By this bill a penalty was inflicted on gaming in public-houses, and two Houses agreed to every article, and the bill soon received the royal sanction. No provision, however, was made for clothes, arms, accoutrements, and pay: had regulations been made for these purposes, the act would have become a money-bill in which the Lords could have made no amendment; in order, therefore, to prevent any difference between the two Houses, on a dispute of privileges not yet obtained, they obtained nothing essentially different from what passed in the last session. After the bill was passed, the Commons left the expense of the militia to be regulated in a subsequent bill, during the following session, when they could, with more certainty, compute what sum would be necessary for these purposes. After all, the bill seemed to be crude, imperfect, and ineffectual, and the promoters of it were well aware of its defects; but they were apprehensive that it would have been dropped altogether, had they resisted the pressure, and being executed in the full and honest manner, they were eager to seize this opportunity of trying an experiment, which might afterwards be improved to a greater national advantage; and therefore they acquiesced in many of the alterations, which otherwise would not have been adopted.

§ XXXI. Divers inconveniences having resulted from the interposition of justices, who, in pursuance of an act of parliament passed in the present reign, assumed the right of establishing rates for the payment of wages to weavers, several petitions were offered to the House of Commons, representing the evil consequences of such an establishment; and although these arguments were answered and opposed in counter-petitions, the Commons, not being tutored by a laudable concern for the interest of the wooden manufacture, after due deliberation removed the grievance by a new bill, repealing so much of the former act as empowered justices of the peace to make rates for the payment of wages, and to fix the said rates, forward to provide supplies for prosecuting the war with vigour, than ready to adopt regulations for the advantage of trade and manufactures. The society of the free British fishery presented a petition, alleging, that they had employed the sum of one hundred thirty thousand three hundred and five pounds, eight shillings, and sixteenpence, together with the entire produce of their fish, and all the monies arising from the several branches allowed on the tonnage of their ships, and on the exportation of their fish, in carrying on the said fishery; and that, from their being obliged, in the infancy of the undertaking, to incur a much larger expense than was at that time foreseen, they now found themselves still reduced in their present condition, and utterly incapable of further prosecuting the fisheries with any hope of success, unless indulged with the further assistance of parliament. They prayed, therefore, that towards enabling them to carry on the said fisheries, they might have liberty to make use of such nets as they should find best adapted to the said fisheries; each buss, nevertheless, carrying to sea the same quantity and depth of netting, which, by the fishery acts, they were then bound by law to use. The quantity of daily shillings per ton, allowed by the said acts on the vessels employed in the fishery, might be increased; and forasmuch as many of the stock proprietors were unable to advance any further sum for prosecuting this branch of commerce, and others unwilling in the present situation, and under the present restraints, to risk any further sum in the undertaking; that the stock of the society, by the said acts made unanswerable, except in case of death or bankruptcy, for a term of years, might for own interest be made answerable; and that the petitioners might be at liberty, between the intervals of the fishing-seasons, to employ the busses in such a manner as they should find for the advantage of the society. While the committee was employed in delighting on the particulars of this remonstrance, another was delivered from the free British fishery-chamber of Whitehaven in Cumberland, representing, that as the law then stood, they went to Shetland, and returned, at a great expense and loss of time; and while the war continued, durst not stay there to fish, besides being obliged to run the most imminent risks, by going and returning without convoy: that ever since the institution of the present fishery, experience had fully shewn that the inhabitants of Shetland were thereby deprived of two months of a much better fishery in St. George's channel, within one day's sail of Whitehaven: they took notice, that the free British fishery served to the inhabitants of the islands for further assistance and relief; and prayed that Campbeltown in Ayrshire might be appointed the place of rendezvous for the busses belonging to Whitehaven, for the summer as well as the winter fishery, that they might be engaged in the same with great advantage. The committee, having considered the matter of both petitions, were of opinion that the petitioners should be at liberty to use such nets as they should find best adapted to the white herring fishery; that the bounty of thirty shillings per ton should be augmented in fifty: that the petitioners should be allowed, during the intervals of the fishing seasons, to employ their vessels in other lawful business, provided they should have been employed in the herring fishery during the proper seasons: that they might use such barrels for packing the fish as they then used, or might hereafter find best adapted for that purpose: that they should have liberty to make use of any way or unconsumed land, one hundred yards of the least above high-water mark, for the purpose of drying their nets; and that Campbeltown would be the most proper and convenient place for the rendezvous of the busses belonging to Whitehaven. The last resolution, however, was not then inscribed in the bill which contained the other five, and in a little time received the royal assent.

§ XXXII. Such are the conjunctions, dependencies, and relations subsisting between the mechanical arts, agriculture, and manufactures of Great Britain, that it requires study, deliberation, and inquiry in the legislature to discern and distinguish the whole scope and consequences of many projects offered for the benefit of the commonwealth. The society of merchant adventurers in the city of Bristol, alleged, in a petition to the House of Commons, that great quantities of bar-iron were imported into Great Britain from Sweden, Russia, and other parts, chiefly purchased with specie of the value of one hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling, of which money was brought to Africa and other places: and the rest wrought up by the manufacturers. They affirmed that bar-iron, imported from North America, would answer the same purposes; and the importation of it tended not only to the great advantage of the kingdom, by increasing its shipping and navigation, but also to the benefit of the British colonies: that by an act passed in the twenty-third year of his present majesty's reign, the importation of bar-iron from America into the port of London was duty free, was permitted; but its being carried in coast-wars, or further by land than ten miles, had been prohibited; so that several very considerable manufacturing towns were deprived of the use of American iron, and those who imported it by fur trading or by commerce, were therefore desired, that bar-iron might be imported from North America into Great Britain duty free, by all his majesty's subjects. This request being reinforced by many other petitions from different parts of the kingdom, other classes of men, who thought several interests would be affected by such a measure, took the alarm more seriously; and the committee, after full inquiries and all consequences which they alleged would arise from its being enacted into a law. Pamphlets were published on both sides of the question, and violent disputes were kindled upon it in the chamber; and others unwilling in the present situation, and under the present restraints, to risk any further sum in the undertaking; that the stock of the society, by the said acts made unanswerable, except in case of death or bankruptcy, for a term of years, might for own interest be made answerable; and that the petitioners might be at liberty, between the intervals of the fishing-seasons, to employ the busses in such a manner as they should find for the advantage of the society. Such are the conjunctions, dependencies, and relations subsisting between the mechanical arts, agriculture, and manufactures of Great Britain, that it requires study, deliberation, and inquiry in the legislature to discern and distinguish the whole scope and consequences of many projects offered for the benefit of the commonwealth. The society of merchant adventurers in the city of Bristol, alleged, in a petition to the House of Commons, that great quantities of bar-iron were imported into Great Britain from Sweden, Russia, and other parts, chiefly purchased with specie of the value of one hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling, of which money was brought to Africa and other places: and the rest wrought up by the manufacturers. They affirmed that bar-iron, imported from North America, would answer the same purposes; and the importation of it tended not only to the great advantage of the kingdom, by increasing its shipping and navigation, but also to the benefit of the British colonies: that by an act passed in the twenty-third year of his present majesty's reign, the importation of bar-iron from America into the port of London was duty free, was permitted; but its being carried in coast-wars, or further by land than ten miles, had been prohibited; so that several very considerable manufacturing towns were deprived of the use of American iron, and those who imported it by fur trading or by commerce, were therefore desired, that bar-iron might be imported from North America into Great Britain duty free, by all his majesty's subjects. This request being reinforced by many other petitions from different parts of the kingdom, other classes of men, who thought several interests would be affected by such a measure, took the alarm more seriously; and the committee, after full inquiries and upon the importation of foreign iron, or by rendering it necessary for the undertakers of the iron mines in Great Britain to sell their produce cheaper than it has been for some years afforded: that the most effectual method for this end would be the total prohibition of the importation of all sorts of iron from the American plantations: that American iron can never be sold so cheap as that of Britain can be afforded; and, in the colonies, labour of all kinds is in great demand; and that the planters, who employs his own slaves, must reckon in his charge a great deal more than the common interest of their purchase-money, because, when one of them dies, or escapes from his service, the negro is replaced with another. A common interest of money in the plantations is considerably higher than in England; consequently no man in that country will employ his money in any branch of trade by which he cannot gain considerably more per cent. than is expected in Great Britain, where the interest is low, and profit moderate; a circumstance which will always give a great advantage to the British miner, who likewise enjoys an exemption from freight and insurance, which lie heavy upon the American adventure, especially in time of war. With respect to the apprehension of the leather tanners, they considered, that as the coppers generally grew on barren lands, not fit for tillage, and improved the pasturage, no man would be likely to debar them from the use of wood to spoil the pasture, as he could make no other use of the land on which it was produced. The wood must be always worth something, especially in counties where the woodlands are scarce, and, where it is not used, it will produce considerable advantage: therefore, if there was not one iron mine in Great Britain, no copperers would be brought up, unless it grew on a rich soil, which would produce corn instead of cord wood; consequently, the tanners have nothing to fear, especially as planting has become a prevailing taste among the landholders of the island. The committee appointed to prepare the bill seriously weighed and canvassed these arguments, examined the figures relating to the produce, importation, and manufacture of iron. At length Mr. John Pitt reported to the House their opinion, implying that the liberty granted by an act passed in the year 1760 to the proprietors of the iron mines importing bar-iron from the British colonies in America into the port of London, should be extended to all the other ports of Great Britain; and that so much of that act as related to this clause should be repealed. The House having determined on this clause, the bill was brought in accordingly, another petition was presented by several noblemen, gentlemen, freeholders, and other proprietors, owners, and possessors of hogs, and the bill was rejected. The Parliament, and the House of Commons, and the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, were all of opinion that the privilege of importation American bar-iron duty free, would be attended with numberless ill consequences both of a public and private nature; specifying certain hardships to which they in particular might be exposed; and proved that, if the bill should pass, they might be relieved from the pressure of an act passed in the reign of Henry VIII. obligeing the owners of coppice-woods to preserve them, under severe penalties; and be permitted to fell and grub up their coppice-woods, in order to a more proper cultivation of the soil, without being restrained by the fear of malicious and interested prosecutions. In consequence of this remonstrance, a clause was added to the bill, repealing the sentence of imprisonment, and the bill was rejected. The conversion of coppice or underwoods into pasture or tillage; then it passed through both Houses, and received the royal sanction. As there was not time, after this affair came upon the carpet, to obtain any new accounts from America, and as it was thought necessary to know the quantities of iron made in that country, the House presented no address to his majesty, desiring he would be pleased to give directions that there should be laid before them, to the next session of parliament, an account of the quantity of iron made in the American colonies, from Christmas, in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine, to the fifth day of January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one, and half year being distinguished.

§ XXXIII. From this important object, the parliament converted its attention to a regulation of a much more private nature. In consequence of a petition by the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, a bill was brought in, and passed into a law without opposition, for the more effectual preservation of the fry and spawn of fish in the river Thames, and waters of Medway, and for the better regulating the fishery in those rivers. The two next measures taken for the preservation of the American colonies, were bills to make effectual the several laws then in being, for the amendment and preservation of the highways and turnpike roads of the kingdom; the other for the more effectual preventing the spreading of desolation, distempers, and all manner of diseases, time, raging among the horned cattle. A third arose from the distress of poor silk manufacturers, who were destitute of employment, and deprived of all means of subsisting through the interruption of the Levant trade, occasioned by war, and the delay of the merchant ships from Italy. In order to remedy this inconvenience, a bill was prepared, enacting, that any persons might import from any place, in any ship or vessel whatsoever, till the first day of December, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven, to organize thrown silk of the growth or production of Italy, to be brought to the custom-house of London, wheresoever landed: but that no Italian thrown silk, other than that cut in Bologna, nor any other throw silk of the growth or production of Turkey, Persia, East India, or China, should be imported by this act, under the penalty of the forfeiture thereof. Notwithstanding, it was resolved, standing several bills of strangers, owners, and commanders of ships, and others trading to Leghorn, and other ports of Italy, as well as by the importers and manufacturers of raw silks, representing the evil consequences that would probably attend the passing of such a bill, the parliament agreed to suspend this temporary deviation from the famous act of navigation, for a present supply to the poor manufacturers.

§ XXXIV. The next evil regulation established in this session of parliament, is itself difficult, because, and had it been more eagerly suggested, might have been much more beneficial to the public. In order to discourage the practice of smuggling, and prevent the desperadoes concerned therein from eluding the service of the enemy a law was passed, enacting, that every person who had been, before the first of May in the present year, guilty of illegal running, concealing, receiving, or carrying away any wool, or prohibited goods, or any foreign commodities liable to custom duties, the same not having been paid or secured by any person being aidy therein, or had been found with fire-arms or weapons, in order to be aiding to such offenders; or had been guilty of receiving such goods after seizure; or of any act whatsoever, whereby persons might be suspected of promoting the reduction of goods; or of hindering, wounding, or beating any officer in the execution of his duty, or assisting therein; should be indemnified from all such offenses, concerning which no suit should then have been commenced, or composition made, on condition that he should, before being apprehended or prosecuted, and before the first day of December, enter himself with some commissioned officer of his majesty's fleet, to serve as a common sailor; and should, for three years from such entry, unless sooner fully discharged, actually serve and do duty in that station, and register his name, &c. with the clerk of the peace of the county where he resided, as the act prescribes. An attempt was made in favor of the officers who had been very irregularly paid, and subject to grievous hardships in consequence of this irregularity; Mr. Grenville, brother to Earl Temple, moved for leave to bring in a bill for the encouragement of seamen employed in his majesty's navy, and for establishing a regular method for the punctual, speedy, and certain payment of their wages, as well as for relieving them from the arts of fraud and imposition. The House, however, of Commons, after several petitions; the bill was prepared, read, printed, and, after it had undergone some amendment, passed into the House of Lords, where it was encountered with several objections and dropped for this session of parliament.
proper provisions to restrain the price of corn and bread within due bounds for the future. For this purpose they were empowered by the Commons for persons, papers, and records; and it was resolved, that all who attended the same common should have voices. Having inquired into the causes of the late scarcity, they agreed to several resolutions, and a bill was brought in to explain and amend the laws against vagrants, first-tellers, and purge-mongers. The committee also received instructions to inquire into the abuses of millers, maltmen, and bakers, with regard to bread, and to consider of proper methods to prevent them in the several instances where the same had been committed; a matter more incidental to the Commons than to the House of Lords. The committee was authorized to consider the foregoing resolutions for the purpose of preventing a regular and minute investigation, to introduce confusion and contest, to puzzle, perplex, and obfuscate; to tease, fatigue, and disgust the inquirers, that the examinees might be enabled to give information in a manner more suited to the nature of the business than to the exigency of the committee; and to the ministry, from this anarchy and confusion of materials, half explored and undigested, and partly general parliamentary approbation, to which they might appeal from the accusations of the people. A select committee would have probably examined some of the chairs of the respective offices, that they might certainly know whether any letters or papers had been suppressed, whether the extracts had been faithfully made, and whether there might not be papers of intelligence, which, though proper to be submitted to a select and secret committee, could not, consistently with the honour of the nation, be communicated to a committee of the whole House. It was likewise resolved, that a committee should inquire of the ministers whether they had any knowledge of intelligence or correspondence that could be much depended upon in any matter of national importance, and no evidence was examined on the occasion; a circumstance that, in England, where the people are more warlike than in any part of the Continent, have generally found means to render such inquiries ineffective; and the same arts would at any rate have operated with the same efficacy, had a secret committee been employed at this juncture. Be that as it may, several resolutions were brought in to mitigate the loss of Minorca, which had excited such loud and universal clamour. By directions to the king, unanimously voted, the Commons requested that his majesty would give directions for laying before them copies of all the letters, papers, and documents containing any intelligence received by the secre- taries of state, the commissioners of the admiralty, or any other of his majesty's ministers, in relation to the equipment of the French fleet at Toulon, or the designs of the French on Minorca, or any other of his majesty's possessions in Europe, since the first day in January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, to the first day in August, 1756. They likewise desired to peruse a list of the ships of war that were equipped and made ready for sea, from the first of August, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, to the thirtieth day of April, in the following year; with the copies of all the letters, papers, and documents relating to the command, and for the defence of Fort St. Philip, during the period of time above mentioned, according to the monthly returns made by the admiralty, with the number of seamen mustered and on board the respective ships. They demanded copies of all orders and instructions given to that admiral, and of letters written to and received from him, during his continuance in that command, either by the secretaries of state, or lords of the admiralty, relating to the condition of his squadron, and to the execution of his orders. In a word, they required the inspection of all papers, which, in any manner, could in any manner tend to explain the loss of Minorca, and the miscarriage of Mr. Byng's squadron. His majesty complied with every article of their requests: the papers were presented to the House, ordered to lie upon the table for the perusal of the members, and finally referred to the consideration of a committee of the whole House. In the course of their deliberations they addressed his majesty for more information respecting the manner in which the said papers were introduced into the House, and the orders of the House. His majesty, in reply, stated that the committee, after a full examination, could not have properly removed. Indeed, many discerning persons without doors began to despair of seeing the mystery unfolded, as soon as the war was undertaken by a committee of the whole House. They observed, that an affair of such a dark, intricate, and suspicious nature, ought to have been referred to a select and secret committee, chosen by ballot, em-fifty-five, with express notice that it would consist of twelve ships of the line; that the demand against Minorca was communicated as early as the twenty-seventh day of August, by Consul Banks, of Carthagena; confirmed by letters from Consul Bertes, at Genoa, dated on the seventeenth and eighteenth of the same month, and by the Petition of the legislature. The First Lord of the Treasury, Mr. Pitt, the secretary of state, on the fourth and eleventh of February, as well as by many subsequent intimations; that, notwithstanding these repeated advices, even after hostilities had commenced, and Escalus, when the garrison of Minorca was amounted to no more than one company of artillery, forty-two officers being absent, and the place otherwise unprovided for a siege, when the Mediterranean squadron, commanded by Mr. Edgcumbe, consisted of two ships of the line and five frigates; neither stores, ammunition, nor provision, the absent officers belonging to the garrison, recruits for the regiments, though ready armed, miners nor any additional troops were sent to the island, nor the squadron augmented, till Admiral Byng sailed from Spithead on the sixth day of April, with no more ships of the line than, by the most early and authentic intelligence, the government were informed would sail from Toulon, even were Mr. Byng should have been joined by Commodore Edgcumbe; a junction upon which no dependence ought to have been laid; that this squadron contained no troops but such as belonged to the four regiments in garrison, except one battalion to serve in the fleet as marines, and as a guard, and an equal number to be embarked at Gibraltar; which order was neither obeyed nor understood; that, considering the danger to which Minorca was exposed, and the forwardness of the enemy's preparations, the squadron, instead of the ships of the line and one frigate, which returned on the sixteenth of February, after having conveyed a fleet of merchant ships, might have been detached to Minorca, without hazarding the safety of the fleet; for at that time, exclusive of this squadron, there were eight ships of the line and thirty-two frigates ready manned, and thirty-two ships of the line and five frigates almost equipped; that Admiral Hawke's squadron, instead of the ship of the line and three frigates, to cruise in the bay of Biscay, after repeated intelligence had been received that the French fleet had sailed for the West Indies, and the eleven ships remaining at Harwich, for want of hands and cannon, so that they could never serve to carry any embarkation or despatch, consequently Mr. Hawke's squadron might have been spared for the relief of Minorca; that instead of attending to this important object, the admiralty, on the eighth day of March, sent two ships of the line and twenty frigates to intercept a coasting convoy off Cape Breart; on the eleventh of the same month they detached two ships of the line to the West Indies, and on the sixteenth two more ships of the line and fifteen frigates to blockade the island, and intermediate service; on the twenty-third two of the line and three frigates a convoy-hunting off Cherbourg; and on the first of April five ships of the line, including three returned from this last service, to reinforce Sir Edward Hawke, already too strong for the French fleet bound to Canada; that all these ships might have been added to Mr. Byng's squadron, without exposing Great Britain or Ireland to any hazard of invasion; that length Mr. Byng was detached with ten great ships only, and even denied a frigate to repeat signals, for which he petitioned; although at that very time there was in port, exclusive of his squadron, seventeen ships of the line and thirteen frigates ready for sea, because the hands of the line were not at that time in equipoit. From these and other circumstances, particularized and urged with great vivacity, many individuals inferred, that a greater number of ships might have been detached to the Mediterranean, and that the defection against Minorca was caused by Admiral Byng: that the not sending an earlier and stronger force was one great cause of Minorca's being lost, and co-operated with the delay of the ministry in sending that force, and that the causes of the speedy evacuation of the officers of the garrison to continue absent from their duty, and their omitting to give orders for raising miners to serve in the fortress of Mahon.

GEORGE II.

Chap. VI.—A. D. 1757.]

assembly to raise and apply public money without the consent of the governor and council, was illegal, repugnant to the terms of his majesty’s commission to his governor of the said island, and derogatory to the rights of the crown and his Britannic Majesty; that six resolutions taken in the assembly of Jamaica, on the twenty-ninth day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three, proceeded on a manifest misapprehension of the king’s instruction to his governor, requiring him not to give any assurance of such extraordinary nature and importance, wherein his majesty’s prerogative, or the property of his subjects, might be prejudiced, or the trade of shipping the kingdom any ways affected, unless by a direct act of parliament; and suspending the execution of such bill until his majesty’s pleasure should be known; that such instruction was just and necessary, and no alteration of the constitution of the island, nor any way derogatory to the rights of the subjects in Jamaica.

From these resolutions the reader may perceive the nature of the dispute which had arisen between the people of Jamaica and their governor, Vice-Admiral Knowles, whose conduct on this occasion seems to have been justified by the legislature. The parliament, however, foresaw to determine the question, whether the removal of the courts of judicature from Spanish town to Kingston, was a measure calculated for the interest of the island in general.

XXXIX. The last subject which shall have mention made of it as having fallen under the cognizance of the Commons during this session of parliament, was the state of Milford-haven on the coast of Wales, one of the most capacious, safe, and commodious harbours in Great Britain. Here the court has found many conveniences for building ships of war, and erecting forts, docks, quays, and magazines. It might be fortified at a very small expense, so as to be quite secure from any attempts of the enemy; and rendered by far the most useful harbour in the kingdom for fleets, cruisers, trading ships, and packet-boats, bound to and from the westward; for, from hence they may put to sea almost with any wind, and even at low water; they may weather Scilly and Cape Clear when no vessel can steer from the British channel, or out of the French ports of Brest and Rochefort; and as a post can travel from hence in three days to London, it might become the centre of very useful sea intelligence. A petition from several merchants in London was presented, and recommended to the House in a message from the king, specifying the advantages of this harbour, and the small expense at which it might be fortified and improved, and praying that the House would take this important subject into consideration. Accordingly, a committee was appointed for this purpose, with power to send for persons, papers, and records; and every circumstance relevant to the probable advantage of the proposal was examined and deliberated upon. At length the report being made to the House by Mr. Charles Townshend, they unanimously agreed to an address, representing to his majesty, that many great losses had been sustained by the trade of the kingdom, in time of war, from the want of a safe harbour on the western coast of the island, for the reception and protection of merchant ships, and sending out cruisers; that the harbour of Milford-haven, in the county of Pembroke, is most advantageously situated, and it properly defended and secured, in every respect adapted to the answering those important purposes; they, therefore, humbly besought his majesty, that he would give immediate directions for erecting and improving the present harbour, as the most convenient place for guarding the entrance called Hubberstone-road, and also such other fortifications as might be necessary to secure the interior parts of the harbour, and that, until such batteries and fortifications could be completed, some temporary defence might be provided for the immediate protection of the ships and vessels lying in the said harbour; finally, they assured him the House would make good to his majesty all such expenses as should be incurred. The address met with a gracious reception, and a promise that such directions should be given. The harbour was actually surveyed, the places were pitched upon for batteries and fortifications, were prepared, but no further progress has since been made.

§ XL. We have now finished the detailed of all the military transactions of this session, except what relates to the fate of Admiral Byng, which now claims our attention. In the meantime, we may observe, that on the fourth day of July the session was closed with his majesty’s baragouge, the most regal ceremony that ever appeared; the king turned upon his royal assurance, that the succour and preservation of his dominions in America had been his constant care, and, next to the security of his kingdoms, should continue to be his great and principal object. He told them he had given him as much as he trusted, by the blessing of God, might effectually disappoint the designs of the enemy in those parts: that he had no further view but to vindicate the just rights of his crown and subjects from the most odious and most alarming attempts; and, as far as the circumstances of things might admit; to prevent the true friends of Britain, and the liberties of Europe, from being oppressed and endangered by any unprovoked and unnatural conjuction.

§ XLI. Of all the transactions that distinguished this year, the most extraordinary was the sentence executed on Admiral Byng, the son of that great officer who had acquired such honour by his naval exploits in the preceding reign, and was ennobled for his services by the title of Lord Viscount Torrington. His second son, John Byng, had from his earliest youth been trained to his father’s profession; and was generally esteemed one of the best officers in the navy. He had been in command of the Hispaniola, which covered his character with disgrace, and even exposed him to all the horrors of an ignominious death. On the twenty-eighth day of December his trial began before a court-martial, and it was declared by the court that he should be hanged in the harbour of Portsmouth, to which place Mr. Byng had been conveyed from Greenwich by a party of horse-guards, and insulted by the populace in every town and village through which he passed. The court has also proceeded to examine the evidence for the crown and the prisoner, from day to day, in the course of a long sitting, agreed unanimously to thirty-seven resolutions, implying their opinions that Admiral Byng, during the engagement between the British and French fleets, on the twentieth day of May last, did not do his utmost endeavour to take, seize, and destroy the ships of the French king, which it was his duty to have engaged, and to assist such of his majesty’s ships as were engaged, which it was his duty to have assisted; and that he did not exert his utmost power for the relief of St. Philip’s castle. They, therefore, unanimously agreed that he fell under part of the twelfth article of an act of parliament passed in the twenty-third year of the present reign, for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act of parliament, the laws relating to the government of his majesty’s vessels, ships, and forces by sea; and that he should die, without any alternative left to the discretion of the court under any variation of circumstances, they unanimously adjudged the said Admiral John Byng to be shot to death, at such time, and on board of such ship, as the lords commissioners of the admiralty should please to direct. But as it appeared, by the evidence of the officers who were near the admiral’s person, that no backwardness was perceivable in him during the action, nor any mark of fear or confusion either in his countenance or behaviour; but that he delivered his orders coolly and distinctly, without seeming deficient in personal courage; and, from other circumstances, they believed his misconduct did not arise either from cowardice or disaffection, to the king and his subjects, and did him as a proper object of mercy. The admiral himself behaved through the whole trial with the most cheerful composure, seemingly the effect of conscious innocence, upon which, perhaps, he too much relied. Even after he had heard the evidence examined against him, he defended his own defence, he laid his account in being honourably acquitted; and ordered his coach to be ready for conveying him directly from the tribunal to London. A gentleman, his friend by birth, was in that expectation; but, when he arrived to the completion of the sentence to be pronounced, thought it his duty to prepare him for the occasion, that he might sum up all his fortitude to his assistance, and accordingly made him acquainted with the intended sentence. The admiral gave tokens of surprise and resentment, but betrayed no marks of fear or disorder, either then or in the court when the sentence was pronounced. On the contrary, while diverse members of the court-martial manifested grief, anxiety, and trepidation, shedding tears, and sighing with extraordinary emotion, he heard his doom denounced with a calmness and composure, so much such things demand, and made a low obeisance to the president and the other members of the court, as he retired.

§ XII. The officers who composed this tribunal were so sensible of the law's severity, that they unanimously submitted, without going into any argument, to the admiral's sentence, and made this remarkable paragraph:—"We cannot help lamenting the distresses of our minds before your lordships on this occasion, in finding ourselves under necessity of condemning a man whom your lordships probably know to be a captain of the first rank, a distinguished man, and a member of your Majesty's government, to death; and therefore, for our own conveniences sake, as well as in justice to the prisoner, we pray your lordships, in the most earnest manner, to recommend him to his majesty's clemency." The lords of the admiralty, instead of complying with the request of the court-martial, transmitted their letter to the king, with copies of their proceedings, and a letter from themselves to his majesty, specifying a doubt with regard to the legality of the sentence, as the crime of negligence, for which the admiral had been condemned, was not expressed in any part of the proceedings, and a great many others of the same nature. George Lord Viscount Torrington, in behalf of his kinsman Admiral Byng, were submitted to his majesty's royal wisdom and determination. All the friends and relations of the admiral, in England and Scotland, exerted their influence and interest for his pardon; and as the circumstances had appeared so strong in his favour, it was supposed that the sceptre of royal mercy would be extended for his preservation; but insubstantial arts were used to whet the savage appetite of the populace for blood. The cry of vengeance was loud throughout the land; sullen clouds of suspicion and malevolence interposing, were sty to obstruct the genial beams of the best virtue that adorns the throne, and the sovereign was given to understand, that the execution of Admiral Byng was a victim absolutely necessary to appease the fury of the people. His majesty, in consequence of the representation made by the lords of the admiralty, referred the sentence to the consideration of the twelve judges, who were unanimously of opinion, that the sentence was legal. This report being transmitted from the privy council to the admiralty, their lordships issued a warrant directing the execution to be performed on the twenty-eighth day of February. One gentleman at the board, however, refused to subscribe the warrant, assigning for his refusal the reasons which we have inserted by way of explanation of his objection.

§ XII. Though mercy was denied to the criminal, the crown seemed determined to do nothing that should be thought inconsistent with law. A member of parliament who had sat upon the court-martial at Portsmouth, rose up in his place, and made application to the House of Commons in behalf of himself and several other members of that tribunal, praying the aid of the legislature to be released from the oath of secrecy imposed on court-martial, that they might disclose the grounds on which sentence of death had passed on Admiral Byng, and, perhaps, discover such circumstances as might show the sentence to have been erroneous. Mr. Pitt, importing, that though he had determined to let the law take its course with relation to Admiral Byng, and resisted the efforts to obtain interference, he was a member of the House had expressed some scruples about the sentence, his majesty had thought fit to respite the execution of it, that there might be an opportunity of knowing, by the result of a full and impartial examination of the court-martial, upon oath, what grounds there were for such scruples, and that his majesty was resolved still to let the sentence be carried into execution, unless it appear from the said examination, that Admiral Byng was unjustly condemned. The sentence might be strictly legal, and at the same time very severe, according to the maxim, summun jus summum iniuria. In such cases, and perhaps in such cases only, the rigour of the law ought to be softened by the lenient hand of the royal prerogative. That this was the case of Admiral Byng appears from the warm and eager intercession of his jury, a species of intercession which hath generally, if not always, prevailed at the foot of the throne. Admiral Byng was a very great man; he had rendered his country so many services, and was universally so well esteemed for his integrity and truth, that his arrest and condemnation had appeared to the whole nation an extremely unjust and inhumane proceeding. The court-martial had condemned him on the ground of cowardice and treachery, only two imputations that render him criminal in the eyes of the nation. Such an interposition of the crown in parliamentary transactions was irregular, unnecessary, and at another juncture might have been productive of violent heats and declamations. At present, however, it passed without censure, as the effect of inattention rather than a design to encroach upon the privileges of the House.

§ XII. The message being communicated, a bill was immediately brought in to release the members of the court-martial from the obligation of secrecy, and passed through the lower House without opposition; but in the House of Lords it appeared to be destitute of a proper foundation. They sent a message to the Commons, desiring them to give leave that such of the members of the court-martial as were members of that House might attend their lordships, in order to give an account of the proceedings of the court, and to read their speeches. On the 10th of March, the House of Lords on the bill; accordingly they, and the rest of the court-martial, attended, and answered all questions without hesitation. As they did not insist upon any excuse, nor produce any satisfaction to account for such a proceeding, it was thought they had condemned was a proper object of mercy, their lordships were of opinion that there was no occasion for passing any such bill, which, therefore, they almost unanimously rejected. It is not easy to conceive what stronger reasons could be given for proving Mr. Byng an object of mercy, than those mentioned in the letter sent to the board of admiralty by the members of the court-martial, who were HISTORY

I. THE UNFORTUNATE ADMIRAL.

§ I. V. The unfortunate admiral, being thus abandoned to the stroke of justice, prepared himself for death with resignation and tranquillity. He maintained a surprising cheerfulness to the last; nor did he, from his condemnation to his execution, exhibit the least sign of impatience or apprehension. During that interval he had remained on board his galley, a third-rate ship of war, anchored in the harbour of Portsmouth, under a strong guard, in custody of the marshal of the admiralty. On the fourteenth of March, the day fixed for his execution, the boats belonging to the squadron at Spithead being manned and armed, came to the galley, and, as they embarked with a detachment of marines, attended this solemnity in the harbour, which was also crowded with an infinite number of other boats and vessels filled with spectators. About noon, the admiral having taken leave of a clergyman, and two friends who accompanied him, walked out of the great cabin to the quarter-deck, where two files of marines were ready to execute the sentence. He advanced with a firm deliberate step, a composed and resolute countenance, and resolved to suffer with his face uncovered, until his friends representing that his looks would possibly intimidate the soldiers, and prevent their taking aim properly, he submitted to their request, and stepped on the quarter-deck, kneeling on his cushioned one white handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a signal for his executioners, who fired a volley so decisive, that five bullets passed through his body, and he dropped down dead in an instant. The time in which this execution was acted, from the hour of the cabin to when he had been deposited in the coffin, did not exceed three minutes.

§ XLVI. Thus fell, to the astonishment of all Europe, Admiral John Byng, whose nature's errors and indiscretions might have been, seems to have been really condemned, menly given up, and cruelly sacrificed to vile considerations. The sentiments of his own fate he avowed on the day of his arrest, when there was no longer a cause of dissimulation, in the following declaration, which, immediately before his death, he delivered to the marshal of the admiralty: "A few moments will now deliver me from the vurient perseverance, and frustrate the further malice, of my enemies; nor need I eny them a life subject to the sensations my injuries, and the injustice done me, must create. Persuaded I am, that justice will be done to my reputation hereafter; the manner and cause of my execution, and keeping up the popular clamour and prejudice against me will be seen through. I shall be considered (as I now perceive myself) a victim destined to divert the indig- nation and resentment of an injured and deted people. My enemies themselves may now think me innocent. Happy for me, at this my last moment, that I know my own innocence, and am conscious that no part of my country's misfortunes can be owing to me. I heartily wish the shedding of my blood may contribute to the happiness and service of my country; but cannot resign my just claim to a faithful dis- charge of my duty according to the best of my judgment, and the utmost exertion of my ability for his majesty's honour, and my country's service. I am sorry that my endeavours were not attended with more success, and that the armament under my command proved too weak to succeed in any expedition of such moment. Truth has prevailed on them more than myself; and, since I have been without the ignominious stain of my supposed want of personal courage, and the charge of disaffection. My heart acquires me of these crimes: who can be presump- tuous and overbearing in such a judgment? any crime is an excessive judgment, or differing in opinion from my judges, and if yet the error in judgment should be on their side, God forgive them, as I do; and may the distress of their minds, and unreasonableness of their consciences, which in justice to me they have represented, be relieved, and subside as my resentment has done. The Supreme Judge sees all hearts and motives, and to him I must submit the justice of my cause." opportunities, ineffectual cruises, absurd dispositions of fleets and squadrons, the disgrace in the Mediterranean, and the loss of Minorca, were numbered among the misfortunes that flowed from the crude designs of a weak and dispirited ministry; and the prospect of their acquiescing in the French alliance, and assenting to the dissolution of the union and detestation with the body of the people. In order to conciliate the good will of those whom their conduct had disobliged, to acquire a fresh stock of credit with their fellow citizens, and to impress on the public mind and heart a part of what future censure might ensue, they admitted into a share of the administration a certain set of gentlemen, remarkable for their talents and popularity, headed by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Lege, esteemed the two most conspicuous patrons of Great Britain, alike distinguished and admired for their unconquerable spirit and untainted integrity. The former of these was appointed secretary of state, the other chancellor of the exchequer; and their friends were vested with other honourable though subordinate offices.

§ II. So far the people were charmed with the promotion of individuals, upon whose virtues and abilities they fixed the most perfect reliance; but these new ingredients were not so well received with the old levies. The administration became an emblem of the image that Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, the lea was of iron, and the foot was of clay. The old junta found their new associates very unfit for their purpose. They could neither administer the state, for their country, nor for the true interest of their country. The new ministers combated in council every plan, however patronized; they openly opposed in parliament every design which they deemed unworthy of the crown, or prejudicial to the people, even though distinguished by the predilection of the sovereign. Far from bargaining for their places, and surrendering their principles by capitulation, they maintained in office their independency and mould with the most vigilant circumspection, and seemed determined to show, that he is the best minister to the sovereign who acts with the greatest probity towards his country; and who immediately surrounding the throne were supposed to have concealed the true characters of those faithful servants from the knowledge of their royal master; to have represented them as obtuse, impious, ignorant, and even lukewarm in their loyalty; and to have declared, that with such colleagues it would be impossible to move the machine of government according to his majesty's inclination. These suggestions, artfully insinuated, produced the desired effect; on the ninth day Lord North left the cabinet, and the king in person intrusted the seals of secretary of state for the southern department. In the room of Mr. Legge, the king was pleased to grant the office of chancellor of the exchequer to the Rt. Hon. Lord Camden, and the chancellor of the exchequer, of the court of king's bench, the same personage whom we have mentioned before under the name of Mr. Murray, solicitor-general, now promoted and ennobled for his extraordinary merit and important services. The fate of Mr. Pitt was extended to some of his principal friends; the board of admiralty was changed, and some others were made with the same intention.

§ III. What was intended as a disgrace to Mr. Pitt and Mr. Lege turned out one of the most shining circumstances of their characters. The whole nation seemed to rise up, as one man, in the vindication of their fame: every mouth was opened in their praise; and a great number of respectable cities and corporations presented them with the freedom of their respective societies, enclosed in gold boxes of curious workmanship, as testimonies of their peculiar veneration. What the people highly esteem, they in a manner idolize. Not content with the public testimonies of regard, they conceived the most violent prejudices against those gentlemen who succeeded in the administration; fully convinced, that the same persons who had sunk the nation in the present dire straits, were the same who, without offering so flattering and grateful to conscious virtue, they conceived the most violent prejudices against those gentlemen who succeeded in the administration; § V. From these considerations a powerful fleet was ordered to be rendezvous on the coast of Jersey, and two notice, and two regiments of foot were marched to the Isle of Wight. The naval armament, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, and transports, was put under the command of Sir Edward Hawke, a man whose services recommended him, above all others, to this command; and Rear-Admiral Knowles was appointed his subaltern. Sir John Mor-dauet was preferred to take the command of the land forces; and both strictly enjoined to act with the utmost unami-nity and harmony. Europe beheld with astonishment these mighty preparations. The destination of the armament was wrapped in the most profound secrecy: it exercised the penetration of politicians, and filled France with very serious alarms. Various were the impediments which obstructed the embarkation of the troops for several weeks, while Mr. Pitt expressed the greatest uneasiness at the delay, and repeatedly urged the commander-in-chief to expedite his departure; but a sufficient number of transports, owing to some blunder in the contractors, had not yet arrived. The troops expressed an eager impatience to sig-nalize themselves against the enemies of the liberties of Europe, but the superfluities drew unfavourable presages from the dilatoriness of the embarkation. At last the transports arrived, the troops were put on board with all the expedition, and the fleet got under sail on the eighth day of May, and proceeded with the expedition of every move-ment with the love of his country, and solicitous for her honour. The public, highly with expectation, dubious where the stroke would fall, but confident of its success, were impatient for tidings from the fleet; but it was not till the fourteenth, that even the troops began to conceive of a declension that a descent was meditated on the coast of France, near Rochefort or Rochelle.

§ VII. On the twentieth, the fleet made the isle of Oleron. Sir Edward Hawke sent an order to Vice-Admiral Knowles, requiring him, if the wind permitted the fleet, to proceed to Basque road, to stand in as near to the isle of Aix as the pilot would carry him, with such ships of his division as he thought necessary for the service, and to batter the fort till the garrison should either abandon or surrender it. But the immediate execution of this order was frustrated by a French ship of war standing in the very midst of the fleet, and continuing to station that station for some time before she discovered her take, or any of the captains had a signal thrown out to give chase. Admiral Knowles, when too late, ordered the Magnanime, Captain Howe, and Torbay, Captain Keppel, on the contrary, to retreat and thereby retard the battering of the fort, which he was immediately sent. A stroke of policy greatly to be admired, as from hence he gained time to assure himself of the strength of the fortifications of Aix, before he ran his shipping's ships into danger.

§ VIII. While the above ships, with the addition of the Royal William, were attending the French ship of war safe into the river Garonne, the remainder of the fleet was beating to windward off the isle of Oleron; and the commander-in-chief publishing orders and regulations which did credit to his judgment, and would have been highly useful, had there ever been occasion to put them in execution. On the twenty-third the ran of the fleet, led by Captain Howe in the Magnanime, stood towards Aix, a small island situated in the mouth of the river Charante, leading up to Rochefort, the fortifications half finished, and mounted with about thirty cannon and mortars, the garrison composed of three hundred men, and the whole island about five miles in circumference. As the Magnanime approached the enemy fired briskly upon her; but Captain Howe, regardless of their faint endeavours, kept on his course with-out being observed, and, after a short fire, he surprised the walls, and poured in so incessant a fire as soon silenced their artillery. It was, however, near an hour before the fort strung, when some forces were landed to take possession of so important a point. Every one in orders to demolish the fortifications, the care of which was intrusted to Vice-Admiral Knowles, was

and

IX. Inconsiderable as this success might appear, it greatly elated the troops, and was deemed a happyomen of further advantages; but, instead of embarking the troops that night, as was universally expected, several su-cessive days were spent in councils of war, soundings of the coast, and the employment of several vessels to learn whether they were practicable, or to be compiled with. Eight days were elapsed since the first appearance of the fleet on the coast, and the alarm was given to the enemy. Sir Edward Hawke, indeed, proposed laying a sixty-gun ship against four French four-deckers, which it was thought would help to secure the landing of the troops, and facilitate the enterprise on Rochefort. This a French pilot on board (Thierry) undertook: but after a ship had been lightened for the purpose, the French knewles reported that a bomb-ketch had run aground at above the distance of two miles from the fort; upon which, the project of battering the fort was abandoned. The admiral likewise proposed to bombard Rochelle; but this venture was overruled, for reasons which we need not mention. It was not long to determine, in a council of war held on the eighth, to make a descent and attack the forts leading to and upon the mouth of the river Charante. An order, in consequence of this resolution, was immediately issued for the troops to be ready to embark from the transports in the boats precisely at twelve o'clock at night. Accordingly, the boats were prepared, and filled with the men at the time appointed. Each boat was similarly manned with each other, and the sides of the ships, for the space of four hours, while the council were determining whether, after all the trouble given, they should land; when, at length, to attend to the undermentioned respective transports, and all thoughts of a descent, to appearance, were wholly abandoned. The succeeding days were employed in blowing up and demolishing the fortifications of Aix; after which, the land-officers, in a council of war, employed the fire of their batteries, and, without any further attempts, fully satisfied they had done all to their power to execute the designs of the ministry, and choosing rather to oppose the frowns of a sturdy government, to the contempt of mankind, than fight a handful of dastardly militia. Such was the issue of an expedition that raised the expectation of all Europe, threw the coast of France into the utmost confusion, and cost the people of England little less than a million of money.

§ X. The fleet was no sooner returned than the whole nation was in a ferment. The public expectation had been wound up to the highest pitch, and now the disappointment, conjunct with the news of the reduction of the island, that the pride of France would have been humbled by so formidable an armament. The ministry, and with them the national voice, exclaimed against the commanding officers: enraged at the breach of faith, the officers dis-tributed the blame on the projectors of the enterprise, who had put the nation to great expense before they had obtained the necessary information. Certain it was, that blame must fall some where, and the ministry resolved he acquit themselves and fix the accusation, by requesting his majesty to appoint a board of officers of character and ability, to inquire into the causes of the late miscarriage. This they it was that could appose the public clamours, and afford general satisfaction. The enemies of Mr. Pitt endeavoured to wrest the miscarriages of the expedition to his prejudice, but the whispers of faction were soon drowned in the roar of the whole people of England, who never could persuade themselves that England was a great and famous nation, and the public fame and popularity by mere dint of superior merit, integrity, and disinterestedness, would now sacrifice his reputation by a mock armament, or hazard incurring the denson of England, by neglecting to obtain all the necessary previous information, or doing whatever might contribute to the success of the expedition. It was asked, whether reason or justice dictated, that a late unfortunate admiral should be punished, rather than the ministry who his utmost ability to relieve Fort St. Philip, invested by a powerful army, and surrounded with a numerous fleet, while no charge of negligence or cowardice was brought against those who occasioned the miscarriage. The bill converted and well appointed expedition! The people, they said, were not to be quiited with the resolutions of a concil of war, composed of men whose activity might frame excuses for declining to expose themselves to danger. It was publicly mentioned, that such back-handers appeared among the general officers before the fleet reached the isle of Oleron, as occasioned the admiral to declare, with warmth, that he would comply with his orders, and go into the Shannon, if he might be the consequence. It was asked why the army did not land on the night of the twenty-third or twenty-fourth, and whether the officers, sent out to reconnoitre, had returned with such intelligence as formed a good or a desert impracticable? It was asked, whether the commander-in-chief would be his majesty's orders, "To attempt, as far as should be found practicable, a descent on the coast of France, at or near Rochefort, in order to attack, and by a vigorous impression, force that place." For to burn and destroy, to the utmost of his power, all docks, magazines, arsenals, and shipping, as shall be found there!" Such rumours as these, everywhere propagated, rendered an inquiry no less necessary to the reputation of the officers on the expedition, than to the minister who had projected it. Accordingly, a board, consisting of three officers of rank, reputation, and ability, was appointed by his majesty to inquire into the reasons why the fleet returned without having executed his majesty's orders.

§ XI. The three general officers, who met on the twenty-first of the same month, were Charles Duke of Marlborough, lieutenant-general; Major-General, Lord George Sackville and John Walsh. To decide the state and capacity of executing his majesty's orders, it was necessary to inquire into the nature of the intelligence upon which the expedition was projected. The first and most important fact, to which he called attention, was, that a landing from the Shannon to Rochefort, where he was attended by an engineer, he was surprised to find the greatest part of a good rampart, with a revetment, flanked only with redans; no outworks, no covered way, and in many places, the ditch so that the bottom of the wall was seen at a distance. He remembered, that in other places, where the earth had been taken out to form the rampart, there was left round them a considerable height of ground, whence an enemy might draw a fire that could be destructive above the length of a front of two or three hundred yards, there was no rampart, or even entrenchment, but only small ditches, in the low and marshy grounds near the river, which, however, were to be discovered by the tide, when the sun was rising and shining. Towards the river no rampart, no batteries, no parapet, on either side, appeared, and on the land side he observed some high ground within the distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards of the town; in which condition the colonel was told by the engineer the place had remained for above seventy years. To prevent giving umbrage, he drew no plan of the place, and even burnt the few sketches be had him; however, as to utility, the colonel declared himself as much satisfied as if he had taken a plan. He could not ascertain the direct height of the rampart, but thought it could not exceed twenty-five feet, including the parapet. The river might be about one fathom deep, and for above the length of a front of two or three hundred yards, there was no rampart, or even entrenchment defended by two or three small redoubts. As to forces, none are ever garrisoned at Rochefort, except marines, which, at the time the colonel was on the spot, amounted to about one thousand. This was the first intelligence the ministry received of the state of Rochefort, which afforded sufficient room to believe, that an attack by surprise might be attended with happy consequences. It is true that Colonel Thatier, and thirty-five hundred men, appeared in time of peace; but it was likewise probable that no great alterations were made on account of the war, as the place had remained in the same condition during the two or three years since the conclusion of the peace. The general orders were as now to expect their coasts would be insulted. The next information was obtained from Joseph Thiery, a French pilot, of the protestant religion, who passed several examinations before the petty council. This pilot declared that he had followed the business of a pilot on the coast of France for the space of twenty years, and served as first pilot in several of the king's ships; that he had, in particular, piloted the Magannine, before she was taken by the English, for about twenty-two months, and had often conducted her into the road of the isle of Aix; and that he was perfectly acquainted with the entrance, which, indeed, is so easy as to render a pilot almost unnecessary. The road, he said, was formed with a three leagues broad, and the banks necessary to be avoided lay near the land, except one called the Barf, which is easily discerned by the breakers. He affirmed, that the largest vessels might draw up close to the fort of Aix, which would undertake the Magannine alone should destroy; that the largest ships might come up to the Vugerot, two miles distant from the mouth of the river, with all their cannon and stores: that men might be landed to the north of Fort Fouras, out of sight of the fire, upon a meadow, where the ground is firm and level, under cover of the cannon of the fleet. This landing-place he reckoned at about five miles from Rochefort, the way dry, and no water intercepted by ditches and moatages. He said great part of the city was encompassed by a wall, but towards the river, on both sides, the practice was level, and was only palisaded with fosses. To the intelligence of Col. Clarke and Thiery, the minister added a secret account obtained of the strength and distribution of the French forces, then at Rochefort. It was informed the Mordant and Admiral Hawke, to make a vigorous impression on the French coast, and all the other measures projected, which was imagined would make an effectual diversion, by orders from the minister of war, Lord Mordaunt by Sir Edward Hawke by Admiral Broderick, and the captains of men of war sent to sound the French shore from Rochefort to Fort Fouras, dated twenty-six days after theIntelligence. Then they examined the report made to the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth: Sir Edward Hawke's letter to Sir John Mordaunt on the twenty-seventh, and the general's answer on the twenty-ninth; after which Sir John Mordaunt was called upon to give his reasons for not putting his majesty's instructions and orders in execution. This he did in substance as follows: The attempt on Rochefort, he understood, was to have been on the footing of a coup de main, or surprise, which it would be impossible to execute, if the design was discovered or the alarm taken. He also understood that an attempt could not be made, many of his majesty did not require it should, unless with some proper place for debarking, and a safe and easy entrance defended by two or three small redoubts. As to forces, none are ever garrisoned at Rochefort, except marines, which, at the time the colonel was on the spot, amounted to about one thousand. This was the first intelligence the ministry received of the state of Rochefort, which afforded sufficient room to believe, that an attack by surprise might be attended with happy consequences. The enemies of the minister made a handle of the miscarriage to lessen him in the esteem of the public, by laying the whole blame on his forming a project so expensive to the nation, on intelligence not only slight at the first view, but false upon further examination. But the people then were more sedulous in serving something serious in the whole conduct of the commander-in-chief. They plainly perceived that canton took place of vigour, and that the hours for action were spent in deliberations and councils of war. Had he disbarred the troops, and made such an attack as would have distinguished his courage, the voice of the people would have acquainted him, however unsuccessful, though prudence, perhaps, might have restrained him. His captains would have confided in sounding such a resolution, so ill-fitted to the want of Mordaunt's inactivity; the loss of so many brave lives was thought less injurious and disgraceful to the nation, than the too safe return of the present armament. The one demonstrated that the British spirit still existed; the other seemed to indicate the too powerful influence of wealth, luxury, and those manners which tend to debauch and emasculate the mind. A public trial of the commander-in-chief was expected by the people, as the real crimes were thus stationed to him, in concert with the other land officers, to return to England.

§ XII. Having considered all these circumstances, and every possible argument, the officers who served in the expedition, the court of inquiry gave the following report to his majesty:—It appears to us, that one cause of the expedition having failed is, the not attacking Fort Fours by sea, at the same time that it could have been attacked by land, agreeably to his majesty's first sign, which must have been of the greatest utility towards carrying your majesty's instructions into execution. It was at first resolved by Admiral Hawke, (Thierry, the pilot, having undertaken the safe conduct of a ship to Fort Fours for that purpose, but afterwards laid aside upon the representation of Vice-Admiral Knowles, that the Barfleur, the ship designed for that service, was aground, at the distance of between four and five miles from the shore: but as neither Sir Edward Hawke or the pilot could attend to give any information upon that head, we cannot presume to offer any certain opinion thereupon. We conceive another cause of the failure of the expedition to have been that, instead of attempting to land, when the report was received, on the twenty-fourth of September, from Rear-Admiral Bridg-ick, and the captains who had been out to sound and reconnoitre, a council of war was summoned, and held on the twenty-fifth, in which it was unanimously resolved not to land, as the attempt on Rochefort was neither advisable nor practicable: but it does not appear to us that there were then, or at any time afterwards, either a body of vessels at sea, or on shore, which might have prevented an attempting a descent, in pursuance of the instructions signed by your majesty; neither does it appear to us that there were any reasons sufficient to induce the council of war to believe that Rochefort was so changed in respect to its strength, or posture of defence, since the expedition was first resolved on in England, as to prevent all attempts of an attack upon the place, in order to burn and destroy the docks, magazines, arsenals, and shipping, in obedience to your majesty's commands. And we think ourselves obliged to remark, in the council of war on the twenty-eighth of September, that no reason could have existed sufficient to prevent the attempt of landing the troops, as the council then unanimously resolved to land with all possible despatch. We beg leave also to remark, that after its being unanimously resolved to land, in the council of war of the twenty-eighth of September, the resolution was taken of returning to England, without any regular or general meeting of the said council: but as the whole operation was of so inconsiderable a nature, we do not offer this to your majesty as a cause of the failure of the expedition, as it was not long before the council was re-assembled upon the expiration of the sentence which it was laid upon in the council of war of the twenty-fifth.

§ XIII. This report, signed by the general officers, Marlborough, Seckel, and Waldegrave, probably laid the foundation of the whole memoirs which were soon after written on the conduct of the commander-in-chief in the expedition.
French commerce. The Antigulian, a private ship of war, equipped by a society of men who assumed that name, took the Duke de Peithevier Indianam, off the port of Coruna, and carried her into Cadiz. The prize was estimated worth two hundred thousand pounds, and immediately set out on its return to France, with a cargo of Spain for restitution, while the proprietors of the Antigulian were squandering in mirth, festivity, and not, the imaginary wealth so easily and unexpectedly acquired. Such were the results of these almost every commerce were then the measures taken with regard to the illegality of the prize, which the French East India company asserted was taken within shot of a neutral port, that the Penhieve was first violently wrested out of the hands of the captors, then detained as a deposit, with sealed hatches, and a Spanish guard on board, till the claims of both parties could be examined, and at last adjudged to be an illegal capture, and consequently restored to the French, to the great disappointment of the owners of the privateer. Besides the success which attended a great number of other privateers, the lords of the admiralty published a list of above thirty ships of war and privateers taken from the enemy, in the space of four months, and English was run by France twice the stock of the Duke d'Aguitaine Indianam, now fitted out as a ship of war, taken by the Ege and Medway; the Penhieve Indianam, valued at one hundred and sixty thousand pounds, taken by the Dover merchant; and above six prizes of war, by the English privateer Captain Lockhart, for which he was honoured with a variety of presents of plate by several corporations, in testimony of their esteem and regard. This run of good fortune was not, however, without some retribution on the side of the enemy, who, out of two-one ships, homogeneous-bound from Carolina, made prize of nineteen, whence the merchants sustained considerable damage, and a great quantity of valuable commodities, indigo in particular, was lost to this country.

§ XVI. Notwithstanding the large importations of grain from different parts of Europe and America, the artifice of engrossers will soon force the populace at the insinuous combinations entered into to frustrate the endeavours of the legislature, and to oppose the poor, that they rose in a tumultuous manner in several counties, sometimes to the number of five or six thousand, and seized upon the grain brought to market. Nor was it indeed to be wondered at, considering the distress to which many persons were reduced. The difficulty of obtaining the necessaries of life raised the price of labour; and the moneyed men, many of whom were overstocked for want of a proper market, which obliged them to dismiss above half the hands before employed. Hence arose the most pitiable condition of several thousands of useful subjects. The distress extended only with one advantage to the public, namely, the facility with which recruits were raised for his majesty's service. At last, the plentiful crops with which it pleased Providence to bless these kingdoms, the prodigious quantities of corn imported from foreign countries, and the wise measures of the legislature, broke all the villainous schemes set on foot by the forestallers and engrossers, and reduced the price of corn to the usual standard. The public joy on this event was greatly augmented by the safe arrival of the fleet from the Leeward Islands, consisting of ninety-two sail, and of the Straits fleet, esteemed worth three millions sterling, whereby the silk manufacturers of England and the Dutch were enabled for the first time to sell their manufactures at a profit. About the same time the India company was highly elated with the joyful account of the safe arrival and spirited conduct of three of their captains, and amounted to twenty-three fine merchant vessels of war, one of sixty-four, the other of twenty-six guns. After a warm engagement, which continued for three hours, they obliged the French ships to sheer off, with scarce any loss on their own side. When the engagement began, the captains had promised a reward of a thousand pounds to the crews by way of incitement to their valor; and the company doubled the sum, in remuneration of their fidelity and courage. His majesty having taken into consideration the conduct of these officers, and the value and usefulness of the kingdoms, for want of proper harbours and forts on the western coast to receive and protect merchant-men, was graciously pleased to order, that a temporary security should be provided for the shipping which might touch at Milford-Haven, until the fortifications voted in parliament should be erected. How far his majesty's directions were adopted and carried into effect, and by whom the enemy's privateers upon that coast sufficiently indicated.

§ XVII. Whatever reasons the government had to expect the campaign should be vigorously pushed in America, was more than counterbalanced by the considerations which were the obvious reason of our engagements. Not all the endeavours of the Earl of Loudoun to quiet the dissensions among the different provinces, and to establish harmony and concord, could prevail. Circumstances required that he should act the part of a mediator, in order to raise the necessary supplies for prosecuting the war, without which it was impossible he could appear in the character of a general. The enemy, in the meantime, were pushing the blow given at Oswego, and taking advantage of the distraction that appeared in the British councils. By their successes in the preceding campaign, they remained masters of all the lakes. Hence they were furnished with the means of practising on the Indians in all the different districts, and obliging them, by brigandages, promises, and menaces, to act in their favour. Every accession to their strength was a real diminution of that of the British commander; but then the ignorance or pusillanimity of some of the inferior officers in our back settlements, was, perhaps, more hurtful to us than the influence of all the vigilance and activity of Montcalm. In consequence of the shameful loss of Oswego, they voluntarily abandoned to the mercy of the French general the whole country of the Five Nations, the only body of Indians who had invincibly performed their engagements, or indeed who had preserved any sincere regard for the British government. The communication with these faithful allies was now cut off by the utmost discord amongst them, in which we possessed at the great Carrying-place. A strong fort, indeed, was built at Winchester, and called Fort Loudon, after the commander-in-chief; and four hundred Cherokee Indians still joined the British forces at Fort Cumberland; but this reinforcement by no means counterbalanced the losses sustained in consequence of our having imprudently stopped up Wool-creek, and filled it with logs. Every person the least acquainted with the country, readily perceived the weakness of the present defence, by which our whole frontier was left open, and exposed to the invasion of the savages in the French interest, who would not fail to profit by our blunders, too notorious to escape them. Hence the recurrence of the distresses opened to our new settlements on those grounds called the German Flats, and along the Mohawk's river, which the enemy destroyed with fire and sword before the end of the campaign. § XVIII. In the meantime, Lord Loudon was taking the most effectual steps to unite the provinces, and raise a force sufficient to give some decisive blow. The attack on Crown-Forest, which had been so long meditated, was laid aside as of less importance than the intended expedition to Louisburg, now substituted in its place, and undoubtedly a more considerable object in itself. Admiral Holbourn arrived at Halifax, with the squadron and transports under his command, on the 30th of July; and it was his lordship's intention to repair thither with all possible diligence, in order to take upon him the command of the expedition; but a variety of accidents interposed. It was with the utmost difficulty he was enabled to march a path with a body of six thousand men, with which he instantly began his march to joine the troops lately arrived from England. When the junction was effected, the whole force was marched a mile, and bivouacked within twenty miles of the enemy, with great expectations. Immediately some small vessels were sent out to examine and reconnoitre the condition of the enemy, and the intermediate time was employed in embarking the troops, as soon as the transports arrived. The return of the scouts totally altered the face of affairs; they brought the welcome news, that M. de Bois de la Mothe, who sailed in the month of May from Brest, with a large fleet of ships of war and transports, was now safe at anchor in Legible, and had with him the largest body of the French army, for want of proper harbours and forts on the yet still it wanted confirmation, and many persons believed their account of the enemy's strength greatly magnified. Such advice, however, could not but occasion extraordinary fluctuations in the councils of war at Halifax. Some would be for sitting still through the expedition of that season; while others, more warm in their dispositions, and sanguine in their expectations, were for prosecuting it with vigour, in spite of all dangers and difficulties. This latter opinion was greatly vehement when a packet, bound from Louisbourg in France, was taken by one of the English ships stationed at Newfoundland. She had letters on board which put the enemy's superiority beyond all doubt, at least by sea. It clearly appeared there were at that time in Louisbourg six thousand regular troops, three thousand natives, and one thousand three hundred Indians, with seventeen ships of the line, and three frigates moored in the harbour; that the place was well supplied with ammunition, provision, and every kind of military stores; and that the enemy wished for nothing more than an attack, which it was probable would terminate to the disgrace of the assailants, and ruin of the British affairs in America. The commanders at Halifax were fully apprized of the consequences of an unsuccessful attempt; it was, therefore, almost unanimously resolved to postpone the expedition to some more convenient season, especially as the season was now so far advanced, which alone would be sufficient to frustrate their endeavours, and render the enterprise abortive. The resolution seems, indeed, to have been the most eligible in their circumstances, whatever constructions might after-wards be put with intention to prejudice the public against the commander-in-chief.

§ XIX. Lord Loudoun's departure from New York, with all the forces he was able to collect, afforded the Marquis de Montcalm the fairest occasion of the successes of the former campaign. That general had, in the very commencement of the season, made three different attacks on Fort William Henry, in all of which he was repulsed, and a reparation of the garrison. But his disappointment here was balanced by an advantage gained by a party of regulars and Indians at Ticonderoga. Colonel John Parker, with a detachment of near four hundred men, went by water, in whale and bay boats, to attack the enemy's advanced guard at that place. Landing at night on an islet, he sent down three boats to the main land, which the enemy waylaid and took. Having procured the necessary intelligence from the prisoners of the colonel's designs, they contrived that, by measures, placed three hundred men in ambush behind the point where he proposed landing, and sent three batteaux to the place of rendezvous. Colonel Parker mixed with this number, and, effecting the surprise, was surrounded by the enemy, reinforced with four hundred men, and attacked with such impiety, that, in the whole detachment, only two officers and seventy private men were unhurt. This was followed by an attack on the British commander-in-chief, when at Halifax, and fired with a desire to revenge the disgrace he had lately sustained before Fort Henry, Montcalm drew together all his forces, with intention to lay siege to that place. Fort William Henry stands on the southern coast of Lake George; it was built with a view to protect and cover the frontiers of the English colonies, as well as to command the lake: the fortifications were good, defended by a garrison of a hundred and seventy men, and covered by an array of four thousand, under the conduct of General Webb, posted at no great distance. When the Marquis de Montcalm had assembled all his forces at Crown Point, Trumann and his army were at Ticonderoga, he joined them in a considerable body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to near ten thousand men, he marched directly to the fort, made his approaches, and began to batter it with a numerous train of artillery. On the very day he invested the place, he sent a letter to Colonel Monro, the governor, telling him, he thought himself obliged, in humanity, to desire he would surrender the fort, and not provoke the great number of savages in the French army by a vain resistance, which it was useless for him to make. After a short interval he says he, "experienced their cruelty; I have it yet in my power to restrain them, and oblige them to observe a capitulation, as none of them hitherto are killed. Your persisting in the defence of your fort can only retard its fate a few days, and must of necessity expose an unfortunate garrison, who can possibly receive no relief, considering the large body of men in our possession;" with this decisive answer, for which purpose I have sent the Sieur Fontbrune, one of my aides-du-camp. You may credit what he will inform you of, from Montcalm. General Webb believed he had received all the intelligence and security bordering on information. It is creditably reported, that he had private intelligence of all the French general's designs and motions; yet either desiring his strength, or discrediting the information, he neglected collecting the militia and fortifying Louisbourg; six thousand regulars would probably have obliged Montcalm to relinquish the attempt, or, at least, have rendered his success very doubtful and hazardous. The enemy meeting with no disturbance from the quarter they most dreaded, prosecuted the siege with vigour, and were warmly received by the garrison, who fired with great spirit till they had burst almost all their cannon, and expended their ammunition. Neither Montcalm's promises or threats could prevail upon them to surrender while they were in a condition to defend themselves, or could reasonably expect assistance from General Webb. They even persisted to hold out after prudence dictated they ought to surrender. Colonel Monro was sent to beg their terms on the condition that General Webb, though slow in his motions, would surely make some vigorous efforts either to raise the siege, or force a supply of ammunition, provision, and other necessaries. The garrison offered him, after sustaining a siege from the third to the ninth day of August, to hang a flag of truce, which was immediately answered by the French commander. Hostages were exchanged, the articles of capitulation signed by both parties. It was stipulated, that the garrison of Fort William Henry, and the troops in the entrenched camp, should march out with their arms, the baggage of the officers, the whole of their artillery, and the staff of the force, escorted by a detachment of French troops, and interpreters attached to the savages: that the gate of the fort should be delivered to the troops of the most Christian king, immediately after signing the capitulation; and the entrenched camp, on the departure of the British forces; that the artillery, warlike stores, provision, and in general every thing, except the effects of soldiers and officers, should, upon honour, be delivered to the French troops; and for which purpose it was agreed that a hostages, with the capitulation, an exact inventory of the stores, and other particulars specified; that the garrison of the fort, and the troops in the entrenched and dependencies, should make their return to the place from which they came, on the date of the capitulation, against his most christian majesty, or his allies: that with the capitulation there should be delivered an exact state of the troops, specifying the names of the officers, engineers, artillery-men, commissaries, and all employed; that the officers and soldiers, Canadians, women and savages, made prisoners by land since the commencement of the war in North America, should be delivered in the space of three months at Carillon; in return for whom an equal number of the garrison of Fort William Henry should be incapacitated to serve agreeably to the return given by the English officer, and the receipt of the French commanding officers, of the prisoners so delivered; that an officer it was agreed remained as a hostage, till the safe return of the escort sent with the troops of his Britannic majesty: that the sick and wounded, not in a condition to be transported to Fort Edward, should re- turn to their homes; that officers employed in the service, who engaged to use them with tenderness and humanity, and to return them as soon as recovered: that provision for two days should be issued out for the British troops; that in testimony of his esteem and respect for Colonel Demer and his officers, who, in the performance of their gallant defence, the Marquis de Montcalm should return one cannon, a six-pounder.—Whether the Marquis de Montcalm was really assiduous to have these articles punctually executed we cannot ascertain; but return to put pressure on them, as they were peremptorily broke, in almost every instance. The savages in the French interest either paid no regard to the capitulation, or were permitted, from views of policy, to act the most treacherous, inhuman, and insidious part. They fell upon the British troops as they marched out, despoiled them of their few remaining effects, dragged the Indians in the English service out of their ranks, and assassinated those officers who had incurable delight in humanity. Some British soldiers, with their wives and children, are said to have been savagely murdered by those brutal Indians, whose ferocity the French commander could not effectually restrain. The greater part of the English garrison, however, arrived at Fort Edward, under the protection of the French escort. The enemy demolished the fort, carried off the effects, provisions, artillery, and every thing else left by the latter, and even destroyed the church on the lake, and departed, without pursuing their success by any other attempt. Thus ended the third campaign in America, where, with an evident superiority over the enemy, an army of twenty thousand regular troops, a great number of provincial forces, and a prodigious naval power, not less than twenty ships of the line, we abandoned our allies, exposed our people, suffered them to be cruelly massacred in sight of our troops, and relinquished a large and valuable tract of country, to the eternal reproach and disgrace of the British name.

§ XX. As to the naval transactions in this country, though less infamous, they were not less unfortunate. Immediately after Lord Loudon's departure from Halifax, Admiral Howe, now freed from the care of the transports, set sail for Louisbourg, with fifteen ships of the line, one ship of fifty guns, three small frigates, and a fire-ship. With these, consisting of twenty-six ships of the line, and other ships, which might be conjectured. Some imagine curiosity was the admiral's sole motive, and the desire of informing himself with certainty of the enemy's strength, while others persuade themselves that he was in hopes of drawing M. de la Motte to an engagement, notwithstanding the superior number of ships and weight of metal. Be this as it may, the British squadron appeared off Louisbourg on the twenty-first day of August, and approaching within two miles of the batteries, saw the French admiral make the signal to unmoor. Mr. Holbourn was greatly inferior in strength, and it is obvious, that his design was not to fight the enemy, as he immediately made the best of his way to Halifax. About the middle of September, being reinforced with four ships of the line, he again proceeded to Louisbourg, probably with intention, if possible, to draw the enemy to an engagement; but he found De la Motte too prudent to hazard an unnecessary battle, the loss of which would have greatly exposed all the French colonies. Here the English squadron continued cruising until the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken by a terrible storm from the southeast. When the hurricane began, the fleet were about forty leagues distant from Louisbourg, and in twelve hours driven in two miles of the rocks and breakers on that coast, when the wind providentially shifted. The ship Tilbury was wrecked upon the rocks, and half the crew drowned. Eleven ships were disabled, others threw their guns overboard, and all returned in a very shattered condition to England, at a very unfavourable season of the year. In this manner ended the expedition to Louisbourg, more unfortunate to the nation than the preceding designs upon Rochefort; less disgraceful to the commanders, but equally the occasion of ridicule and triumph to our enemies. Indeed, the unhappy consequence of these disasters was, the loss of which would have greatly exposed all the French colonies. § XXII. In the East Indies the scene was changed greatly to the honour and advantage of Great Britain. There the commanders acted with that harmony, spirit, and unanimity best apt to command the admiration of their king and the interest of their country. We left Admiral Watson and Colonel Clive advancing to Calcutta, to revenge the cruel tragedy acted upon their countrymen the preceding year. On the twenty-eighth of December, the fleet proceeded up the river; next day Colonel Clive landed, and, with the assistance of the squadron, in twenty-four hours made himself master of Basutungar, a place of great strength, though very ill defended. On the first of January the admiral, with two ships, appeared before the town of Calcutta, and was received by a brisk fire from the batteries. This resistance, however, was soon abandoned, as warmly that the enemy's guns were soon silenced, and in less than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. Colonel Clive, on the other side, had invested the town, and made his attack on the batteries vigorously and intercepting all supplies which greatly contributed to the sudden reduction of the settlement. As soon as the fort was surrendered, the brave and active Captain Coote, with his majesty's troops, took possession, and found nineteen pieces of cannon, four mortars, abundance of ammunition, stores, and provisims, with every requisite for sustaining an obstinate siege. Thus the English were re-established in the two strongest fortresses in the Ganges, with the irreconcilable loss of nine seamen killed, and three soldiers. A few days after, Hugli, a city of great trade, situated higher up the river, was reduced with as little difficulty, but infinitely greater prejudice to the nabob, as here the storehouses of salt, and vast quantities of the superior of his army, were burnt and destroyed. Incensed at the almost instantaneous loss of all his conquests, and demolition of the city of Hugli, the Viceroy of Bengal discouraged all advantages to an accommodation, which was proposed by the admiral and chiefs of the company, and assembled an army of twenty thousand horse and fifteen thousand foot, fully resolved to expel the English out of his dominions, and take ample vengeance for the disgraces he had lately sustained. He was joined by the Mogul, who, having laid his way to Calcutta on the second of February, where he encamped, about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a reinforcement, and six hundred native and three hundred European of Captain Watts, were accordingly drafted from the different ships, and sent to assist his little army. Clive drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and began the attack so vigorously, that the wavy retreated, after a feeble resistance, with the loss of a thousand men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, five hundred horses, great number of draft bullocks, and four elephants. Though this advantage had been than could be wished, yet it sufficiently intimidated the nabob into making concessions much to the honour and advantage of the company. Admiral Watson gave him to understand in a letter, that this was no more than a specimen of what the British arms, when properly conducted, could perform. The subject of the negociation might be renewed, and in a few days the treaty was concluded. He promised not to disturb the English in any of those privileges or possessions specified in the firman, granted by the Mogul: that all merchandise belonging to the company should pass and repass, in every part of the province of Bengal, free of duty: that all the English factories seized the preceding year, or since, should be restored, with the money goods, and effects appertaining to them, that all damages sustained by the English should be repaired, and their losses repaid: that the English should have liberty to fortify Calcutta in whatever manner they thought proper without interruption: that they should have the right to pass on the roads and in the river, and all other articles imported, which should pass current in the province: that he would remain in strict friendship and alliance with the English, use his utmost endeavours to heel up the late divisions, and restore the former good understanding between them. All which several articles were solemnly signed and sealed with the nabob's own hand.

§ XXII. Such were the terms obtained for the company by gallant and resolute conduct of their commanders. They had, however, too much discernment to rely on the promises of a barbarian, who had so perfidiously broke former engagements; but they prudently distrusted in their sentiments, until they had thoroughly reestablished the name of British power, and reduced the French power in this province. In order to adjust the points that required discussion, the select committee for the company's affairs appointed Mr. Watts, who had been released from his former imprisonment, as their commissary at the court of the nabob, to whom he was personally known, as well as to his ministers, among whom he had acquired a great deal of influence. Notwithstanding he had balanced the interest which the French, by their art of intriguing, had raised among the favoured of the viceroy. While Mr. Watts was employed at Murshidabad, in compounds his negotiations, and very soon subsequent to his engagements, the admiral and Mr. Clive resolved to avail themselves of their armament in attacking the French settlements in Bengal. The chief object of their design was to carry on the war against France, which could not be carried higher up the river than Calcutta, of considerable strength, and the chief in importance of any possessed by that nation in the bay. Colonel Clive, being reinforced by three hundred men from Bombay, began his march to Chandernagore, at the head of seven hundred Europeans and one thousand six hundred Indians, where, on his first arrival, he took possession of all the out-posts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be protected by the admiral. On the nineteenth of March the admirals, Watson and Pococke, arrived within two miles of the French settlement, with the Kent, Tiger, and Salis- bury men of war, and found their passage obstructed by three strong batteries, in the form of two forts, disposed in the channel. These difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the twenty-fourth and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three days; whereupon some men of war, and the forts approached on the land side, and playing vigorously from the batteries he had raised. Their united efforts soon obliged the enemy to submission. A flag of truce was waved over the walls, and the place surrendered by capitulation. The keys of the fortress were immediately delivered to the English in the afternoon Colonel Clive, with the king's troops, took possession. Thus the reduction of a strong fortress, garnished by five hundred Europeans, and one thousand two hundred native men, was accomplished by three pieces of cannon, and three mortars, well provided with all sorts of stores and necessaries, and of very great importance to the enemy's commerce in India, was accomplished with a loss not exceeding forty men on the side of the conquerors. By the treaty of capitulation, the director, counsellors, and inferior servants of the settlement, were allowed to depart with their wearing apparel; the Jesuits were permitted to carry away the church ornaments, and the nobles to remain in the full exercises of their liberties: but the garrison were to continue prisoners of war. The goods and money found in the place were considerable; but the principal advantage arose from the ruin of the host of the settlement, which was a blow felt, but not to interfere with the English commerce in these parts.

§ XXIV. Success had hitherto attended all the operations of the British commanders, because they were conducted with foresight and unanimity; and executed with that vigour and spirit which deservedly raised them in the high esteem of their country. They reduced the nabob to reasonable terms of accommodation before they alarmed the French; and now the power of the latter was destroyed, they entered upon measures to oblige the treacherous viceroy to a strict performance of the treaty he had so lately signed. However specious his promises were, they found him extremely dilatory in the execution of several parts of the article, and had no more time to put the English commerce as if none had been concluded. The company's goods were loaded with high duties, and several other infracions of the peace committed, upon such frivolous pretexts, as evidently demonstrated that he sought to come to an open rupture as soon as his projects were ripe for execution. In a word, he discovered all along a manifest partiality to the French, whose emissaries employed him with all the arts of intrigue, and not a few of their European troops, under M. de Bussy, as would enable him to crush the power of the English, whom they had taught him to fear and to hate. As recompense for such hostile aggressions so powerful a prince, under the appearance of peace, and reduced the French power in this province. In order to adjust the points that required discussion, the select committee for which depended the fate of the whole trade of Bengal.

Mr. Watts, from time to time, sent them intelligence of every transaction in the nabot's cabinet; and although that prince publicly declared he would cause him to be impaled as a traitor, and that he were grateful for the attention of the nabob towards him, within the kingdom of Bengal, he bravely sacrificed his own safety to the interest of the company, and exhorted them to proceed with vigour in the military operations. During these deliberations, a most fortunate incident occurred. The governor of a great fortress, supposed to have fallen open by the hand of the enemy, was seen to be advancing with his perjury, saw his preparations for war, and were sensible that the peace of the country could never be restored, unless either the English were expelled, or the nabob deposed. In consequence, a plan was conceived for divesting him of all his power; and the conspiracy was conducted by Jaffer Ali Khan, his prime minister and chief commandor, a nobleman of great influence and authority in the province. The project was communicated to Mr. Watts. He was so improved by the address of that gentleman, as in a manner to assure success. A treaty was actually concluded between thus Meer Jaffer Ali Khan and the English company; and a plan concerted by Ali Khan, which was to take by force, to the advantage of the viceroy, the defection from the viceroy. These previous measures being taken, Colonel Clive was ordered to take the field with his little army. Admiral Watson undertook the defence, with the cast and assistance of his officers, attached to reinforce the colonel, together with fifty seamen to be employed as gunners, and in directing the artillery. Then Mr. Watts, deceiving the nabob's spies, by whom he was surrounded, withdrew himself from Muradabad, and reached the English camp in safety. On the nineteenth of June, a detachment was sent to attack Cutwa fort and town, situated on that braoch of the river forming the island of Cassimbazar. This place surrendered at the first summons; and here the colonel halted with the army for three days, expecting advice from Ali Khan. Disappointed of the hoped-for intelligence, he crossed the river, and marched to Plaisance, where he encamped. On the twenty-third, at day-break, the nabob advanced to attack him, at the head of fifteen thousand horse, and near thirty thousand infantry, with about forty pieces of heavy cannon, conducted and managed by French gunners, on whose courage and discipline he placed great dependences. They began to cannonade the English camp about six in the morning: but a severe shower falling at noon they withdrew their artillery. Colonel Clive seized this opportunity to take possession of a tank and two other posts of consequence, which were held by the nabob's army. Then he stormed an angle of their camp, covered with a double breastwork, together with an eminence which they occupied. At the beginning of this attack, some of their chief being slain, the men were so dispirited, that they soon gave way; but still Meer Jaffer Ali Khan, who commanded the left wing, forborne declaring himself openly. After a short contest the enemy were put to flight, the nabob's camp, baggage, and fifty pieces of cannon were taken, and a most complete victory obtained. The colonel, pursuing his advantage, marched to Muradabad, the capital of the province, and was there joined by Ali Khan and the nabob's subjects, and the greater dependences. He then ordered the company such extraordinary privileges, as publicly demonstrated how justly he merited their assistance. By this alliance, and the reduction of Chandernagore, the French forces in the province were entirely cut off, and its dependencies; the trade of the English company was restored, and increased beyond their most sanguine hopes; a new ally was acquired, whose interest obliged him to remain firm to his engagements: a vast sum was paid to the company and the sufferers at Calcutta, to indemnify them for their losses; the soldiers and seamen were扩充ed, the public credit augmented, the company was rewarded for the courage and intrepidity they exerted; and a variety of other advantages gained, which it would be unnecessary to enumerate. In a word, in the space of fourteen days a great revolution was effected, and the government of a vast country was placed in the hands of the nabob, and only a few months sufficed to effect a complete and lasting revolution. And the triumph joy at these signal successes was considerably diminished by the death of Admiral Watson, and the loss of Vizagapatam, an English settlement on the Coromandel coast. The admirals fell a victim to the unwholesomeness of the climate, on the sixteenth of August, universally esteemed and regretted; and the factory and fort at Vizagapatam were surrendered to the French, a few days after Colonel Clive had defeated the nabob.

§ XXV. We now turn our eyes to the continent of Europe, where we see the beginning of the year marked with a striking instance of the dreadful effects of frantic enthusiasm. France had long enjoyed a monarch, easy, complicit, and vigilant, who, after the allowed, good the appearance of business or war. Contended with the pleasures of indolence, he sought no greatness beyond what he enjoyed, nor pursued any ambitious aim through the spirit of the French. Of all the French noblemen such a prince had the greatest reason to expect an exemption from plots against his person, and cabals among his subjects; yet was an attempt made upon his life by a man, who, though placed in a situation where fortune, had resolution to face the greatest dangers, and was fastidious enough to sustain, without shrinking, all the tortures which the cruelty of man could invent, or his enemies render necessary. The name of this fanatic was Robert Francis Damien, born in the suburb of St. Catherine, in the city of Aras. He had lived in the service of several families, whence he was generally dismissed on account of the impiety, the melancholy, and sullenness of his disposition. So humble was the station of a person, who was resolved to step forth from obscurity, and, by one desperate effort, draw upon himself the attention of all Europe. On the fifth day of January, as the king was stepping into his coach, to return a Toast, he looked out of the window, to see what day came to Versailles, Damien, mingling among his attendants, stabbed him with a knife on the right side, between the fourth and fifth ribs. His majesty, applying his hand immediately to his side, cried out, "I am wounded! I am wounded!" Seized him in his arm, and called for medical aid. He had only one wound not dangerous; as the knife, taking an oblique direction, missed the vital parts. As for the assassin, he made no attempts to escape; but suffering himself quietly to be seized, was conveyed to the guard-room, where, being interrogated if he committed the horrid action, he boldy answered in the affirmative. A process against him was instantly commenced at Versailles: many persons, supposed accessories to the design upon the king's life, were sent to the Bastille; the assassin himself was put to the torture, and the most excruciating tortures were applied, with intention to extort a confession of the plan and execution of his horrid design. In the meantime, the prince of Orange was put to death upon his sovereign. Incisions were made into the muscular parts of his legs, arms, and thighs, into which boiling oil was poured. Every refinement on cruelty, that human invention could suggest, was practised without effect; nothing could overcome his obstinacy; and his silence was construed into a presumption, that he must have had accomplices in the plot. To render his punishment more public and conspicuous, he was removed to a reserved or out of the way. This was done with great care, and the tortures, with such additional circumstances, as the most fertile and cruel dispositios could devise for increasing his misery and torment. Being conducted to the Convent of St. Paule, an iron collar, which was prepared for him, and to this he was fastened with chains. The torture was again applied, and a physician ordered to attend to see what degree of pain he could support. Nothing, however, material was extorted; for what he one moment confessed, he recanted the next. It is not without reason (and we consider that reason as a fertile root) to relate all the circumstances of this cruel and tragic event.

Sufficient it is, that, after suffering the most exquisite tortures that human nature could invent, or man support, his judges thought proper to terminate his misery by a death warrant and the usual forms of humanity. On the twenty-eighth day of March he was conducted, amidst a vast concourse of the populace, to the Géron, the common place of execution, stripped naked, and fastened to the scaffold by the feet; and, while the horses drew afresh: a thigh and an arm were separated, and after several pulls, the unfortunate wretch expired under the extreme of pain. His body and limbs were reduced to ashes by the fire; his father, daughter, and family, banished the kingdom for ever; the name of Dammen effaced and obliterated, and the innocent involved in the punishment of the guilty. Thus ended the procedure against Dammen and his family, in a manner not very favourable to the avowed clemency of Louis, or the acknowledged humanity of the French nation. It appeared from undisputed evidence, that the attempt on the king's life was the result of insanity, and a disturbed imagination. Several persons, a distress observed in his conduct, and the detestation justly due to the enormity of his crime ought now to have been absorbed in the consideration of his misfortune, the greatest that can befall human nature.

§ XXVI. Another remarkable event in France, in the beginning of this year, was the change in the ministry of that nation, by the removal of M. de Machault, keeper of the seals from the post of secretary of state for the marriage; and of M. Argenson from that of secretary at war. Their dismissal was sudden and unexpected; nor was any particular reason assigned for this very unexpected alteration. The only thing that the French newspapers mentioned was, the Queen had ceded the house of Bourbon, raised two great armies; the first of which, composed of nearly eighty thousand men, the flower of the French troops, with a large train of artillery, was commanded by M. d'Étérie, a general of great reputation; under whom served M. de Contades, M. Chevert, and the Count de St. Germain, all officers of high character. This formidable army passed the Rhine early in the spring and marched by Westphalia, in order to invade the King of Prussia's dominions, in quality of allies to the emperor, and guardians of the liberties of the empire. But their real view was to invade Hanover, a scheme which they knew would make a powerful diversion of the British forces from the prosecution of the war in other parts of the world, where the strength of France could not be fully exerted, and where their most valuable interests were at stake. They believed, moreover, that the same blow, by which they hoped to crush the King of Prussia, might likewise force his Britannic majesty into some concessions with regard to America. The other army of the French, commanded by the Prince de Soubise, was destined to storm the French army of twenty-five thousand men, besides six thousand Bavarians, and four thousand Wurtembergers. But before these troops, under Soubise, passed the Rhine, they made themselves masters of several places bordering it to the King of Prussia upon the borders of the Low Countries; a detachment from d'Étérie's army seized upon the town of Embden, and whatever else belonged to the same monarch in East Frisland.

§ XXVII. At the close of the last campaign, the King of Prussia having gained a petty advantage over the imperialists under the command of Mareschal Brown, and incorporated into his own troops a great part of the Saxony army that had been defeated by the elector of Saxony, was obliged to retreat into winter-quarters until the season should permit him to improve these advantages. His Majesty and Mareschal Keith wintered in Saxony, having their cantonments between Pirm and the frontier along the Elbe; and Mareschal Soubise with 45,000 men was quartered in the country of Glatz. In the mean time, the empress-queen, finding the force which she had sent out against the King of Prussia, was not sufficient to prevent his designs, made the necessary requisition to her allies, for the auxiliaries they had engaged to furnish. In consequence of these requisitions, the czarina, true to her engagements, dispatched above a hundred thousand of her troops, who began their march in the month of November, and proceeded to the borders of Lithuania, with design particularly to invade Ducal Prussia, whilst a strong fleet was equipped in the Baltic, to aid the operations of this numerous army. The Austrian army, assembled in Bohemia, amounted to a score of thousands; they were commanded by Prince Charles of Lorraine and Mareschal Brown. The Swedes had not yet openly declared themselves; but it was well known, that though their king was abolished in his kingdom, and they were reduced to the jealousy which the senate of Sweden entertained of their sovereign, and the hope of recovering their ancient possessions in Pomerania, by means of the present troubles, together with their old attachment to France, newly cemented by intrigues and subsidies, would certainly induce them to join the general confederacy. The Duke of Mecklenbourg took the same party, and agreed to join the Swedish army, when it should be assembled, with six thousand men. Besides all these preparations against the King of Prussia, he was, in his quality of elector to Brandenburg, put under the ban of the empire by the aule council: declared deprived of all his rights, privileges, and prerogatives; his fleets were extinguished into the exchequer of the empire; and all the circles accordingly ordered to furnish their respective contingencies for putting this sentence in execution.

§ XXVIII. In this dangerous situation, thus menaced on all sides, and seemingly on the very brink of inevitable destruction, the Prussian monarch owed his preservation to his own courage and activity. The Russians, knowing that the King of Prussia, and the Elector of Saxony, for reasons both of interest and the safety of their dominions, would not be able to subdus their prodigious numbers, had taken care to furnish themselves with provisions for their march, depending upon the resources they expected to find in Lithuania after their arrival in that country. These provisions were exhausted by the time they reached the borders of that province, where they found themselves suddenly and unexpectedly destitute of subsistence, either to return back or to proceed forward. The King of Prussia had, with great prudence and foresight, secured plenty to himself, and distress and famine to his enemies, by buying up all the corn and forage of the country which these last were entering. Notwithstanding these precautions, the Prussian monarch, to guard as much as could be against every possible event, sent a great number of gunners and matrosers from Pomerania to Memel, with three regiments of his troops, to reinforce the garrison of that place. He likewise sought the bodies which his troops possessed in Silesia, and gave the necessary orders for their security. He repaired to Niess, where he settled with Mareschal Schwarim the general plan of the operations of the approaching campaign. There it was agreed, that the King of Prussia, with a main body of his army, consisting of thirty thousand men, should have in constant view the motions of the royal army, by which its own were to be regulated, that they might both act in concert, as circumstances should direct. And accordingly the soldiers assembled by the King of Prussia in Lusatia and Voigtland, the irruption into Germany might hasten the resolutions of the British ministry.
land; twenty thousand men were collected at Zwickow, on the frontiers of Bohemia, towards Erza, under the command of Prince Maurice of Anhalt-Dessau; and six thousand more, led by them on their march towards Great Zeiditz, where their head-quarters were to be, and requisitions were to be made. In the meanwhile, the Austrian troops began to form on the frontiers of Saxony, where some of their detachments appeared, to watch the motions of the Prussians, who still continued their preparations for war. They, too, kept up a resolute, not a passive, resolution. All possible care was taken by the Prussians at Dresden to secure a retreat, in case of a defeat. As only one regiment of Prussians could be spared to remain at Dresden to defend it, and as no force was surrendering it at all, the notice was sent to the army, that they were immediately ordered the two privies to depart. The conduct of the Dutch was rather cautious than spirited. Whilst his Prussian majesty was employed on the side of Bohemia and Saxony, the French auxiliaries began their march to harass his defenceless territories in the neighbourhood of the Low Countries. A free passage was demanded of the States-general through Namur and Maastricht, for the provisions, ammunition, and artillery belonging to this new army; and the English ambassador remonstrated against their compliance, and represented it as a breach of the neutrality their high mightinesses declared they would observe, yet, after some hesitation, the demand was granted, in order to prevent the passage of the French troops, should it be attempted by force, pleased in excuse of their conduct.

§ XXXI. Scarce had the English army, commanded by the Prince de Souhise, set foot in the territories of the Electors of Saxony and Cleves, when they were informed of the session of the duchy of Cleves and the country of Mares, where all things were left open to them, the Prussians, who evacuated their posts, taking their route along the river Lippe, in order to join some regiments from Magdeburg, who were sent to facilitate their retreat. The disturbed inhabitants, thus exposed to the calamities of war from an unprovoked enemy, were instantly ordered to furnish contributions, forage, and every kind of provisions; and, worst of all, their arms were taken from them. The distressed and ruined, thus exposed to the calamities of war from an unprovoked enemy, were instantly ordered to furnish contributions, forage, and every kind of provisions; and, worst of all, their arms were taken from them. The distressing inhumanities declared they would observe, yet, after some hesitation, the demand was granted, in order to prevent the passage of the French troops, should it be attempted by force, pleased in excuse of their conduct.

§ XXXII. During the recess of the armies, the rigours of winter forced them to suspend their hostile operations, and the greatest preparations were making to open the campaign with all possible vigour. The Prince de Camoiz, the great chancellor of Russia, wrote a circular letter to the privates, senators, and ministers of the republic of Poland, setting forth, "That the Empress of Russia was not only the first to take up arms against the French, which she thought could not but excite the compassion of all other powers, but more especially of his allies: that the fatal consequences which might result from the rash step taken by the King of Prussia, not only with respect to the tranquillity of his own dominions, but of each power in particular, and more especially of the neighbouring coun-

trees, were so evident, that the interest and safety of the several princes rendered it absolutely necessary they should make it a common cause; not only to obtain proper satisfaction for the injuries they had sustained, but also to repel, as it had been unjustly attacked, but likewise to prescribe such bounds to the King of Prussia, as might secure them from any future apprehensions from so enterprising and restless a neighbour. With this view, the empress was determined to assist the King of Poland with a considerable body of troops, which were actually upon their march, under the command of General Aprixin; and that, as there would be an absolute necessity for their marching together against the territories of Poland, her imperial majesty hoped the republic would not fail to facilitate their march as much as possible. She further recommended to the republic, to take some salutary measures for frustrating the designs of the King of Prussia, and for restoring harmony among themselves as the most conductive measure to these good purposes. In this, however, the Poles were so far from following her advice, that, though sure of being secure in the contest, each side sooner prevailed, they divided into parties with less zeal than if they had as much to hope from the prevalence of one side, as to fear from that of the other. Some of the Poles were for denying a passage to the Russians, and others against, and the latter were assisted by the Duchy of Warsaw, which was so great, that scarce a night passed without bloodshed; many dead bodies, chiefly Saxons, being found in the streets every morning.

In the mean time, Great Britain, unsettled in her ministry and councils at home, unsuccessful in her attempts abroad, judging peace, if it could be obtained on just and honourable terms, more eligible than a continental war, proposed several several peace propositions for restoring the tranquillity of Germany; but her answer was, "That, whenever she perceived that the expedients proposed would indemnify her for the extraordinary expenses she had incurred in her own defence, repair the heavy losses sustained by her ally the King of Poland, and afford a proper security for their future safety, she would be ready to give the same proofs she had always given of her desire to restore peace; but it could not be expected she would listen to expeditons, of which neither the King of Prussia was to reap the whole advantage, after having begun the war, and wasted the dominions of a prince, who relied for his security upon the faith of treaties, and the appearance of them as the guarantee of the imperial majesty. From the receipt of this answer, the court of London made several propositions to the empress, to interpose as mediatrix between the courts of Vienna and Berlin; but they were rejected with marks of displeasure and resentment. When Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, the British ambassador, continued to urge his solicitations very strongly, and even with some hints of menace, an answer was delivered to him by order of the empress, purporting, "That her imperial majesty was astonished at his demand, after he had already been made acquainted with the measures she had taken to effect a reconciliation between the courts of Vienna and Berlin. He might easily conceive, as matters were then situated, that the earnestness with which he had urged the same propositions, was somewhat surprized, seeing as it showed but little regard to her former declaration. The empress, therefore, commanded his excellency to be told, that as her intentions contained in her first answer remained at issue, and the further propositions for a mediation would be listened to; and that as for the menace made use of by his excellency, and particularly that the King of Prussia himself would soon attack the Russian army, such threats served only to weaken the ambassador's proposals; to confirm still more, were it possible, the empress in her resolutions; to justify them to the whole world, and to render the King of Prussia more blamable."

§ XXXIV. The season now drawing on in which the troops of the contending powers would be able to take the field, and the alarming progress of the Russians being happily arrested, all the emperors in Europe, except Russia, have always been kept to keep the seat of war as far as possible from his own dominions, resolved to carry it into Bohemia, and there to attack the Austrians on all sides. To this end, the King of Prussia took possession of the frontier, and entered Silesia, to enter Bohemia to four different and opposite places, nearly at the same time. The first of these he commanded in person, assisted by Mareschal Keith; the second was led by Prince Maurice of Anhalt-Dessau, the third by the Duke of Brabant and the fourth by Mareschal Schwerin. To consequence of this plan, Mareschal Schwerin's army entered Bohemia on the eighteenth of April, in five columns at as many different places. The design was so well concerted, that the Austrians had not the least suspicion of their approach till they were past the frontiers, and then they filled the dangerous defile of Guldor-Oese with pandours, to dispute that passage; but they were not so successful, and the battalions of Russian grenadiers attacked them with their bayonets fixed, and routed them. The Prince of Anhalt passed the frontiers, from Misnia, and penetrated into Bohemia on the twenty-first of April without any resistance, and in the course of a few days, fixed himself at the head of the army, which was in Lusatia, from the quarters of cantonment in Zittau, possessed himself immediately of the first post of the route, and the Prince of Reuss entered Lichtenstein, without the loss of a single man; drove away the enemy the same day from Kranitz, and proceeded to Mährendorf, near Reichenberg. The same morning Patkammer's hussars, who formed part of a corps, commanded by a colonel and major, routed some companies of the enemy's cavalry, posted before Cöchlin, under the conduct of Prince Lichtenstein, took three officers and upwards of sixty horse prisoners, and so dispersed the rest, that they were scarcely able to rally near Kranitz. Night coming on, obliged the troops to remain in the open air till the next morning, when, at break of day, the Prussians marched in two columns by Habendorf, towards the enemy's army, amounting to twenty-eight thousand men, commanded by Count Konigseg, and posted near Reichenberg. As soon as the troops were formed, they advanced towards the enemy's cavalry, drawn up in three lines of about thirty squadrons. The two wings were sustained by the infantry, which was posted behind the trenches. The Prussians immediately cannonaded the enemy's cavalry, who received it with resolution, having on their right hand a village, and on their left a wood, where they retired under the shade, and the enemy's horse-grenadiers of Kuhliden and of Moellendorf, and by the regiment of the Prince of Prussia, his dragoons, who by clearing the road, and possessing the intrenchment, had their flanks covered, entirely routed the enemy's cavalry. In the mean time Colonel Patkammer and Major Schenfeld, with his hussars, though flankd by the enemy's artillery, gave the Austrians horse-grenadiers a very warm reception, whilst General Lestwitz, with the left wing of the Prussians, attacked the redoubt that covered Reichenberg. Though there were many defiles and rising grounds to pass, all either impeded the majesty of the Russian columns, or forced them to be taken by a circuit through the Darmstadt forested the redoubt, and put to flight and pursued the enemy, after some discharge of their artillery and small arms, from one eminence to another, for the distance of a mile, when they left off the pursuit, it began at half an hour after six, and continued till eleven. About one thousand of the Austrians were killed and wounded, among the former were General Porpora and Count Hobenstein, and among the latter Prince Lichtenstein and Count Mansfield. Twenty of their officers and four hundred soldiers were taken prisoners, and they also lost three standards. On the side of the Prussians seven subalterns, and about a hundred men, were killed, and sixteen officers and a hundred and fifty men wounded. After this battle Marschal Schwerin joined the Prince of Bevern, made himself master of the greatest part of the circle of Bautz, and took a considerable magazine from the Austrians, whom he dislodged. The Prince Anhalt-Desden, with a force of three thousand labor on both sides of the Prussian army; then the latter advanced as far as Budin, from whence the Austrians, who had an advantageous camp there, retired to Westwern, half-way between Budin and Potschern, and, drawing up his troopers in several ranks, formed a circle round Prince of Bevern's army and that of Marschal Schwerin were so situated as to be able to act jointly.

§ XXXV. These advantages were but a prelude to a more decisive event. On the twelfth day of May, the army of Prague, and those of the Austrians, were engaged a few days after. Preparing to enter Bohemia, at a distance from any of the corps commanded by his generals, he made a movement as if he had intended to march towards Egra. The enemy, deceived by this feat, and imagining he was going to execute some design, distinct from the object of other armies, detached a body of twenty thousand men to observe his motions; then he made a sudden and masterly movement to the left, by which he cut off the communication between that detachment and the main army of the Austrians, which having been reinforced by the army of Moravia, by the remains of the corps lately defeated by the Duke of Bevern, and by several thousand men and horses killed and wounded in the battle, amounted to one hundred thousand men. They were strongly intrenched on the banks of the Moldau, to the north of Prague, in a camp so fortified by every advantage of nature, and every contrivance of art, as to be deemed almost improppable. The left wing of the Austrians, thus situated, was guarded by the mountains of Zsceka, and the right extended as far as Herbohob: Prince Charles of Lorraine and Marschal Brown, who commanded them, seemed determined to maintain this advantageous post; but the King of Prussia overlooked all difficulties. Having thrown several bridges over the Moldau on the fifth of May, he passed that river on the morning of the sixth, with thirty thousand men, leaving only a few thousand of the Prince of Anhalt-Desden; and being immediately joined by the troops under Marschal Schwerin and the Prince of Bevern, resolved to attack the enemy on the same day. In consequence of this resolution, his army filed off on the left by Potschernitz; and at the same time Count Brown wheeled to the right, to avoid being flanked. The Prussians continued their march to Bichwitz, traversing several defiles and morasses, which for a little time separated the infantry from the cavalry, who first began to attack too precipitately, and were at first repulsed, but they soon recovered themselves. While the King of Prussia took the enemy in flank, Marschal Schwerin advanced in high spirit, and, overtopping the Austrian troops, surprizing his army, threatened to disconcert the whole plan of operation. In this emergency, he immediately dismantled, and taking the standard of the regiment in his hand, boldly cut through the morasses, crying out, * Let all brave Prussians follow me.* Inspired by the example of this great commander, now eighty-two years of age, all the troops pressed forward, and though he was unfortunately killed by the first fire, their ardor abated not till they had totally defeated the enemy. Thus fell Marschal Schwerin, covered with years and glory, an officer whose superior talents in the military art had been displayed in a long course of faithful service. In the meantime, the Prussian infantry, which had been separated in the pursuit, forming themselves afresh, renewed the attack on the enemy's right, and entirely broke it, while their cavalry, after three charges, obliged that of the Austrians to retire in great confusion, the centre being at the same time totally routed. The left wing of the Prussians then marched immediately towards Michely, and being there joined by the horse, renewed their attack, while the enemy were re-forming hastily towards Kastawor. Meanwhile the troops on the right of the Prussian army attacked the rear of the Prussian army, and made themselves masters of three batteries. But the behaviour of the infantry in the last attack was so successful, as to leave little room for this part of the cavalry to act. Prince Henry of Prussia, and the Prince of Bevern, signaled themselves on this occasion in storming two batteries: Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick took the left wing of the Austrians in flank, while the king with his, left, and a body of cavalry, secured the passage of the Moldau. In short, after a very long and obstinate engagement, and many signal examples of bravery on both sides, the Austrians were surprised within the field of battle, leaving behind sixty pieces of cannon, all their tents, baggage, military chest, and, in a word, their whole camp. The weight of the battle fell upon the right wing of the Austrians, the resistance of which concluded with the amount of ten or twelve thousand men, fled towards Bneschan, where they afterwards assembled under M. Pretzuch, general of horse. The infantry retired towards Prague, and the Prussians occupied the remainder of the ground. The commanders, Prince Charles of Lorraine and Marschal Brown; but they were much harassed in their retreat by a detachment of the Prussians under Marschal Keith. The Prussians took, on this occasion, ten standards, and upwards of four thousand prisoners, thirty of whom were officers of rank. Their loss amounted to about two thousand five hundred killed, and about three thousand wounded. Among the former were General d'Amstel, the Prince of Holstein-Beck, the Colonels Gottle and Eberstein, and Lieutenant-Colonel Boke. Among the latter, the Generals Wenterfield, De la Mothe, Fenque, Hauthcharmov, Blückensee, and Plettenberg. The number of prisoners was very large, and the consequences of this battle were very much greater. Among these last was Marschal Brown, who received a wound, which, from the chagrin he suffered, rather than from its own nature, proved mortal. The day after the battle, Colonel Meyer was detached with a battalion of Prussian pandours, and four hundred horse, to destroy a very considerable and valuable magazine of the Austrians at Pilsen, and this service he performed. He also completed the destruction of several others of less importance; by the loss of which, however, all possibility of subsistence was cut off from any succours the Austrians might have expected from the empire.

of the Moldau, at about a quarter of a German mile above and below Prague, at Broun and Podhala. The greatest alarm began about two o'clock, when the enemy hoped to have come silently and unexpectedly upon the miners, but this was about a quarter of an hour before. From the report of the first piece which they fired, the piquet of the third battalion of Prussian guards, to the number of a hundred men, who marched out of the camp to sustain the body which covered the works, was thrown into some confusion. The darkness of the night prevented their distinguishing the Austrian troops from their own. Lieutenant Jork, detached with two platoons to reconnoitre the enemy, attempting to discover their disposition by kindling a fire, Captain Bolvig, by the light of this fire, perceived the enemy's situation, immediately formed the design of falling upon them in flank, and gave orders to his men to fire in platoons, which they performed, mutually repeating the signal given by their commander. The enemy fled with the greater precipitation, as they were ignorant of the weakness of the piquet, and as the shout of the Prussian soldiers made them mistake it for a numerous body. Many of them deserted, many took shelter in Prague, and many more were driven into the river and drowned. At the same time this attack began, a regiment of horse grenadiers fell upon a redoubt which the Prussians had thrown up, supported by the Hungarian infantry; they were repulsed many times to the river, and were as often beat back by the Prussians, whom they found it impossible to dislodge; though Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick's battalion, which guarded this post, suffered extremely. In either case the enemy kept up a incessant fire on their musketry upon the whole front of the Prussians, from the convent of St. Margaret to the river. At three in the morning the Prussians quitted their camp to engage the enemy. The battle of Parnowitz attacked a building of the convent, the fire was so intense at the same time, at the activity before Wellawitz. The pandours, who had taken possession of this house, fired upon them incessantly from all the doors and windows until they were dislodged; and the Prussian battalions were obliged to sustain the fire both of cannon and musketry for about two hours, when the enemy retired to the city, except the pandours, who again took possession of the Red-house, which the Prussians were forced to abandon, because the artillery of Prague kept a continued fire upon it from the moment it was known to be in their hands. The Austrians left behind them many dead and wounded, besides deserters; and the Prussians, notwithstanding the loss of several officers and privates, made several breaches by which Prince Ferdinand, the King of Prussia's youngest brother, had a horse killed under him, and was slightly wounded in the face.

§ XXXVII. The Prussian works being completed, and heavy artillery arrived, four batteries, erected on the banks of the Moldau, began to play with great fury. Near three hundred bombs, besides an infinity of ignited balls, were thrown into the city in the space of twenty-four hours. The scene was lamentable: houses, men, and horses, wrapped in flames, and reduced to ashes. The confusion within, together with the want of proper artillery and ammunition, obliged the Austrians to cease firing, and dispossessed his Prussian majesty with all the opportunity he could wish of pouring destruction upon this unfortunate city. The horrors of war seemed to have extinguished the principles of humanity. No regard was paid to the distresses of the inhabitants; the Austrians obstinately maintained possession, and the Prussians practiced every straggler, every barbarous refinement, that constitutes the military art, to relieve them to capitation. After the confirmation had lasted three days, and consumed a prodigious number of buildings, the principal inhabitants, burgheers, and clergy, perceiving their city on the point of being reduced to a heap of rubbish, besought the commander, the Prussian general in chief, to save them. They were deId to: he gave voice of pity, and instead of being moved with their supplications, drove out twelve thousand persons, the least useful in defending the city. These, by order of his Prussian majesty, were again forced back, which soon produced so great a scarcity of provision within the walls, that the Austrians were reduced to the necessity of eating horse-numerous, while his Prussian majesty began to express the utmost impatience at the length of the siege. When that monarch first invested Prague, it was on the presumption that the numerous forces within the walls would, by consuming all the provisions, oblige it to surrender in a few days but, as the Austrians had still a considerable quantity of corn, that Count Daun's army was daily increasing, and would soon be powerful enough not only to cope with the detachment under the Prince of Bevern, but, if the latter took the field, the Austrians provided themselves with the means of pushing the siege entirely, and attacking the Austrians with the united forces of Prussia, or postponing the attack on the camp at Kolin, until his majesty should either gain possession of the fortress, or at least have persuaded the host to quit his posts. From either measure an advantage would have resulted. With his whole army he might probably have defeated Count Daun, or at least have obliged him to retreat. Had he continued within his lines at Prague, the Austrian general could not have constrained him to raise the siege without losing his own advantageous situation, and giving battle upon terms nearly equal. But the king, elated with success, imbued in his valor, and confident of the superiority of his own troops in point of discipline, though all resistance must sink under the weight of his victorious arm, and yield to that courage which had already surmounted such difficulties, disregarded the marshals's sage counsel, and marched up to the attack undaunted, and even assured of success. By the eighteen the two armies were in sight, and his majesty found that Count Daun had not only fortified his camp with all the heavy cannon of the army, but was strongly reinforced with troops from Moravia and Austria, which had joined him after the king's departure from Prague. He found the Austrians drawn up in three lines upon the high grounds between Genlitz and Kolin, where the wounds he received on this occasion, in their situation, the Prussian infantry marched up with firmness, while shot was poured like hail from the enemy's batteries, and began the attack about three in the afternoon. They drove the Austrians with irresistible interposition from two eminences secured with heavy cannon, and two villages defended by several battalions; but in attacking the third eminence, were flanked by the Austrian cavalry, by grape shot poured from the batteries; and, after a violent conflict, and prodigious loss of men, thrown into disorder. Animated with the king's presence, they rallied, and returned with double ardor to the charge, but were a second time repulsed. Seven times successively did Prince Ferdinand and General Wessel return the most brilliant attacks, whose terrors, breaches, numbers, and obstinacy, joined to the skill and conduct of their general, all conspired to the defeat of the Prussians, to surround their valour, and oblige them to retreat. The king then made a last and curious effort, at the head of the cavalry, on the enemy's left wing, but with as little success as all the former attacks. Every effort was made, and every attempt was productive only of greater losses and misfortunes. At last, after exposing his person in the most perilous situations, his Prussian majesty drew off his forces from the field of battle, returning to such good order, in sight of the enemy, as prevented a pursuit, in the loss of his artillery and baggage. Almost all the officers on either side distinguished themselves; and Count Daun, whose conduct emulated that of his Prussian majesty, received two slight wounds, and had a horse killed under him, and the bullet fell placed on redoubts and batteries erected on the most advanced posts. Every accessible part of the camp was fortified with lines and heavy pieces of battering cannon, and the foot of the hills secured by difficult defiles. Yet, strong as this situation might appear, formidable as the Austrian forces certainly were, his Prussian majesty undertook to dislodge them with a body of horse and foot not less than 20,000 men, the morning after.

§ XXXIX. On the thirteenth day of June, the King of Prussia quitted the camp before Prague, escorted by a few battalions and squadrons, with which he joined the Prince of Bevern at Milkovitz. Mareschal Keith, it is said, strenuously opposed the king's retiring, and determined to raise the siege entirely, and attacking the Austrians with the united forces of Prussia, or postponing the attack on the camp at Kolin, until his majesty should either gain possession of the fortress, or at least have persuaded the host to quit his posts. From either measure an advantage would have resulted. With his whole army he might probably have defeated Count Daun, or at least have obliged him to retreat. Had he continued within his lines at Prague, the Austrian general could not have constrained him to raise the siege without losing his own advantageous situation, and giving battle upon terms nearly equal. But the king, elated with success, imbued in his valor, and confident of the superiority of his own troops in point of discipline, though all resistance must sink under the weight of his victorious arm, and yield to that courage which had already surmounted such difficulties, disregarded the marshals's sage counsel, and marched up to the attack undaunted, and even assured of success. By the eighteen the two armies were in sight, and his majesty found that Count Daun had not only fortified his camp with all the heavy cannon of the army, but was strongly reinforced with troops from Moravia and Austria, which had joined him after the king's departure from Prague. He found the Austrians drawn up in three lines upon the high grounds between Genlitz and Kolin, where the wounds he received on this occasion, in their situation, the Prussian infantry marched up with firmness, while shot was poured like hail from the enemy's batteries, and began the attack about three in the afternoon. They drove the Austrians with irresistible interposition from two eminences secured with heavy cannon, and two villages defended by several battalions; but in attacking the third eminence, were flanked by the Austrian cavalry, by grape shot poured from the batteries; and, after a violent conflict, and prodigious loss of men, thrown into disorder. Animated with the king's presence, they rallied, and returned with double ardor to the charge, but were a second time repulsed. Seven times successively did Prince Ferdinand and General Wessel return the most brilliant attacks, whose terrors, breaches, numbers, and obstinacy, joined to the skill and conduct of their general, all conspired to the defeat of the Prussians, to surround their valour, and oblige them to retreat. The king then made a last and curious effort, at the head of the cavalry, on the enemy's left wing, but with as little success as all the former attacks. Every effort was made, and every attempt was productive only of greater losses and misfortunes. At last, after exposing his person in the most perilous situations, his Prussian majesty drew off his forces from the field of battle, returning to such good order, in sight of the enemy, as prevented a pursuit, in the loss of his artillery and baggage. Almost all the officers on either side distinguished themselves; and Count Daun, whose conduct emulated that of his Prussian majesty, received two slight wounds, and had a horse killed under him, and the bullet fell placed on redoubts and batteries erected on the most advanced posts. Every accessible part of the camp was fortified with lines and heavy pieces of battering cannon, and the foot of the hills secured by difficult defiles. Yet, strong as this situation might appear, formidable as the Austrian forces certainly were, his Prussian majesty undertook to dislodge them with a body of horse and foot not less than 20,000 men, the morning after.

§ XL. When the Prussian army arrived at Nimbirch, his majesty, leaving the command with the Prince of Bevern, took horse, and, escorted by twelve or fourteen prussians, set out for Prague, where he arrived next morning without halting, after having been the whole preceding day on horseback. Immediately he gave orders for sending off his artillery, ammunition, and baggage; these were constructed with such expedition, that the tents were erected, and the army on their march, before the garrison were informed of the king's defeat. Thus terminated the battle of Kolin and siege of Prague, in which the acknowledge- dged errors of the emperor, were, that he did not give the sure, atoned by the cordon with which he owned his mistake, both in a letter to the Earl Mareschal, and in conversation with several of his general officers. Most people,indeed, imagined the king had blamable for checking the ardour of his troops to stop and lay siege to Prague. They thought he should have pursued his conquests, over- ruo Austria, Moravia, and all the hereditary dominions, from which alone the empress-queen could draw speedy succours. A body of twenty or thirty thousand men would have blocked up Prague, while the remainder of the Prussian forces might have obliged the imperial family to retire from Vienna, and effectually prevented Count Daun from assembling another army. It was universally expected he would have bent his march straight to the capital; but he dreaded leaving the numerous army in Prague behind, and it was of great importance to com- plete the conquest of Bohemia. Two days after the battle, Count Daun marched all night with his corps to Nimbirch, where he joined the Prince of Bevern, and Mareschal Keith retreated next day. Count Brown having died before, off, and Prince Friedrich, who had not followed the army of Lorraine sallied out with a large body of Austrians, and attacked the rear of the Prussians; but did not further mischief than killing about two hundred of their men. The siege of Prague being thus raised, the imprompted Austrians received their deliverer, Count Daun, with an ex- pressible joy, and their united forces became greatly superior to those of the King of Prussia, who was in a short time obliged to evacuate Bohemia, and take refuge in Saxony. The Austrians harassed him as much as pos- sible in his retreat; but their armies, though superior in numbers, were not in a condition, from their late sufferings, to make any decisive attempt upon him, as the frontiers of Saxony abounded with the remains of the Austrian army. The Prussians harassed him as much as possible in his retreat; but their armies, though superior in numbers, were not in a condition, from their late sufferings, to make any decisive attempt upon him, as the frontiers of Saxony abounded with the remains of the Austrian army. The

C "The imperial grannaries, says he, are so admirable crops; one hundred companies defended a strong ground, which my best infantry could not in a day do. But he never used double charges, but to no purpose. At first he shot a battery, but could not do it; but now, that he has two columns of artillery, ('tis better now to Brunswick, who has but one.) Only the Prussians have given me a battle, and it was in this battle that I received my wound. All my cavalry were present and idle spectacors, excepting a bold body in the Prussians, who seemed to have a private business. The Prussians and Austrians were not firing at each other, but were firing at others. They had the advantage of all they wished, and that is all we gave to them. The French army were near their line of battle, and several of my regiments were repulsed with monstrosity. Henry perpot company, to remount the cavalry with the utmost expedition; not to suffer any horses to be conveyed out of the electorate; to furnish the magazines in that country with all things necessary for fifty thousand men. Of these three thousand battalions were to be Hanoverian; and, in the sequence of engagements entered into for that purpose, twelve thousand Hessians, six thousand Brunswickers, two thousand Saxe Gothans, and a thousand Luneberg horse, occupied the Weida hills, the troops of the continued states that were to compose the allied army, under the name of an army of observation, began to assemble with all possible diligence near Bielefeld. Thither the generals, appointed to command the several divisions, repaired, to settle the plan of operations with their commands, the Duke of Cumberland, who, having left London on the ninth of April, arrived on the sixteenth at Hanover, and from thence required to the army, which, having been joined by three Prussian regiments that retired from Wesel, consisted of thirty-seven battalions and thirty-four squadrons. Of these six battalions and six squadrons were posted at Bielefeld, under the command of Lieutenant-General Baron de Spiegel; six battalions and four squadrons under Lieutenant-General de Block, at Hervorden; six battalions and four squadrons under Major-General Ledeboeuf, between Hervorden and Minden; seven battalions and two squadrons under Lieutenant-General d'Urbeg, in the neighborhood of Hamelen; and five battalions and four squadrons, under Major-General de Haus, near Neenburgh. The head-quarters of his royal highness were at Bielefeld. On the second, the French encamped on the Lower Rhine continued filling ostringstreame. The siege of Gueldre was converted into a blockade, occasioned by the difficulties the enemy found in raising munitions; and a sort of peace, made by Bielefeld, as well as to ravage the country of Paderborn as to reconnoitre the French, carried off several waggons loaded with wheat and oats, destined for the territories of the Elector of Cologne. On the other hand, Colonel Fischer having had an engagement with a small body of Hanoverians, in the county of Mecklenburgh, routed them, and made some prisoners. After several other petty skirmishes between the French and the Hanoverians, the Duke of Cumberland altered the position of his camps, by placing it between Bielefeld and Hervorden, in hopes of frustrating the design of the enemy, who, declining to attack him on the side of Brackel, after having reconnoitred his situation several days, made a motion on our right, if not to march between him and the Weser. This step was no sooner taken than, on the thirteenth of June in the afternoon, having received advice that the enemy had caused a large body of troops to be repaired by a second, near Burgborne, he ordered his army to march that evening towards Hervorden; and, at the same time, Major-General Hardenberg marched with four battalions of grenadiers, and a regiment of horse, to reinforce that post. Colonel Schulenberg covered the left of the march with a battalion of grenadiers, a regiment of horse, and the light troops of Bückeburg. The whole army marched in two columns. The right, composed of horse, and followed by two battalions, to cover their passage through the enclosures and defiles, passed by the right of Bielefeld; and the left, consisting of infantry, marched by the left of the same town. The rear-guard of the French army attacked the rear-guard of the allies, commanded by Major-General Enstedt, very briskly, and at first put them into some confusion, but they immediately recovered themselves. This was in the beginning of the night. At break of day the enemy's reinforcements returned to the chase, but were again repulsed, nor could they once break through Lieutenant-Colonel Allenstein's Hanoveran guards, which cleared away the enemy, with a determined rout of regular troops, and a new raised corps of hunters.

§ XLIII. The nilies encamped at Cofeldt the fourteenth, and remained there all the next day, when the enemy's despatches arrived to the extent of four deuils, who made a feint as if they would attack the town, after having summoned it to surrender; but they retired without attempting any thing further: in the meantime the troops that were posted at Hervorden, and formed the rear-guard, passed the Weser on the side of Hertford, without any opposition; the French, however, made some molestation at the bridges. The Afgebucher troops which had been left at Bielefeld, to cover the duke's retreat, after some skirmishes with the French, rejoined the army in the neighbourhood of Herford, and a few days after this was done, the royal-guard corps again crossed the Weser, and sent over his artillery,baggage, and ammunition. At the same time some detachments passed the river on the right, between Minden and Oldenberg, and only remained at Wesenitz having the Weser in front, and the right and left covered with eminences and marshes. There the army under his royal highness reassembled, and the French fixed their head-quarters at Bielefeld, which the Hanoverians garrisoned, leaving to it only a part of a magazine, which had been set on fire. By this time the French were in such want of forage, that M. d'Estrees himself, the prince of the blood, and all the officers, without exception, were obliged to send back part of their horses. However, on the tenth of June their whole army, consisting of seven battalions and forty squadrons, with fifty-two pieces of cannon, besides a body of cavalry left at Rurenze for reconnoitring the country, was in the neighbourhood of almost impassable forests, famine, and every other obstacle that could be thrown in their way by a vigilant and experienced general, they at length surmounted all difficulties by foraging the country round, which was about a thousand, and unused to the ravage of war. It was imagined that the passage of the Weser, which defends Hanover from foreign attacks, would have been vigorously opposed by the army of the allies; but whether, in the present situation of affairs, it was thought advisable to act only upon the defensive, and not to begin the attack in a country that was not concerned as a principal in the war, or the Dutch provinces. If the French should fix their head against the enemy, is a question we shall not pretend to determine. However that may have been, the whole French army passed the Weser on the tenth and eleventh of July, without the loss of a man. The number of effecting this passage is thus related:—Marschal d'Estrees, being informed that his magistrates of provisions were well furnished, his own established, and the artillery and pontoon boats arrived at the destined places, ordered Lieutenant-General Brelogic, with ten battalions, twelve squadrons, and ten pieces of cannon, to march to Eghe- ren; Lieutenant-General M. de Chevert, with sixteen battalions, three brigades of carabiniers, the royal hussars, and sixty pieces of cannon, to march to Liebeknecht. All these troops being arrived in their camp on the left of Julich; the rest of the troops, consisting of thirty-two battalions and thirty-two squadrons, under the command of the Duke of Orleans, who was now arrived at the army, marched to Uelckersheim, from whence M. d'Armoriens had set out early in the morning, with the troops under his command, and by hasty marches got on the seventh, by eleven at night, to Blankenhoven, where he found the boats which had gone from Ahrenberg. The bridges were built, the cannon planted, and the intrenchments at the head of the bridges completed in the night between the seventh and eighth. The mariscal having sent away part of his baggage from Bielefeld on the sixth, went in person on the seventh at eleven o'clock, to Horn, and on the eighth to Brakel. On advice that M. d'Armoriens had thrown his bridges across without opposition, and was at work on his intrenchments, he went on the ninth to Blankenhoven, to see the bridges and intrenchments; and afterwards advanced to examine the first position he intended for this army, and came down to the right side of the Weser to the abbey of Corvey, where he forded the river, with the princes of Lippe, and met the French at this place, and their amble pages determined to set out, the morning, he got on horseback by four o'clock, to see the Duke of Orleans's division file off, which arrived at Corvey at ten o'clock; as also that of M. d'Armoriens, which arrived at eleven, and that of M. Souvigny, which arrived about two o'clock. The mariscal having examined the course of the river, caused the bridges of pontoon to be laid within gun-shot of the abbey, where the Viscount de Turenne passed that river in the year one thousand six hundred and seventy-three, and where the divisions under Brolio and Cheveret now passed it on the twelfth and thirteenth. These troops and generals being informed of what was to be done upon the upper Weser, attacked Minden, and carried it, whilst a detachment of the French entered the country of East Friesland, under the command of the Marquis d’Aulnoy; and this detachment of infantry and artillery, marching from the Ems to Embden, the only sea-port the King of Prussia had, which at first seemed determined to make a defence; but the inhabitants were not agreed upon the methods to be used, and the officers held a council of war; but, in the meantime, their gates being shut, M. d’Aulnoy caused some cannon to be brought to beat them down; and the garrison, composed of four hundred Prussians, not being strong enough to defend the town, the soldiers mutinied against their officers, whereupon a capitulation was agreed on, and the gates were opened to the French commander, who made his troops enter with a great deal of order, assured the magistrates that care should be taken to make them observe good discipline, and published two ordinances, one for the security of the religion and commerce of the city, and the other for prohibiting the exportation of corn and forage out of that principality. This small force was not obliged to take so oath of allegiance to the French king.

§ XLIV. On Sunday, the twenty-fourth of July, the French, after having had part of the electorate of Hanover under command, marched in three columns with their artillery, towards the village of Lutford, when Major-General Fustenburgh, who commanded the out-posts in the village, sent an officer to inform the Duke of Cumberland of their approach. In the evening they took possession of these posts with a body of troops, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sporcken; but finding it impossible to support the village, as it was commanded by the heights commanded by the battery of the same name, and them having being sensible that it would be always in his power to re-take it, from its situation in a bottom between two hills, he withdrew his post from Lutford. The French then made two attacks, one at the point of the wood, and the other higher up to the same wood, opposite to the grenadiers commanded by Major-General Hardenberg, but they failed in both; and though the fire of their artillery was very hot, they were obliged to retire. The French army encamped the next day on the banks of the Duke of Cumberland's posts, the intelligence received, that M. d’Etretes had all his troops, and was furnished with a very considerable train of artillery, left his royal highness no room to doubt of his intentions: news arrived from Hanover of his having changed his camp for a more advantageous situation, by drawing up his army on the eminence between the Weser and the woods, leaving the Hamelem on his right, the village of Hastedt in his front, and his left close to the wood, at the point of which his royal highness had a battery of twelve pounders and howitzers. There was a hollow way from the left of the village to the battery, and a morass on the other side of Hastedt to his right. Major-General Schenkenberg, with the hunters, and two battalions of grenadiers, was posted in the corner of the wood upon the left of the battery; his royal highness ordered the village of Hastedt to be cleared to his front, to prevent it from being occupied by the Dutch; and he ordered both arms all night. On the twenty-fifth, in the morning, the French army marched forward in columns, and began to cannonade the allies very severely, marching and counter-marching. This continued till evening, and the heavy guns upon the right, the left, and the centre. In the evening their artillery appeared much superior to that of the allies. The army was again ordered to lay all night on their arms; it was only posted in the twelve battalions of infantry, a thousand cannon to be repaired; Count Schenkenberg to be reinforced with a battalion of grenadiers, and two field pieces of cannon; and that battery to be also supported by four more battalions of grenadiers under the command of Major-General Hardenberg. He likewise caused a battery to be erected of twelve six-pounders, behind the village of Hastedt, and took all the precautions he could think of to give theretch of the enemy a warm reception. As soon as it was day-light, he mounted on horseback to reconnoitre the position of the enemy, whom he found in the same situation as the day before. At a little after five, a very smart cannonading began against the battery behind the village, which was strongly supported by the Dutch infantry and artillery. This was a most severe fire with surprising steadiness and resolution. Between seven and eight the firing of small arms began on the left of the allies, when their royal highness ordered Major-General Adolf Behr, who then commanded by the Weser, to sustain the grenadiers in the wood, if their assistance should be wanted. The cannonading continued above six hours, during which the troops, that were exposed to it, never once alighted of their firmness. The fire of the small arms on the left increasing, and the French seeming to gain ground, his royal highness detached the colonels Darthenhausen and Bredenbach, with three Hanoverian battalions and six squadrons round the wood by Affelde, who, towards the close of the day, drove several squadrons of the enemy back to their army, without giving them any opportunity to charge. At length the grenadiers to the wood, apprehensive of being surrounded, from the great numbers of French and Dutch that appeared marching round on that side, though they repulsed every thing that appeared in their front, thought it advisable to retire nearer to the left of the army, a motion which gave the enemy an opportunity of possessing themselves of the battery without opposition. Here the hereditary Prince of Brunswick distinguished himself at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbottell guards, and another of Hanoverians, who attacked and took place of it, and behind them the whole of the French army, and the great force of the enemy, and re-took the battery. But the French being in possession of an eminence which commanded and flanked both the lines of the infantry and the cannonade, and by the weight of their fire, and the momentum of their attack under the cover of a hill, his royal highness, considering the superior numbers of the enemy, near double to his, and the impossibility of stockading them from their post, without exposing his own troops too much, ordered a retreat; in consequence of which his army retired, first to Hamelen, where he left a garrison, then to Nurnburgh, and afterwards to Hoya; in the neighbourhood of which town, after sending away all the magazines, sick, and wounded, he encamped, in order to cover the works, and to preserve a communication with Stade, to which place the archives, and most valuable effects of Hanover, had been removed. In this engagement, Colonel Bredenbach, who had been posted, with a battery of fourteen pieces of cannon, repulsed, and drove them down a precipice, and took all their artillery and ammunition; but preferring the care of his wounded to the glory of carrying away the cannon, he brought off only six, nailing up and destroying the rest. The loss of the allies in all the skirmishes, which lasted three days, was three hundred and twenty-seven men killed, nine hundred and seven wounded, and two hundred and twenty missing, or taken prisoners; whilst that of the French, according to their own accounts, amounted to fifteen hundred men.

laid two bridges over the Aller, in the night, and had passed that river with a large body of troops, he ordered his army to march to secure the important post and passage of Ottenberg on the right bank of the river, and marched his army on his left. He encamped that night at Hausen, having detached Lieutenant-General Oberg, with eight battalions and six squadrons, to Ottenberg, to which place he marched the next day, and encamped behind the French army's position, between Ottenberg and Rothenberg. The French took possession of Venzen on the twenty-sixth of August, and one of their detachments went on the twenty-ninth to Bremen where the gates were immediately opened to them. The Duke of Cumberland, now closely pressed on all sides, and in danger of having his communications with Stade cut off, which the enemy was endeavoring to effect by胡子 upon all the posts round him, found it his interest to leave the place and march into the township of which the French immediately took possession; to retreat to Schleswig, where his head-quarters were, on the first of September; and thence, on the third of the same month, he marched in the company of the Swedish army into the kingdom of Denmark, by his minister the Count de Lyny, and to sign the famous convention of Closter-Seven, by which thirty-eight thousand Hanoverians laid down their arms, and were dispersed into different quarters of cantonnement.

though the event seems plainly to speak the last. Even at the time, no comparison was made between the military skill of the Mareschal d’Etretes, and that of the Duke de Richelieu; but, however correct all these statements have been, this last, which is the most important, and which shows the character of a soldier, excelled all, or at least most of his contemporaries, in the more refined arts of a courtier, was, just before the battle we have been speaking of, unpointed to supersede the former in the command of the French army in Lower Saxony, where he arrived on the sixteenth of August, with the title of Mareschal of France; and M. d’Etretes immediately resigned the command.

§ 351. Immediately after the battle of Hastenbeck, the French sent a detachment of four thousand men to lay under contribution the counties of Hanover and Brunswick-Wolfenbuttel, as well as the duchies of Bremen and Verden; and it seems that in the view of this a military meeting the Duke de Chevreuse was detached with two thousand men to take possession of Hanover itself, with the title of governor of that city. He accordingly marched thither; and upon his arrival the Hanoverian garrison was divided into two parties; one at the castle, under the care of the purser, and the other under the care of the lurge, who declared, that they were ready to furnish the French army with all the succours the country could afford; and accordingly the magistrates of Cassel present-ealed to the Duke de Chevreuse keys as soon as he entered their city.
Gottengen was ordered by M. d’Amontourre to prepare him for a limited amount, upon pain of military execution, four thousand pounds of white beef, two thousand brushes of oats, a greater quantity than could be found in the whole country, a hundred head of hay, and other provisions.

§ 3517. The Duke of Cumberland remained encamped in the neighbourhood of Hoya till the twenty-fourth of August, when, upon advice that the enemy

CHAP. VIII.

§ 1. The French enter the Prussian dominions, where they commit great disorders

§ 2. The Prussians, in their march to the Rhine, are immediately followed by the French, who, under the command of Prince Frederick, turn the town of Memel, and proceed to attack the Russians, who had made for a long time a dilatory march, and seemed uncertain of their own resources, at all once quickened their motions, and entered duelus Prussia under Marshal Apolin and General Furnieri, marking their progress by every inhumanity that unbridled cruelty, lust, and rapine, can be imagined capable of committing. A large body of Austrians entered Silesia, and penetrated as far as Brabant, and made their way to the important fortress of Schweidnitz, the key of that country. A second body entered Lusatia, another quarter of the Prussian territories, and made themselves masters of Zittau.

Twenty-two thousand Swedes penetrated into Prussian Pomerania, took the towns of Anzamb and Demmin, and laid the whole country under contribution. The army of the empire, reinforced by that of Prince Sobieski, after many delays, was at last in full march to enter Saxony; and this motion left the Austrians at liberty to make the greatest part of their forces to the reduction of Silesia. An Austrian general, penetrating through Lusatia, passed by the Prussian armies, and suddenly presenting himself before the gates of Prague, made the inhabitants give up the place by a ransom contribution; and though he retired on the approach of a body of Prussians, yet he still found means to intercept the communication of these last with Silesia. The Prussians, it is true, exerted themselves bravely on all sides, and collected large armies and their emigrants, and their emigrants, and their emigrants, 159,000 men, in the provinces of Saxony and Silesia; and so disposed their forces near Dresden, to the number of eighty thousand men. But the king, as he had no other means, was pursuing, another gained upon them in some other part. The winter approached, their strength decayed, and their adversaries multiplied daily. The king, harassed, and almost spent, and almost in the last and most dire distress, was, in a manner excluded from the empire. The greatest part of his dominions were either taken from him, or laid under contribution, and possessed by his enemies; who collected the public revenues, fattened on the contributions, and with the riches which they drew from the electorate of Hanover, and other conquests, defrayed the expenses of the war, and by the convention of Cluj-Seven, he was deprived of all his allies, and left without any assurance whatever, excepting what the British parliament might think fit to supply. How different is this picture from that, which the King of Prussia exhibited when he took arms to enter Saxony! But, in order to form a clear idea of these events, it is necessary to return to the above mentioned transactions. The general of Bercincham to march with all possible expedition with the troops under his command, to join the Prince de Soubise: the gens-d'arms, and other troops that were in the hand-graves of Luneck-Cassel, rejoin the same order; and sixty battalions of foote, and the greatest part of the horse belonging to the French army, were directed to attack the Prussian territories. Maresch Buchele crowned his army at Brunswick on the fourteenth of September, and having, in a few days after, assembled a hundred and ten battalions, and a hundred and fifty squadrons, with a hundred pieces of cannon, near Wolfshut, he entered the King of Prussia's dominions with his army on the 27th, and entered into the city of Dusseldorf, columns, which penetrated into Alberstadt and Brandenburg, plundering the towns, exacting contributions, and committing many enormities, at which their general is said to have condooned.

In the meantime the Duke of Cumberland returned to England, where he arrived on the 11th of October, and shortly after resigned all his military commands.

§ II. The allied army, after the battle of Halleck, marched directly to the Luneck, as it might easily have done, and then taken post on the other side of Wolfenbuttel, Halberstadt, and Magdeburg, it might have waited securely under the cannon of the latter place for the junction of the Prussian forces; instead of which, they immediately turned off to the Lower Weser, retaking successively from Hameln to Nuënbirg, Verden, Rotenburg, Buxschude, and lastly to Stade, where, for want of subsistances and elbow-room, the troops were all made prisoners of war. They were thereabout a hundred and fifty miles to be cooped up in a neck, instead of taking the other route, which was only about a hundred miles, and would have led them to a place of safety. By this unhappy proceeding, the Allies were deprived of the assistance of near forty thousand good troops, which, in the close of the campaign, might have put him upon an equality with the French and the army of the German Confederation, and have rendered his numerous enemies on all sides, insomuch that his situation became now more dangerous than ever; and the employ the power which God hath intrusted to him in defending himself, protecting his subjects, and repelling every unjust attack. His majesty will never lose sight of the rules which are observed, even in the midst of war, among civilized nations. But if, contrary to all hope and expectation, he finds the enemy, in the course of the peace, to have perpetrated any injustice, he will, no doubt, bring to light the truth of his accusation by the force of a just and good war. When every other effort shall have failed, and when circumstances, the king hath no other part to take, but to the best intelligence, whether they ever were really designed to pass into the Prussian territories, not only on account of their long stay on the borders of Lithuania, but also because several of their Cossacks had been severely punished for plundering the villages of some Prussian peasants upon the frontiers of Courland, and the damage done to the peasants was compensated with money, though General Apraxin's army was at the same time greatly distressed by the want of provisions; when, on a sudden, they quickened their motions, and shifted they were, in earnest, determined to accom-

The first act of hostility was the attack of Memel, which surrendered; and, by the articles of capitulation, it was agreed, that the garrison should march out with their arms, the king in the course of war, after having inter-gaged not to violate against the empress, or any of her allies, for the space of one year.

§ V. His Prussian majesty, justly foreseeing the great enormities that were to be expected from these savage enemies, who were unaccustomed to make war, except upon nations as barbarous as themselves, who looked upon war only as an opportunity for plunder, and every country through which they happened to march as theirs by right of conquest, published the following declaration:—"It is instantly known, that the King of Prussia, after the example of his glorious predecessors, has, ever since his accession to the crown, had it down as a maxim to seek the friendship of the true, and defend the arm of Russia, and cultivate it by every method. His Prussian majesty hath had the satisfaction to live, for several successive years, in the strictest harmony with the reigning empress; and this happy union would have continued, if evil-minded designs had not broken it by their secret machinations, and carried things to such a height, that the ministers on both sides have been recalled, and the correspondence broken off. However melancholy these circumstances might be for the king, his majesty paid the most attentive to prevent any thing that might increase the alienation of the Russian court. He hath been particularly careful, during the disturbances of the war that now unhappily rages, to avoid whatever might implicate him in a difference with that court, not withstanding the great grievances he hath to allege against it; and that it was publicly known the court of Vienna had at last drawn that of Russia into its destructive views, and made it its instrument for breaking the scheme of Austria. His majesty hath given the whole world in-testable proofs, that he was under an indispensable necessity of having recourse to the measures he hath taken against the courts of Vienna and Saxony, who forced him by their continued and decided motions to take up arms; even since things have been brought to this extremity, the king hath offered to lay down his arms, if proper securities should be granted to him. His majesty hath not neglected to coat the motions with which the court of Vienna hath been drawn into measures so opposite to the em-press's sentiments, and which would excite the utmost indi-guration of that great princess, if the truth could be placed before her without disguise. The king did more: he suggested to her imperial majesty means sufficient either to excuse her not taking any part in the present war, or to avoid upon the justest grounds the execution of those engagements which the court of Vienna claimed by a manifest abuse of obligations, which they employed to palliate their unlawful views. It wholly depended upon the Empess of Russia to extinguish the flames of the war, without unmanothing the sword, by pursuing the measures suggested by the king. This conduct would have imperilled his majesty the whole of Europe. It would have gained her more lasting glory than can be acquired by the greatest triumphs. The king finds with regret, that all his precautions and care to maintain peace with the Russian empire are fruitless, and that the intrigues of his enemies have prevailed. His majesty sees all the considerations of friendship and good neighbourhood set aside by the imperial court of the Empress of Russia, and all his endeavors with his majesty. He sees that court marching its troops through the territories of a foreign power, and, con-suddenly, upon the important post at Gagel, situated between Bremen and Loya, in the Zitau, after an obstinate defense made by the Prussian garrison, under Major-General Puttkamer, consisting of four battalions, who were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. The Austrians, there were left half a town to themselves, the Lusatia, upon a corps which had been detached under the command of the Prince of Prussia to watch them, his Prussian majesty thought proper to leave Leinemeitz on the twentieth in the morning, and lay that night at Lusatia. The king of Poland detached a large battalion of his troops still kept possession, while the rest of his army remained encamped in the plain before that place. Next morning, at break of day, Prince Henry described the retreat, which he did not resolve to follow, because he marched in sight of the whole body of Austrian irregulars. He passed the bridge of Leinemeitz, after withdrawing the battalion that was in the town, and having burnt the bridge, the whole army united, and made a small movement towards the passes of the mountains; the king then lying at Sulowatz, near the field where the battle of Lobschutz was fought on the first of October of the preceding year. The heavy baggage was sent on in the afternoon, with a proper escort; and in the morning of the twenty-second the army marched in two columns, and encamped on the high ground at Lassechitz, a little beyond Levania, where it had bivouacked the night before on their rear-guard, though great numbers of Austrian bussars, and other irregulars, had appeared the evening before within cannon-shot of the Prussian camp. On the twenty-third, they marched towards Nellenfend; on the twenty-fifth it encamped near Cotta; on the twenty-sixth near Pirna, where it halted the next day; and on the twenty-eighth it crossed the river near that place, and entered Lusien, where, by the end of the month, it encamped near Bautzen.

§ VIII. The king's army made this retreat with all the success that could be wished; but the corps under the Prince of Prussia retreated with greater reputation for the Austrians, immediately after their taking Gagel, sent a strong detachment against Zitau, a trading town in the circle of Upper Saxony, where the Prussians had large magazines, and a garrison of six battalions, and, in his sight, attacked it with uncommon rage. Paying no regard to the inhabitants as being friends or allies, but determined to reduce the place before the King of Prussia could have time to march to its relief, they no sooner arrived before it, than they began to batter it with immense fury, and so fast that most of the garrison finding themselves unable to resist, made their escape, and carried off as much as they could of the magazines, leaving only three or four hundred men to hold the town, the citizens, their parents, and friends, as long as possible; which he accordingly did, till the whole place was almost destroyed. The cannonading began on the twenty-third of July, at eleven in the morning, and lasted till five in the evening. In this space of time four thousand balls, many of them red hot, were fired into this unfortunate city with so little intermission, that it was soon set on fire in several places. In the confusion which the conflagration produced, the Austrians entered the town, and the inhabitants imagined that they had then nothing further to fear; and that their friends the Austrians would assist them in extinguishing the flames, and saving the place: but in this particular their expectations were disappointed. The prince of Prussia, who rushed in with the regular troops, made no distinction between the Prussians and the inhabitants of Zitau; instead of helping to quench the flames, they began to plunder the warehouses in the town. The Governor, and all their valuable merchandise they contained was either carried off or reduced to ashes. Upwards of six hundred houses, and almost all the public buildings, the cathedral of St. John and the church of SS. John and Paul, the court of Brussel, the castle, and the other residences, were burnt, with eight schools, the town-house, and every thing contained in it, the public weigh-house, the prison, the archives, and all the other documents of the town-council, the plate, and other things of value, presented to the town, by the emperors, kings, and other princes and noblemen, were entirely destroyed, and more than four hundred citizens were killed in this assault. Of the whole town there were left but one house in any condition, three eight houses, two churches, the council, library, and the salt-works. The Queen of Poland was so affected by this melancholy account, that she is said to have fainted upon hearing it. As this city belonged to their friend the King of Austria, though not his to retort, the Prussian army, in this case, made an excuse for their conduct, ascribing it entirely to the necessity they were under, and the obstinate defence made by the Prussian garrison. But what excuses can alter for such barbarity?

§ IX. The corps under the Prince of Prussia, which had been witness to the destruction of this unhappy place, was, by the king's march to Bautzen, fortunately extricated from the danger of being surrounded by the Austrians, who, upon his majesty's approach, retired from their posts on the right. Soon after this event, the Prince of Prussia, finding his health much impaired by the fatigue of the campaign, quitted the army, and returned to Berlin, and the Austrians, at the same time. Prince Henry, was looking for an opportunity to attack the Prussians, who was within a few miles of the town of Pella, and having also a comfortable neutral ground between, the Prussian army, under the Prince of Anhalt, encamped near Pelsa, the Neck of the forest, to guard the passes of the mountains of Bohemia, arrived at Pirna, having been much harassed to his march by the enemy's irregular troops, and lost some great numbers of prisoners and the two hundred houses of the town of Pirna, he pursed his march through Dresden with twenty battalions and forty squadrons, and encamped on the right of the Elbe, before the gate of the new city, from whence he joined the army of Bautzen and Scloritz. The Prussian army, now re-assembled at this place, amounted to about sixty thousand men, besides twelve battalions and ten squadrons which remained in the garrison camp at Pirna, under the Prince of Anhalt, to cover Dresden, secure the gorges of the mountains, and check the incursions of the Austrian irregulars, with whom, as they were continually flying about the skirts of the Saxon army, the Prussian army, in order to confine them on their marches, almost daily skirmishes happened, with various success. Though some of these encounters were very bloody, they cost the Prussians much fewer men than they lost by desertion since the battle of Kolin. The reason seemed obvious:—The Prussian army had been recruited, in times of peace, from all parts of Germany: and though this way of recruiting may be very proper in such times, yet it cannot be expected to answer in a state of actual war, especially an unforeseen war: because the fidelity of such soldiers can never be so much depended on as that of natives, who serve their natural sovereign from principle, and not merely for pay, and who must desert their country, their prince, and their friends, at the same time that they desert their prince.

§ X. It will be proper here to take notice of some events which could not easily be mentioned before, without breaking through the order we have proposed to ourselves in the writing of this history. —The empress-queen, more imibited than ever against the King of Prussia and his allies, recalled her ministers, Count Colored, and Muns. Zobem from London, towards the beginning of July; and about the same time Count Kautzitz, great chancellor of the empire, informed Mr. Keith, the British minister at Vienna, that the court of London, by the succours it had given, and still continued to give, the King of Prussia, as well as by other undertakings, had furnished him with so many materials of affairs, having broken the solemn engagements which united this crown with the house of Austria; her majesty, the empress-queen, had thought proper to recall her ministers, and reflect upon this transaction in the course of time, in answer to a great many communications she received from England on the subject. Mr. Keith, in pursuance of this notice, set out from Vienna on the twenty-ninth of July; as did also Mr. De roble, his Britannic majesty's minister at the court of London: and in a few days they arrived in their own time. On the seventh of July, General Peas, commandant of Ostend, Nespont, and the maritime ports of Flanders, sent his adjutant to the English vice-consul at Ostend, at six o'clock in the morning, to tell him, that by orders from his court all communication with England was broke off; and desired the vice-consul to intimate to the packet-boats and British ships at Ostend, Bruges, and Nieuport, to depart in twenty-four hours, and not to return into any of the ports of the empress-queen till further disposition should be made. The reasons alleged by the court of Vienna for detaining the subjects of his Britannic majesty from the ship, were two, viz. that at the ports of Ostend, Austria by the arms and treasures of Great Britain, were, "That her imperial majesty, the empress-queen, could not, with indifferency, see England, instead of giving the successive and final notification of the first, by the most solemn, and in alliance with her enemy the King of Prussia, and actually afford him all manner of assistance, assembling armies to oppose those which the most christian king, her ally, had sent to her aid, and suffering privations to exercise open violence in her roads, under the cannon of her ports and coasts, without giving the least satisfaction or answer to the complaints made on that account; and the King of Great Britain himself, at the very time she was offering him a neutrality for Hanover, publishing, by a message to his parliament, that she had formed, with the most christian king, dangerous designs against that elec- toral and independent prince. Considering, however, the security of her ports, judged it expedient to give the fore-mentioned orders; and at the same time to declare, that she could no longer permit a free communication between her subjects and the English, which had hitherto been allowed by treaty; and declared all such open and explicit intercourse openly violated." Notwithstanding these orders, the English packet-boats, with letters, were allowed to pass as usual to and from Ostend; the ministers of her imperial majesty, who considered her action a good revenge for the postage of English letters brings into the post-office of the Austrian Netherlands. Ostend and Nieuport, by order of her imperial majesty, received each of them a French garrison of thirty thousand men. The left the next day, and the latter the next day, under the command of M. de la Motte, upon whose arrival the Austrian troops evacuated those places; though the empress-queen still reserved to herself, her full and free exercise of all her rights of sovereignty; to which purpose an oath was administered to the French commandant by her majesty's minister-plenipotentiary for the government of the Low Countries. At the same time, the imperial and most christian majesties notified to the respective governments that they must not admit any English men of war, or transports, into their ports, on pain of having a French garrison imposed on them. The city of Guelders, which had hitherto been guarded by the French ever since the beginning of the summer, was forced by famine to capitulate on the twenty-fourth of August, and the garrison marched out with all the honours of war, in order to be conducted to Berlin; but so many of them deserted, that when they passed by Cologne, the whole garrison consisted only of the commandant and forty-seven men. By the surrender of this place the whole country lay open to the French and their allies quite up to Magdeburg; and the empress-queen immediately received two hundred thousand crowns from the revenues of Cleves and La Marck alone.

§ XI. To return to the affairs more immediately relating to the king of Prussia. The advanced posts of the Prince of Altenburg at Pissa were attacked on the tenth of August, by a body of Hessians, and other irregular troops of the Austrians; but the Prussians soon obliged them to retire; the loss of several men, and two pieces of cannon. On the nineteenth of the same month, at the morning, a great number of Austrian pandours surrounded a little town called Gotthe, in which a Prussian garrison was placed; and with a design to take it by surprise. The pandours attacked it with as much violence as they could, killed twenty-three Prussians, and wounded many; but the Prussians having rallied, repulsed the assailants with great loss. These, however, were but a sort of preludes to the corps of infantry and cavalry, which appeared soon after Silesia, which had hitherto been undecided this year, began now to feel the effects of war. Baron Jahns, an Austrian colonel, entering that country with only a hand-ful of men, made himself master of Hirschberg, Waldenberg, Gottenburg, Frankenhausen, and Landshut. They were, indeed, but open places; and he was repulsed in an attempt upon Strigau. On the side of Francheon the army of the emperor was assembled with all speed, under the Prince of Saxe-Hildburghausen; the French were marching a second army from their interior provinces into Alsace, in order to join the imperialists; the first division of their troops had already entered the empire, and were advanced as far as Strasburg. They were now, in the utmost expedition, to send a numerous army into Po- merania; and the Russians, who since the taking of Memel had not done the King of Prussia much damage, besides that of breaking the Russian treaty, entered into an alliance with them, and interrupting the trade of Königsberg by their squadrons, were again advancing with hasty strides towards Prussia, marking their steps with horrid desolation. Field-Marshal Leibnitz, who had been left in Prussia, with an army of thirty thousand men, to guard that kingdom during the absence of his master, was encamped near Velan, when the Russians, to the number of eighty thousand, after taking Amelet, advanced against the territories of the Prussian king, whose situation now drew upon him the attention of all Europe. In the night between the seventh and eighth of August, Colonel Malachowski, one of Mare- schal Leibnitz's aides-de-camp, was informed of the approach of the enemy, when a skirmish happened, which lasted near two hours, between his advanced ranks and a Russian detachment, three times stronger than the Prussians. The Russians were repulsed, and fled into the woods, after having taken a thousand prisoners. A Russian had given the Prussians lost but one man, and had fourteen wounded.

§ XII. Several other little skirmishes happened between straggling parties of the two armies; and the Russians went as far as Hermsdorff, and the Prussians as far as Krensdorff, till at length the two armies having approached one another in Brandenburgh Prussia, Mareschal Leibnitz, finding it impossible to spare detachments from so small a number of troops, desisted; and a treaty was agreed upon by both parties, to cover the wretched inhabitants from the outrages committed on them by the Russian Cossacks, and other barbarians belonging to them, judged it absolutely necessary to attack their main army, and accordingly, notwithstanding his great disadvantage in almost every respect, he resolved to hazard a battle on the thirteenth of August. The Russians, consisting, as we before observed, of eighty thousand regulars, under command of General Ap- ozen, were posted in a field, looked on as the most advantageous camp near Norkitten in Prussia. Their army was composed of four lines, each of which was guarded by an intrenchment, and the whole was defended by two hundred guns, and the beginning of every day was devoted to the inspection of all the eminences. Mareschal Leibnitz's army scarcely amounted to thirty thousand men. The action began at five in the morning, and was carried on with so much vigour, that the Prussians entirely broke the whole first line of the enemy, and forced all their batteries. The Prince of Holstein-Gottorp, brother to the king of Sweden, at the head of his regiment of dragoons, routed the Rus- sian cavalry, and afterwards fell upon a regiment of gren- diers, which was cut to pieces; but when the Prussians came to the second intrenchment, Mareschal Leibnitz seeing that he could not attempt to carry it, without expen- ding his army too much, took upon him, with General Zapuchin was wounded and taken prisoner, with a colonel of the Russian artillery; but the former was sent back on his parole. The Prussian army had, at first, made themselves masters of this second line, and attacked the gren- diers, which were cut off in their retreat; but they were afterwards obliged to abandon them, with eleven of their own, for want of carriages. Three Russian generals were killed; but the Prussians lost no general or officer of distinction. Count Dahlna was the only one that was wounded.

Prussian majesty, finding that all his endeavours could not bring the Austrians to an engagement, set out from Rossa, accompanied by Mareschal Keth, with sixteen battalions and forty squadrons of his troops, and arrived at Dresden on the twenty-ninth of August, leaving the rest of the army in a magnificent position under the walls.

With this detachment, which, by the junction of several bodies of troops, amounted to about forty thousand men, he made a quick march, by the way of Leipzig, towards Erfurt, to give an effect to the projected invasion of the empire. But by the time he arrived at Erfurt, which was on the fourteenth of September, the enemy had retreated towards Gotha; and upon his further approach, they retired to Eysenach, where they intrenched themselves in a very strong camp. His majesty's head-quarters were at Kirschabern, near Erfurt.

While the two armies were thus situated, Major-General Seydelitz, who occupied the town of Gotha, being informed, on the nineteenth, that a large body of the enemy was coming towards him, and that it consisted of two regiments of Austrian hussars, one regiment of French hussars, and a detachment made up of French grenadiers, troops of the army of the empire, and a great number of Croats and pandours, returned posted himself at some distance. The enemy immediately took possession of the town and castle; but General Seydelitz, having been reinforced, attacked the enemy with such vigour, that he soon obliged them to abandon this new conquest, and to retire, having been persuaded that they were suffering from the spread that the Prussian army was advancing against them, with the king himself in person. The Prussian hussars took a considerable booty on this occasion, and General Seydelitz sent prisoners to the camp, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, four lieutenants, and sixty-two soldiers of the enemy, who had also about one hundred and thirty killed. After this action his Prussian majesty advanced near Eysenach, with a design to attack the combined army; but they were so strongly intrenched, that he found it impracticable. His provisions falling short, he was obliged to retire towards Erfurt, and soon after to Nausburg, on the river Salz; whereupon the combined army marched, and again took possession of Gotha, Erfurt, and Wiernam: which last place, however, they soon after quitted.

§ XV. Upon the King of Prussia's leaving Bernstetl, the Austrians took possession of it on the sixth of September, and made prisoners a Prussian battalion which had been left there. The next day fifteen thousand Austrians attacked two battalions of General Winterfield's troops, being part of the army of the Prince of Schwarzenberg's army, on a high ground on the other side of the Nisa, near Hennersdorff, in the neighbourhood of Goerlitz; and, after being repulsed several times, at last made themselves masters of the place; but the loss was considerable on both sides, but greatest on that of the Prussians, not so much by the number of their slain, which scarcely exceeded that of the Austrians, as by the death of their brave General Winterfield, who, as he was leading up succours to the battalions that were engaged, received a shot from a cannon, of which he died the next following. The Generals Nadadu and Clerici, Count d'Arberg, Colonel Ehrichhausen, and several other persons of distinction, were wounded, and the young Count of Grosstebeck and the Marquis d'Asque killed, on the side of the Austrians, who took six pieces of the Prussian cannons, six pairs of their colours, and made General Kemeke, the Count other's staff-officer, prisoner. In this skirmish, the Prince of Bernven, with the Prussian army under his command, retreated from Goerlitz to Rothenberg, then passed the Quaes at Sygersdorf, from whence he marched to Havlau, in Silesia, and on the first of October, reached Breslaw, without suffering any loss, though the numerous army of the Austrians followed him for some days. Upon his arrival there, he chose a very strong camp on the other side of the Oder, in order to cover the city of Breslaw, to the fortification of which he immediately added several new works. Though neither side had any very signal advantage in this engagement, more than that the Austrians remained masters of the field; yet great rejoicings were made at Prague.
rable loss to his Prussian majesty, who received at the same time the news of this misfortune, and of the Swedes having now actually begun hostilities in Pomerania.

§ XVI. A body of the French, who, let loose against the city of Prussia, by the ever-memorable and shameful convention of Closter-Sven, had entered the territory of Halberstadt and Magdeburg, were worsted at Eisle by a party of six hundred men, under the command of the Hon. John Keeling, who, with the command of Brandenwick which had detached a body of troops with which his Prussian majesty had sent him to defend those countries.

The Prussians took prisoners the Count de Louvigny, one of the French officers, and four hundred soldiers, and made themselves masters of a considerable booty in baggage, &c. with the loss of only two men; and, moreover, a French officer, and forty men, were made prisoners at Halberstadt. Upon this check the French evacuated the country of Halberstadt for a little while, but returning again on the twenty-ninth of September, with a considerable reinforcement from Mareschal Richelieu's army, which he now could easily spare, Prince Ferdinand was obliged to retire to Weissenburg, near the city of Magdeburg. The dangers which had been hitherto kept at a distance from the Prussian dominions, by the surprising activity of their king, now drew nearer, and menacing them. Mareschal Richelieu, with eighty battalions, and a hundred squadrons, entered the country of Halberstadt, and levied immense contributions; whilst the allied army of the French and imperialists, being joined by French detachments under General Richelieu, defeated a regiment of Prussian cavalry near Erfurth.

Marched to Wittenfels, a city in the very centre of Thuringia. The Swedes had actually taken some towns in Pomerania, and were advancing to besiege Stettin; and the Austrians, who had made themselves masters of Liebf-nitz, and a considerable part of Slesia, had now laid siege to Schweinitz, and were preparing to pass the Oder, in order to attack the Prince of Beren in his camp near Hindenburg. This prince was about to make a destructive incursions into Brandenburg; to oppose which his Prussian majesty ordered detachments from all his regiments in those parts to join the militia of the country, and sent the Prince of Anhalt-Dessau from Leipzig, with a body of ten thousand men, to guard Berlin, whilst he himself marched with the troops under his command to Interlbech, on the frontier of Lower Lusatia, to be the more at hand to cover Brandenburg, and preserve the communications of Slesia.

§ XVII. While these precautions were taking, General Haddick, with fifteen or sixteen thousand Austrians, enter-red Brandenburg on the sixteenth of October, and the next day travelled before Beren. In the evening he demanded a contribution of six hundred thousand crowns; but contented himself with two hundred and ten thousand.
The Austrians pillaged two of the suburbs; but before they could do any farther mischief, they were obliged to retire in great haste, at the approach of the Prince of An-halt-Dessau, whose van-guard entered the city in the evening of their departure. This alarm, however, obliged the queen and the royal family of Prussia to remove to Magdeburg on the twenty-third; and the most valuable records were sent to the fort of Spandau, at the confluent of the Havel and the Spree. On the other hand, the unfavorable inhabitants of Leipzig now felt the thy the cruel effects of the power of their new master.— The Prussian commandant in that city had, by order of the king, demanded of them three hundred thousand crowns, a sum far greater than it was in their power to raise. This truth they represented, but in vain. The short time allowed them to furnish their contingents being expired, and all their efforts to comply with this demand having proved infructuous, they were subjected to the rigours of militaty, and being in a state of great distress, their houses were occupied by the soldiery, who seized upon the best apartments, and lived at discretion; but the sum demanded could not be found. Such was the situation of this devastated city. On the fifth of October, an express arrived, with advice that his Prussian majesty would soon be there; and accordingly he arrived a few minutes afterwards, attended by his life-guards. At the same time, a rumour was spread that the city would be delivered up to pillage, which threw the inhabitants into the utmost consternation. Their fears, however, and in that respect, were soon abated by his majesty's declaration, that he was willing to spare the place, upon condition that half the sum required should be immediately paid. All that could be was done was to collect among the merchants, traders, and others, fifty thousand crowns; bills of exchange were drawn for in the name of the King of Prussia, on the five hundred crowns, and hostages were given by way of security, for the payment of thirty thousand more within a time which was agreed on. But still, notwithstanding this, the military orders of the French, under the command of King Lusignan, were observed and executed. That the king, his majesty, had ordered him to defend the place to the last extremity, that he would obey his orders.

The enemy then thought of besieging the city; but, before they could prepare any one implement for that purpose, they were taken by surprise on the part of the King of Prussia, who, judging that his fleet would probably induce them to take the step they did, had, by previous and private orders, collected together all his distant detachments, some of which had been sent in pursuit and now returned by long marches to Leipzig; upon notice of which the city was reached. The Prussian army was under the command of the King of Prussia, who would, had he been reinforced, have been capable of acting with the French, and, in conjunction with them, would have been certain of a victory, if not of a

them, and in open the action by attacking them in the rear. A body of reserve was posted over against Rederow, to fall upon their routed troops, in case they should be defeated, and to prevent their returning to Meresbourg, the only retreat which could then have been left to them. In this situation the King of Prussia resolved to attack them. His majesty had determined to make the attack with one wing only, and the disposition of the enemy made it necessary that it should be the left wing. The very instant the battle was going to begin, his majesty ordered the general who commanded the right wing to decline engaging, to take a proper position in consequence thereof, and above all to retire with great precipitation on the enemy's left wing the right wing of the Prussians, except two or three squadrons, had already marched to the left at full gallop; and being arrived at the place assigned them, they formed over against that of the enemy. They then moved on immediately, the enemy's advanced to meet them, and the charge was very fierce, several regiments of the French coming on with great resolution. The advantage, however, was entirely on the side of the Prussians. The enemy's cavalry being routed, were pursued for a considerable time with great spirit, but having afterwards reached an eminence, which gave them an opportunity of rallying, the Prussian cavalry fell upon them asecond, and gave them some reason to fear that a determined charge would have resulted. This happened at four in the afternoon. Whilst the cavalry of the Prussians charged, their infantry opened. The enemy cannonaded them briskly during this interval, and did not leave them unmolested. In the meantime, the Prussians marched up to their batteries. The batteries were carried one after another, and the enemy were forced to give way, which they did in great confusion. As the left wing of the Prussians advanced, the right changed its position, and was ordered to march at full gallop. They availed themselves of it, by planting it with sixteen pieces of heavy artillery. The fire from thence was partly pointed at the enemy's right, to increase the disorder there, and to prevent their retreat in front, which was excessively gained thereby. At five the victory was decided, the cannonading ceased, and the enemy fell on all sides. They were pursued as long as there was any light to distinguish them, and it may be said, that night alone was the preservation of this army, which had been so formidable in the morning. They took the benefit of the darkness to enter into Fryburgh, and there to repass the Unstrut, which they did on the 29th of October in the night. The King of Prussia set out early in the morning to pursue them with all his cavalry, supported by four battalions of grenadiers, the infantry following them in two columns. The enemy had passed the Unstrut at Fryburgh, when the Prussians arrived on its banks, and as they had burnt the bridge, it became necessary to make another, which, however, was soon done. The cavalry passed first, but could not come up with the enemy till five in the evening, upon the hills of Eckenberg. It was then too late to force them there, for which reason the king thought proper to canton the army in his nearest villages, and to be satisfied with the success his hussars had in taking near three hundred baggage wagons, which they contained. The whole loss of the Prussians, in this important engagement, did not exceed five hundred men killed and wounded. Among the former was General Mencke, and among the latter, the general, that they had in the night of the 29th.

§ XIX. Whilst his Prussian majesty was thus successful against the French and imperialists, the Austrians, who had carefully avoided coming to an open engagement with him, gained ground apace in Silesia. A detachment of their army, under the command of Count Nadasti, had already invested Schweidnitz, and opened the trenches before it on the twenty-sixth of October. The Prussian army had a decisive battle, which they determined to defend the place as long as possible; and accordingly on the thirtieth, they made a sally, in which they killed, wounded, and took prisoners, eight hundred and twenty-five. As the Austrians were largely outnumbered, the French, on the sixth of November, the Austrians began to cannonade the city furiously, and on the eleventh made themselves masters of the ramparts by assault. The garrison, however, having taken shelter in the fortifications, which it was strongly entrenched in the marketplace, retreated thither, and held out till the next day, when they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. After the reduction of this place, General Nadasti, leaving in it a sufficient garrison, with the remainder of his army, advanced on the left of the Oder; the Prince of Bevern, with the main army of the Austrians, under the command of Prince Charles of Lorraine and Marschal Donau, who, whilst he was in siege of Schweidnitz, had invested Breslau on the left of the Oder; the Prince of Bevern defending it on the right, where he was strongly encamped, with his little army, under the cannon of the city. The whole army of the Austrians being now re-assembled, and intelligence having been brought not only of the King of Prussia's late victory near Leipzig, but also that he was advancing to the relief of the Prince of Bevern, it was resolved immediately to attack the last in his intrenchments. Accordingly, on the sixteenth of November, in the morning, the Austrians began a most furious discharge of their cannon, forty of which were twenty-four pounders, and thus continued without ceasing till one, when it was succeeded by a severe fire from small arms, which lasted till five in the evening. The Prussians, with undaunted resolution, stood two of the most violent attacks that were ever made; but at the third, overpowered by numbers, and assailed on both sides, they began to lose ground, and were forced to retire from one intrenchment to another. In this extremity, night coming on, the Prussian generals fearing their intrenchments would be entirely forced, and that they should then be totally defeated, thought proper to retreat. The Prince of Bevern, with the greatest part of the army, retired to an eminence on the banks of the Oder, whilst the rest of the troops threw themselves into Breslau, which they might have defended, in all probability, till the twenty-fourth, their commander-in-chief, the Prince of Bevern, going to reconnoitre the enemy, with only a single groomsman to attend him, fell in among a party of Croats, who took him prisoner. After some days of imprisonment, the Prince of Bevern was brought to Eberstedt, and there, on the twenty-fourth, was ordered to be turned over to the Emperor. It is impossible to state the manner in which he was received, or that he was treated; but it is certain that the latter, when he saw the marks which it asserting his Prussian majesty had sent him express orders not to quell on any account, was so enraged, that he swept at the Duke of Richelieu with him by the fifth of December, to which we shall shortly come to bear.
place by capitulation, one of the articles of which was, that they should not serve against the empress, or her allies, for two years. All the magazines, chests, artillery, and baggage of the Austrian army, which had for some time marched out with all military honours, conducted by General Lestwitz, governor of Breslaw. Though the Austrians sung Te Deum for this victory, they owned that such another would put an end to their army; for it cost them the lives of twelve thousand men; a number almost equal to the whole of the Prussian army before the battle. They had four almost inaccessible intrenchments to force, planted thick with cannon, which fired cartridge shot from nine in the morning till the evening, and the Prussians, when attacked, were never once put into the least confusion. Among the slain on the side of the Austrians, were General Wirwers, and several other officers of distinction. The loss of the Prussians did not much exceed three thousand men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, of which last there were about sixteen hundred. Their general, Kleist, was found dead on the field of battle.

§ XX. The King of Prussia, who, like Caesar, thought nothing was done while anything was left undone, stayed no longer at Rosbach than till the routed forces of the French and imperialists, whom he had defeated there on the fifth of November, were totally dispersed. Then he marched with the greater part of his army to Silesia, and on the twenty-fourth of that month arrived at Naumberg on the Queiss, a little river which runs into the Bobber, having in his route detached Marrelch Kehl, with twenty thousand men, to clear the Austrians, and then to make an irruption into Bohemia, a service which he performed so effectually, as to raise large contributions in the circles of Satt and Leitmeists, and even to give an alarm to Friesland reserved for himself only fifteen thousand men, with whom he advanced, with his usual rapidity, to Barchwitz, where, notwithstanding all that had happened at Schweidnitz and at Breslaw, he was joined by twenty-four thousand men; which, when he ordered Lieut.-General Saxon, part the remains of the army lately commanded by the Prince of Bevern, and part the late garrison of Schweidnitz, which had found means to escape from the Austrians, and accidentally joined their king upon his march.5 With this force, though greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, he resolved to attack the Austrians, who were intrenched at Lissa near Breslaw. On the 14th of December he seized upon their own of Neumark, and upon a considerable magazine, guarded by two regiments of Croats, who retired to a rising ground, where his majesty ordered his horsemen to surround them, and, as a drum and trumpet to summon them to surrender themselves; but, withal, the Austrians, General Zithen fell upon them en masse, and some hundreds of them having been cut in pieces, the rest threw down their arms, begging for quarter on their knees. After this severe battle, and after having distributed to his army the bread prepared for his enemies, he began the next morning his march towards Lissa. General Zithen, who led the vanguard of light-horse, about seven in the morning fell in with a body of Austrian horsemen, and three regiments of Saxon dragons, which were the very best cavalry the enemy had left after the battle of the twenty-second. They had been detached by the Austrians, in order to retard the king's march, and to general their own, till their batters should be completed; for, as they held the small number of the Prussians in contempt, their intention was to have met the king two German miles from their intrenchments. The Austrian cavalry having been vigorously repulsed to a considerable distance, General Zithen perceived that their whole army was forming. He immediately acquainted the king with what he had discovered, and his majesty, after having himself observed the disposition of the enemy, moved his army, so as to guard the enemy's right and rear, he has always been remarkable. The action began by attacki

5. While the Austrians were endeavoring to prevent, on their roads the passage of the victorious Prussians, the victors were already marching. Animating by these tidings, they unanimously rose upon the escort that guarded them, these, which happened to be very small, they entirely massacred. Thus seized, they marched not very certain of their way, in hundreds, and, in their marches, the guard of the Austrian troops, as far as possible, were followed by the same fortune which freed them from being directly to the army commanded by the king himself, which was hastening to their relief, as well as to that of the Prussians, who had been attacked almost at the midst of that army, with his bayonets, shahs,

6. In this attack the Prussians sustained the greatest loss, though the battery was carried as soon almost as they could reach it; then the enemies' artillery, now turned against themselves, played furiously upon them with their own power. From that instant the two wings and the centre of the Prussians continued to drive the enemy before them, advancing all the time with that firm and regular pace for which they had always been remarkable, without ever halting or giving way. The ground which the Austrians occupied was very advantageous, and every circumstance that could render it more so had been improved to the utmost by the diligence and skill of Count Damm, who remembering his former success, was imbued to enter the lists again with his royal antagonist. The Prussians, however, no way terrified by the enemy's success, nor their numbers, went calmly and dreadfully forward. It was almost impossible, being on the first of November, for the Prussian cavalry to act, on account of the impediments of fallen trees, which the enemy had cut down and laid in the field of battle, to retard their approach; but a judicious disposition of their troops was more advantageous. When he first formed his army, he had placed four battalions behind the cavalry of his right wing, foreseeing that General Nadasti, who was placed with a corps of reserve of dragoons, should be led away from his own detachment. It happened as he had foreseen; this general's horse attacked the king's right wing with great fury; but he was received with so severe a fire from the four battalions, that he was obliged to retire in disorder. The enemy continued on in great force, so that they engaged with the enemy on all sides; but at some distance recovered themselves, and rallied three times, animated by their officers, and by the superiority of their numbers. Every time they made a stand, the Prussians attacked them with redoubled vigour, and, for a moment, seemed to overawe them. But, what was the might, the enemy, still retreating, fell into disorder. Their two wings fled in confusion; one of them, closely pressed by the king, retired towards Breslaw, and took shelter under the cannon of that city; the other, pursued by the greatest part of the light cavalry, took their flight towards Czath and Schweidnitz. Six thousand Austrians fell in this engagement, and the Prussians, who had only five hundred men killed, and two thousand wounded, made up of ten thousand of the enemy prisoners, among whom were two hundred and ninety-one officers. They took also a hundred and sixteen cannon, fire-arms, and about fifteen thousand wagons of ammunition and baggage. The campaign of that followed this victory declared its importance. Future ages will read with astonishment, that the same prince, who but a few months before seemed on the verge of inevitable ruin, merely by the dint of his own abilities, without the assistance of any friend whatever, with troops perpetually harassed by long and painful marches and by continual skirmishes and battles, not only retrieved his affairs, which almost every one, except himself, thought past redress; but in the midst of winter, in countries where it was judged next to impossible for any troops to keep the field at that season, he was able to conquer the united forces of France and the empire at the battle of Breslaw, on the fifth of November. The victory of the very next month, with a great part of the same army, was at Lissa, where he again triumphed over all the powers of the house of Austria. Pursuing his advantage he immediately invested Breslaw, and within two days after this great victory every thing was in readiness to besiege it in form. His troops, flushed with success, were at first at first for storming it, but the king, knowing the strength of the garrison, which consisted of upwards of thirteen thousand men, and considering the situation of the place, he had already undertaken, and the fatal consequences that might have ensued, was persuaded to employ a new plan, and to commence operations by the disembarkation of an army at the estuary of the estuary of — .
enough, should they fail of success in this attempt, ordered the approaches to be carried on in the usual form. His commands were obeyed, and Breslaw surrendered to him on the twentieth of December in the morning. The garrison, of which ten thousand bore arms, and between three and four thousand lay sick or wounded, were made prisoners of war. Fourteen of these prisoners were officers of high rank. The military chest, a vast treasure, with every peculiarity of ceremony, was carried off by the victors, who lost only about twenty men in their approaches. During the siege, a magazine of powder was set on fire by a bomb, which occasioned great confusion among the besieged. The magazine had an area of fifty-eight, and erected two large batteries, which kept a continual fire upon the town. The artillery of the besiegers consisted of three hundred pieces of cannon, of different dimensions, and equipped with guns, and ammunition, such as we have never heard of in former campaigns. On the night of the fourteenth, the Prussians carried one of the chief works by assault, and lodged themselves therein: the commandant capitulated the next day, with the garrison, which was now greatly reduced in number, being not half of what it amounted to at the beginning of the blockade. Thus, all the parts of Silesia, which the King of Prussia had lost by one unfortunate fall, fell again into his possession; and his losses, which but a few months before seemed irretrievable, were now re-established upon a firmer basis than ever. The Prussian parties not only repossessed themselves of those parts of Silesia which belonged to their king, but penetrated into the Austrian division, reduced Jagerndorf, Troppau, Trenchet, and several other places, and left the empress-queen scarce any footing in that country, in which, in a few days before, she reckoned her dominion perfectly established. § XXI. The Swedes, after many debates between their king and senate, had at length resolved upon one open declaration against the King of Prussia, and, in consequence of that declaration, the siege of Breslaw was raised; and so that by the end of August, their army in that country amounted to twenty-five thousand men. Their first act of hostility was the seizure of Anclam and Demmin, two towns in the province of Pomerania, which, at that time, held the principal design was levelled. But before they proceeded farther, General Hamilton, their commander, by way of justifying the conduct of his master, published a declaration, setting forth, that the King of Sweden, as a guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, could not help sending his troops into the upper part of the duchy of Pomerania belonging to the King of Prussia; and that, therefore, all the officers appointed to receive the public revenue in that country must hand over their money to them, and to their hands to him, who was commissioned to receive it for his Swedish majesty: that, moreover, an exact account was required, within eight days, of the revenues of the country; but that, no matter how much contributions would be demanded of the inhabitants, who might rest assured that the Swedish troops should observe the strictest discipline. After this declaration, they attacked the little fortress of Pomenania, but, owing to the principal garrison, who had joined the Swedes with six thousand of their troops, now found cause to repent of their forwardness, being left quite exposed to the resentment of the victors, who chastised them with the most severe executions. The army of the Swedes, though they did not fight a battle, was, by sickness, desertion, and other accidents, reduced to half the number it consisted of when they took the field. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, soon after his territories were invaded by the French, in consequence of their advances in the affair of Hastenbeck, had applied to the King of Sweden, as one of the guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia, desiring him to employ his good offices with the Court of France, to obtain a more favourable Mediation for his dominions: but his Swedish majesty, by the advice of the senate, thought proper to refuse complying with this request, alleging, that as the crown of Sweden was one of his dominions, to make such an offer would be highly improper to take such a step, in favour of a prince who had not only broke the laws and constitutions of the empire, in refusing to furnish his contingent, but had even attacked, with his troops, a power known to be its declared enemy. The Aulick council too, seeing, or 4 Such was the rigour of the season; that nine hundreds of the soldiers dropped down dead on their march, not only from the severity of the cold. The Germans lie under the general reproach of paying very little regard to the lives of their soldiers, and indeed this practice of winter campaigns, in such a cold country, bareth very little regard to the dictates of humanity. pretending to see, the behaviour of the landgrave in the same light, issued a decree against his serene highness towards the end of this year. The court of Great Britain, justly displeased with the Dutch, on account of the extreme facility with which they had granted the French a free passage through Namur and Maastricht for their provisions, ammunition, and military stores, and the promises which had been made to put the hands of the French, which had before been properly renominated against that step, before it was absolutely resolved on, or at least declared to be so: but in vain; a pernicious answer being all the satisfaction that was given. The tenacious and indefatigable with which the States-General had since seen Ostend and Nieuport put into the hands of the French, drew upon their high mightinesses a further remonstrance, which was delivered to them on the twenty-eighth of November of this year by Colonel yerke, his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiary at the Hague, in the following terms, well calculated to awaken them a due sense of their own danger, as well as to enrage the injustice of the proceedings of the house of Austria:—

Concerning the critical situation which Europe had been in during the course of this year, in consequence of measures concerted to embroil all Europe, the King of Great Britain was willing to flatter himself that this court of Vienna and the sale of regard to the circumstantial conduct observed by your high mightinesses, would have at least informed you of the changes they have thought proper to make in the Austrian Netherlands.

It was at least surprize our knowledge, that within any previous consent of yours, and almost without giving you any notice, the court of Vienna had thought proper to put the towns of Ostend and Nieuport into the hands of the French troops, and to withdraw their own, as well as the Dutch, from these three immense and tend thither a formidable quantity of both. The conduct of the court of Vienna towards his majesty is indeed so unattainable and so extraordinary, that it is difficult to find words to express it: but whatever fallacious pretences they may have made use of to palliate her behaviour towards England, it does not appear that they can be extended so far as to excuse the infringement, in concert with France, of the most solemn treaties between her and your high mightinesses. The king never doubted that your high mightinesses would have made proper representations to the two courts newly allied, to demonstrate the injustice of such a proceeding; and the danger that might afterwards result from it. Your high mightinesses will have perceived that your silence on the first step encouraged the two courts, newly allied, to attempt others; and who can say where they will stop? The pretext at first was, the necessity of securing the provinces of the trophe of the war kindled in the empire, and the necessity for providing for the safety of those important places, and afterwards of their imaginary danger from England. But, high mightinesses, it is but too true that the two great powers, who have taken these measures in concert, have other projects in view, and have made new regulations with regard to that country, which cannot but alarm the neighbouring states. The late demand made to your high mightinesses, of a passage for a large train of warlike implements through some of the barrier towns, in order to be sent to Ostend and Nieuport, could not fail to awaken the king's attention. The sincere friendship and parity of interests of Great Britain and Holland, and the close ties that should no longer keep silence, lest, in the issue, it should be considered as a tacit consent, and as a renunciation of all our rights. The king commands me, therefore, to recall to your high mightinesses the two-fold right you have acquired to keep the Austrian Netherlands under the government of the house of Austria; and that no other has a title to make the least alteration therein, without the consent of your high mightinesses. None of the new alliances have resolved to set aside all prior treaties, and to dispose at pleasure of every thing that may suit their private interest.

In the treaty between your high mightinesses and the crown of France, signed at Utrecht, on the eleventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and thirteen, in the fifth article, are these words: "It is also agreed, that no province, town, or city of the said Netherlands, or of those which are given up by his catholic majesty, shall ever be ceded, transferred, or given, or shall ever devolve, to the French, or their successors in the crown, or the house or line of France, either by virtue of any gift, exchange, marriage-contract, succession by will, or by any other title whatever, to the power and authority of the most Christian king, or of any his successors in the crown, or the house or line of France." In the barrier treaty these stipulations are repeated in the first article: "His imperial and catholic majesty promises and engages, that no province, city, town, fortress, or territory, of the said country, shall be ceded, transferred, given, or devolved to the crown of France, or to any other but the successor of the German dominions of the house of Austria, either by donation, sale, exchange, marriage-contract, heritage, testamentary succession, nor under any other pretext whatsoever: so that no province, town, fortress, or territory of the said Netherlands shall ever be subject to any other prince, but to the successor of the States of the house of Austria alone, through his imperial and catholic majesty in treaty to the said lords the States-general.

A bare reading of these two articles is sufficient to evidence all that I have just represented to your high mightinesses; and whatever other pretences the court of Vienna may have put in the way to cover the enforcement of these treaties, the thing remains, nevertheless, evident, whilst these two courts are unable to prove that the towns of Ostend and Nieuport are not actually in the power of France. If their designs are just, or sincere, if the successions once imminent, lend thither a formidable quantity of both. The conduct of the court of Vienna towards his majesty is indeed so unattainable and so extraordinary, that it is difficult to find words to express it: but whatever fallacious pretences they may have made use of to palliate her behaviour towards England, it does not appear that they can be extended so far as to excuse the infringement, in concert with France, of the most solemn treaties between her and your high mightinesses. The king never doubted that your high mightinesses would have made proper representations to the two courts newly allied, to demonstrate the injustice of such a proceeding; and the danger that might afterwards result from it. Your high mightinesses will have perceived that your silence on the first step encouraged the two courts, newly allied, to attempt others; and who can say where they will stop? The pretext at first was, the necessity of securing the provinces of the trophe of the war kindled in the empire, and the necessity for providing for the safety of those important places, and afterwards of their imaginary danger from England. But, high mightinesses, it is but too true that the two great powers, who have taken these measures in concert, have other projects in view, and have made new regulations with regard to that country, which cannot but alarm the neighbouring states. The late demand made to your high mightinesses, of a passage for a large train of warlike implements through some of the barrier towns, in order to be sent to Ostend and Nieuport, could not fail to awaken the king's attention. The sincere friendship and parity of interests of Great Britain and Holland, and the close ties that should no longer keep silence, lest, in the issue, it should be considered as a tacit consent, and as a renunciation of all our rights. The king commands me, therefore, to recall to your high mightinesses the two-fold right you have acquired to keep the Austrian Netherlands under the government of the house of Austria; and that no other has a title to make the least alteration therein, without the consent of your high mightinesses. None of the new alliances have resolved to set aside all prior treaties, and to dispose at pleasure of every thing that may suit their private interest.

The letter, which was written in French, has been translated for you.
declaration was delivered to the Prussian resident at London, which appears to have been calculated as an answer to the letter. In that paper the King of Great Britain declared, that the overtures made by his majesty's electoral ministers in Germany, touching the checks received on the continent, should have no influence on his majesty as king; that he saw, in the same light as before, the permanent leverage of existing pacts with France and Versailles, threatening a subversion of the whole system of public liberty, and of the independence of the European powers: that he considered as a fatal consequence of this declared determination, that to alienate the attention of the continent, Vienna of the ports in the Netherlands to France in such a critical situation, and contrary to the faith of the most solemn treaties: that whatever might be the success of his arms, his majesty was determined to act in constant concert with the King of Prussia in employing the most scrupulous means to frustrate the unjust and oppressive designs of the common enemies. He concluded with assuring the King of Prussia, that the British crown would continue to fulfill, with the greatest punctuality, its engagements with his Prussian majesty, and to support him with firmness and vigour. Such a representation could not fail of being agreeable to a prince, who, at this juncture, stood in need of all the aid which he could securely depend, not only on the good faith of an English ministry, but also on the good plighted of the British nation, which, like an indulgent nurse, hath always presented the neglected infant, in the hands of its master, and has, when it pretended to consider and canvass events without prejudice and prepossession, could not help ownins their surprise, at hearing an alliance stigmatized as pernicious to the system of the British crown, the independence of the European powers, as they remembered that this alliance was the effect of necessity, to which the house of Austria was reduced, for its own preservation; reduced, as his friends and party affirm, by those very potentates that now reside here, with whom they have the same connections.

§ XXV. His Britannic majesty was resolved that the King of Prussia should have no cause to complain of his indulgence, whatever reasons he had to explain against the convention of Closter-Seven, which could not, in the judgment of the British ministry, be considered by his majesty's electoral majesty, as a very scandalous capitulation, as much as he disapproved of the conduct, in consequence of which, forty thousand men were so shamefully disarmed, and lost to his service. These stipulations also met with a very unfavourable reception in England, where the motions of the allied army, in their retreat before the enemy, were very freely censured, and some great names exposed to the ridicule of the nation, who had been actually disarmed; which was dis sus- gular in itself, and so important in its consequences, attracted the attention of the privy council, where it is said to have been canvassed with great warmth and animosity of tone; and had the convention been formally restricted by peremptory orders from the regency of Hanover; and they were reported to have used remembrances in their defence. In all probability, every circumstance of the dispute was not explained to the satisfaction of all parties, inasmuch as that great commander quitted the harvest of military glory, and, like another Cincinnatus, retired to his plough. The convention of Closter-Seven was equally disagreeable to the courts of London and Versailles. The former saw the elector of Hanover left by this capitulation, at the mercy of the enemy, who had taken possession of the whole country, seized the revenues, exacted contributions, and charged the whole form of a gainer, that, in a little time of his most illustrious majesty; while the French army, which had been employed in opposing the Hanoverians, was now at liberty to throw their additional force into the scale against the British crown. The latter, who, in the letter of the British ministry, rendered the verge of destruction. On the other hand, the French ministry thought their general had granted too favourable terms to a body of forces, whom he had cooped up in such a manner, that, in a little time of his most illustrious majesty, the French army, which had been employed in opposing the Hanoverians, was now at liberty to throw their additional force into the scale against the British crown. The latter, who, in the letter of the British ministry, rendered the verge of destruction. On the other hand, the French ministry thought their general had granted too favourable terms to a body of forces, whom he had cooped up in such a manner, that, in a little time of his most illustrious majesty, rendered the verge of destruction. They, therefore, determined, either to provoke the Hanoverians by ill usage to an infliction of the treaty, or, should that found impracticable, recourse to an imperfect convention, established without proper authority. Both expedients were used without reserve. They were so sooner informed of the capitulation than they refused to acknowledge its validity, except on condition that the Hanoverian troops should formally en- dorse to desist from all service against France and her allies during the present war, and be disarmed on their return to their own country. At the same time her general, who commanded in the electorate, exhausted the country, by levying exorbitant taxes, and committed outrages as degraded his own dignity, and reflected disgrace on the character of his nation. The court of London, to make a merit of necessity, affected to consider the con- ventional act as an additional motive to the conclusion of a negociation that might terminate in a general peace, and proposals were offered for that purpose; but the French ministry kept aloof, and seemed resolved that the elec- torate of Hanover should be annexed to their king's de- monstrations. At last they were bent upon keeping that precious depositum, which, in the plan of a general paci- fication, they imagined would counterbalance any advantage that Great Britain might obtain in other parts of the world. Had they been enabled to keep this deposit, the kingdom of Great Britain would have saved about twenty millions of money, together with the lives of her best sol- diers; and Westphalia would have continued to enjoy all the blessings of peace for good. But the British ministry, in England's tenderness for Hanover was one of the chief sources of the misfortunes which befell the electorate. He could not hear the thoughts of seeing it, even for a season, in the hands of the enemy; and his own particular were reinforced by the pressing remonstrances of the Prussian monarch, whom, at this juncture, he thought it dangerous to disoblige. Actuated by these motives, he was pleased with the establishment of the Hanoverians pal- pably constrained, because the violation unbound his hands, and enabled him, consistently with good faith, to take effectual steps for the assistance of his ally, and the recovery of his own dominions. He, therefore, in quality of Elector of Brunswick-Lunebourg, and in the capacity of a friend, observing, "That his royal highness the Duke of Cumberland had, on his part, honestly fulfilled all the conditions of the convention; but the Duke de Richelieu demanded that the troops should enter the country, as specified above, and lay down their arms; although it was expressly stipulated in the convention, that they should not be regarded as prisoners of war, under which quality alone they could be disarmed; that the French court con- tended to treat the convention as a military regulation only; and, indeed, it was originally nothing more; but as they had expressly disowned its validity, and a negociation had been actually disarmed, which, had been formally upon certain conditions, though the French general would never answer categorically, but waited always for fresh instructions from Versailles, the nature of that act was not totally changed, nor was it at first apprehended, that general and general, was now become a matter of state between the two courts of London and Versailles; that, however hard the conditions of the convention appeared to be for the troops of Hanover, his Britannic majesty would have acquiesced with them, had not the French glaringly discovered their design of totally ruining his army and his dominions; and, by the most outrageous conduct, freed his Britannic majesty from every obligation under which he had been bound by the convention; that, in the midst of the arms, the most open hostilities had been committed; the castle of Schonfeld was been forcibly seized and pillaged, and the garrison made prisoners of war; the prisoners made by the French before the con- vention had not been restored, according to an express article stipulated between the generals, though it had been fulfilled on the part of the elector, by the immediate release of the French prisoners made before the con- vention; from which the French troops were excluded by mutual agreement, had been summoned, on pain of military execution, to appear before the French commissary, and a ship was had that, when the French army had approached to themselves part of those magazines, which, by express agreement, were destined for the use of the electoral troops; and they had seized the houses, revenue, and corn belonging to the King of Eng- land in the city of Bremen, in violation of their engagement.

to consider that city as a place absolutely free and neutral. He took notice, that they had proceeded to menaces unheard of among civilized people, of burning, sackling, and destroying every thing that fell in their way, should the least hesitation be made in executing the convention according to their interpretation." Such were the professed considerations that deterred his Britannic majesty to recommend the Duke de Richelieu's conduct, which he disapproved, and had recourse to arms for the relief of his subjects and allies. It was in consequence of this determination that he conferred the command of his electoral army on Prince Frederick of Brunswick, brother to the Duke of that name, who was by nature and by profession a master of that art which had been established under the Duke of Cumberland and himself, as French general; that he was blinded so far by his confidence in the good faith of the Elector of Hanover, who had signed that convention, as to be persuaded that he and his army were so placed as to be distributed into winter-quarters, which had been assigned them by the agreement; but his eyes were at last opened, by repeated advices which he had received from several of his generals, that the Hanoverians intended to infringe those articles which ought to be sacred and inviolable: he affirmed, the king his master was still willing to give fresh proofs of his moderation, and his desire to spare the effusion of human blood: with that view he desisted to his serene highness, in the name of his most Christian majesty, that he persisted in his resolution of fulfiling exactly all the points of the convention, provided they should be equally observed by the Hanoverian arms; but he could not help approving his serene highness, that if this army should take any equivocal step, and still more, should it commit any act of hostility, he would then push matters to the last extremity, looking upon himself as authorized so to do by the rules of war: that he would set fire to all palaces, houses, and gardens; sack all the towns and villages, without sparing the most inaccessible cottage, and subject the country to all the horrors of war and devastation. He would not leave the Elector of Hanover these particulars, and begged he would not lay him under the necessity of taking steps so contrary to his own personal character, as well as to the natural humanity of the French nation. To this latter, and was seconded by the Count de Lynsen, the Danish ambassador, who had mediated the convention, Prince Frederick returned a very laconic answer, intimating that he would give the Duke de Richelieu his answer in person at the head of his army. At this particular juncture, the French general was disposed to abide by the original articles of the convention, rather than draw upon himself the hostilities of an army which he knew to be brave, resolute, and well appointed, and which he saw at present animated with an eagerness of revenge, and in the distance had sustained by the capitation, as well as of relieving their country from the grievous oppression under which it groaned.

§ XXVI. About the latter end of November the Hanoverian army was wholly assembled at Stade, under the auspices of Prince Frederick, who resolved, without delay, to drive the French from the electorate, whether they resided in arms, or in the peace. Part of the rear, consisting of two thousand men, was in their march back to Zell, attacked in the bailiwick of Ebstorf, and entirely defeated by General Schuylenbourg; and, in a few days after this accident, they took possession of the town, and captured and reduced the Hanoverians, commanded by General Zastrow, remained masters of the field. These petty advantages served to encourage the allies, and put them in possession of Lunenburg, Zell, and part of the Brunswick dominions, which the enemy were obliged to abandon. The operations of Prince Frederick, however, were retarded by the resolution and obstinate perseverance of the French officer who commanded the garrison of Harburg. When the Hanoverian troops made themselves masters of the town, he retired into the castle, which he held out against a considerable detachment of the allied army. When, however, the fortifications being entirely demolished, he surrendered upon capitulation. On the sixth day of December, Prince Frederick began his march towards Zell, where the French army had taken post, under the command of the Duke de Richelieu. The Hanoverians, called in his advanced parties, abandoned several magazines, burned all the farm-houses and buildings belonging to the sheep walks of his Britannic majesty, with the greatest regard to his majesty's property; the Prince Frederick on this subject; reduced the suburbs of Zell to ashes, after having allowed his men to plunder the houses, and even set fire to the orphan-hospital, in which a great number of helpless children are said to have perished. One cannot, without horror, reflect upon such brutal acts of inhumanity. The French troops, so divers occasions, and in different parts of the empire, acted tragedies of the most base kind, acting in the same manner with all the character of a nation famed for sentiment and civility. The Hanoverians having advanced within a league of Zell, the two armies began to cannonade each other; the French troops, posted on the right of the Aller, burned their magazins, as they continued to ravage the countryside, and strong intrenched, that Prince Frederick could not attempt the river, the passes of which were strongly guarded by the enemy. At the same time his troops were exposed to great hardships, as they were detained in the same quarters; the Hanoverians, he retreated to Ulten and Lannenburg, where his army was put into winter-quarters, and executed several small enterprises by detachment, while the French general fixed his head-quarters in the city of Hanover, his cantonments extending as far as Zell, in the neighbourhood of which many sharp skirmishes were fought from the out-parties with various success. Their imperial majesties were no sooner apprized of these transgressions, which they considered as infractions of the convention, than they sent an intimation to the Baron de Steinberg, minister from the King of Great Britain as Elector of Hanover, that he should appear no more at court, or confer with his ministers; and that his residence at Vienna, as he might easily conceive, could not be very agreeable: in consequence of which message he retired, after having obtained the necessary passports for his departure. The chagrin occasioned at the court of Vienna by this intimation was equalled by the account of the淀粉 of the Austrian government, again, was, in some measure, alleviated by the certain tidings received from Petersburg, that the czarina had signed her accession in form to the treaty between the courts of Austria and France, and that the king of the house of Bourbon de Liedé had proceeded to Lyons.

§ XXVII. In closing our account of this year's transactions on the continent, we may observe, that on the sixteenth day of November the Queen of Poland died at Berlin of an apoplexy, supposed to be occasioned by the shock she received on hearing that the French were totally defeated at Rosbach. She was a lady of exemplary virtue and purity, whose constitution had been broken by grief and anxiety consequent from the distress of her own family, as well as from the distress of her misfury to which she was exposed. With respect to the European powers that were not actually engaged as principals in the war, they seemed industriously to avoid every step that might be construed a deviation from the most scrupulous neutrality. The States-general proceeded with great circumspection, in the middle course, between two powerful neighbours, equally jealous and formidable; and the King of Spain was gratified for this forbearance, as he was anxious to avoid a belligerent powers, implying that his subjects should pursue their commerce at sea without molestation, provided they should not transport those articles of merchandise which were of a contrary tendency, and the operations at sea during the course of this year, either in Europe or America, were far from being decisive or important. The commerce of Great Britain sustained considerable damage from the activity and success of French privateers, of which a great number had been equipped in the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe. The Green-wich ship of war, mounted with fifty guns, and a frigate of twenty, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with a very considerable number of trading vessels. On the other hand, the French, from the same motives as those which inspired themselves with equal vigilance and valour. The Duc d'Anspautane, a large ship of fifty guns, was taken in the month of June by two British ships of war, after a severe engagement; and about the same time, the Aquillon, of nearly the same force, was driven ashore and destroyed near Brest, by the Antelope, one of the British cruisers. A French frigate of twenty-six guns, called the Emeralda, was taken in the month of July, and another, mounted with an English ship of inferior force, under the command of Captain Gilchrist, a gallant and alert officer, who, in the sequel, signified himself on divers occasions, by very extraordinary acts of valour. All the sea-officers seemed to be accustomed with a noble emulation to distinguish themselves in the service of their country, and the spirit descended even to the captains of privateers, who, instead of imitating the former commanders of that class, in avoiding ships of force, and retaining their whole attention on advantageous prizes, now encountered the armed ships of the enemy, and fought with the most obstinate valour in the pursuit of national glory.

§ XXVIII. These events cannot afford a more remarkable instance of desperate courage than that which was exerted in December of the preceding year, by the officers and crew of an English privateer, called the Terrible, under the command of Captain Rettenmeyer. They were furnished with twenty-six carridge guns, and manned with two hundred sailors. On the twenty-third day of the month he engaged and made prize of a large French ship from the Island of Martinique, after an obstinate battle in which he lost his own brass, and amongst them, that most gallant and renowned privateer of the line of battle, a prize that the late signal success in Germany had given a happy turn to affairs, which it was incumbent on them to improve; and that, in such a critical conjuncture, the eyes of all Europe were upon them. He particularly directed his men to be on the alert, and that the King of Prussia might be supported in such a manner as his magnanimity and active zeal for the common cause appeared to deserve. To the Commons he expressed his concern, that the large supplies they had already granted did not produce all the good fruits they had reason to expect; but he had so great a reliance on their wisdom, as not to doubt of their perseverance. He only desired such supplies as should be necessary for the public service; and whatever they might depend upon, that the best and most faithful economy should be used. He took notice of that spirit of disorder which had shown itself among the common people in some parts of this kingdom, which he had calculated upon to draw from his countrymen that spirit of confidence, and pressing such abuses, and for maintaining the laws and lawful authority. He concluded with observing, that without such supplies, the state of the nation, and all that was dear to the nation, as well as to the reducing their enemies to reason, as union and harmony among themselves. The time was, when every paragraph of this oration, which the reader will perceive is not remarkable for its elegance and propriety, would have been censured and impeached by the country party in the House of Commons. They would have imputed the bad success of the war to the indiscretion of the ministry, in taking preposterous measures, and appointing commanders unequal to the service. They would have inquired in what manner the protestant religion was endangered; and if it was, how it could be preserved or promoted by adhering to adhering to the principles upon which the constitution of the community was maintained. They would have observed, that the first and principal protestant country of the empire. They would have started doubts with respect to the late signal success in Germany, and hinted, that it would only serve to destroy the balance of affairs; and that they would have owned that the eyes of all Europe were upon them, and drawn this consequence, that it therefore belonged to them to act with the more delicacy and caution in discharge of the sacred trust reposed in them by their constituents; a trust which they had done nothing to have that trust of the nation, and that the nation, and that the government was safe and sufficiently discharged, should they rush precipitately into the destructive measures of a rash and prodigious step, squander away the wealth of the nation, and add to the grievous circumstances under which it groaned, in support of Detz, whose lieutenant was called Dervil, and who had one Ghent for surgeons.
of connections and alliances that were equally foreign to her considerations, and consequent to her interest. They would have investigated that cause which was so warmly recommended for support, and pretended to discover that it was a cause in which Great Britain ought to have had no concern, and which must be the certain and utmost least prospect of advantage. They would have varied essentially in their opinions of the necessary supplies, from the sentiments of those who prepared the estimates, and even declared some doubts about the economy to be used in managing the national expense; finally, they would have represented the impossibility of union between the two parties, one of which seemed bent upon reducing the utmost cost of the service, and the other determined to have the strain thrown used to flow from an opposition, and to consist of difficulty and disappointed ambition. But that malignant spirit was now happily extinguished. The voice of the sovereign was adored as the oracle of divinity, and those happy days were now approaching that saw the Commons pour their treasures, in support of a German prince, with such a generous hand, that posterity will be amazed at their liberality.

A.D. 1758. § XXX. To the speech of his majesty the House of Lords returned an address, in such terms of complacency as had long distinguished that illustrious assembly. The Commons expressed their approbation with equal enthusiasm, and only the objection made was to the form or nature of the address, though one gentleman, equally independent in his mind and fortune, took exceptions to some of the measures which had been lately proposed. Their complaint was more substantial in the resolution of the House, as soon as the two great committees of supply were appointed. They granted for the sea-service of the ensuing year sixty thousand men, including fourteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five marines; and the standing army, consisting four thousand invalids, was fixed at fifty-three thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven effective men, commission and non-commission officers included. For the maintenance of these forces, by sea and land, the charge of guards and garrisons, at home and abroad, the expense of the ordnance, and in order to make good the sum which had been issued by his majesty's orders in pursuance of the address from the Commons, they now allotted four millions, twenty-two thousand, eight hundred and seven pounds, seven shillings, and three pence. They unanimously granted, as a present supply in the then critical exigency, towards enabling his majesty to maintain and keep together those forces formed last year in his electoral dominions, and again put in motion, and actually employed against the common enemy, in concert with the King of Prussia, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds; for the ordnance, by way of reinforcement, including bales, they allowed two hundred twenty-four thousand four hundred twenty-one pounds, five shillings, and eight pence: towards the building and support of the three hospitals for seamen at Gosport, Plymouth, and Greenwich, thirty thousand pounds; for the reduced officers of the land-forces and marines, pensions to the widows of officers, and other such military contingencies, forty thousand nine hundred and twenty-six pounds, seventeen shillings, and eleven pence: towards building, rebuilding, and repairs of his majesty's ships for the ensuing year, the sum of two hundred thousand pounds; for defraying the charge of two thousand one hundred and twenty horse, and nine thousand nine hundred infantry, together with the general and staff officers, the officers of the hospital and the train of artillery, being the troops of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel in the pay of Great Britain, for sixty days, together with the sum for their maintenance at that time, pursuant to thirty-eight thousand three hundred and sixty pounds, nineteen shillings, and ten pence three farthings.

To the foundling hospital they gave forty thousand pounds, for the maintenance and education of deserted young children, as well as for the reception of all such as should be presented under a certain age, to be limited by the governors and guardians of that charity. Three hundred thousand pounds were given towards discharging the debt of the navy, and two hundred thousand pounds for making up the deficiency of the grants for the service of the preceding year. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel was, moreover, gratified with the further sum of two hundred and three thousand five hundred and thirty-six pounds, four shillings, and nine pence farthing, for the maintenance of his forces, and the remainder of his subjects, as well as for the maintenance of his foot and horse guards, for the sum of one thousand four hundred and fifty pounds for enabling his majesty to make good his engagements with the King of Prussia, pursuant to a convention lately concluded with that potentate. For defraying the charges of the troops of his majesty in the province of Milford, they allotted nine thousand nine hundred and fifteen pounds, thousands, ten shillings, and two pence, to defray the charges of forage, bread-waggons, train of artillery, provisions, wood, straw, and all other extraordinary expenses, contingent upon the services, however, incurred, or to be incurred, on account of his majesty's army, consisting of thirty-eight thousand men, actually employed against the common enemy, in concert with the King of Prussia, in the defence of Hanover.

For the extraordinary expenses of the land-forces, and other services, incurred to the course of the last year, and not provided for by parliament, they allowed one hundred sixty-five thousand, four hundred fifty-four pounds, fifteen shillings, and one farthing. They provided two hundred thousand pounds to enable his majesty to defray the like sum raised in pursuance of an act made in the last session of parliament, and charged upon the first aids and supplies to be granted in the coming year; seventeen thousand pounds were bestowed on the out-pensioners of Chelsea hospital; above twenty thousand for the expense of maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia; and for reimbursing to the province of Massachusetts and the colony of Connecticut, their expense in furnishing provisions and stores to the troops raised by them, for his majesty's service, in the campaign of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, the sum of forty-one thousand one hundred seventeen pounds, seven shillings, and sixpence halfpenny; to be applied towards the rebuilding of London bridge, carrying on the works for fortifying and securing the harbour of Milford, and repairing the fortifications of the same; for fifty thousand pounds they allotted twenty-nine thousand pounds. The East India company were indulged with twenty thousand pounds on account, towards enabling them to defray the expense of a man-of-war and all that expense, including the pay of them in lieu of the battle of his majesty's forces withdrawn from those settlements: the sum of ten thousand pounds was given as usual, for maintaining and supporting the British forts and settlements on the coast of Africa; and eleven thousand four hundred and fifty pounds were granted as an augmentation to the salaries of the judges in the superior courts of judicature. They likewise provided one hundred thousand pounds for defraying the charge of pay and clothing to the militia, and advanced eight hundred thousand pounds, to enable his majesty to defray any extraordinary expenses of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the service of the current year; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to disappoint or defeat any enterprises or designs of his enemies, as the exigency of his affairs might require. The whole supplies of this session amounted to the enormous sum of ten millions four hundred and eighty thousand pounds, about ninety-six thousand, eight hundred and fifty pounds, and one penny. Nothing could so plainly demonstrate the implicit confidence which the parliament, at this juncture, reposed in the sovereign and the ministry, as their conduct in granting such liberal supplies, great part of which were bestowed in favour of our allies, whom the British nation thus generously paid for fighting their own battles. Besides the sum of one million eight hundred sixty-one thousand eight hundred ninety-seven pounds, seven shillings, and four pence, there were allotted two hundred and forty thousand pounds for the support of the continental connexions, a sum consissiderably exceeding the whole of the revenue raised in the reign of Charles the Second, and what part of the sum granted to the first adventurers might be applied to the same use, the article might not improperly be swelled with the vast expense incurred by expeditions to the coast of France; the chief, if not sole, design of which seemed to be a diversion in favour of the nation's allies and subjects, for belonging to that nation; and that if one third part of the money, annually inqulled in the German vortis, had been employed in augmenting the naval forces of England, and those forces properly exerted, not only the British nation but mankind might have been able to steer from the harbours of France; all her colonies in the West Indies would have fallen an easy prey to the arms of Great Britain; and, thus cut off from the resource of commerce, she must have been content to embrace such terms of peace as the victor should have thought proper to prescribe.

§ XXXI. The funds established by the committee of ways and means, in order to realize those articles of supply, had been advanced by the sinking fund, the sum remaining in the exchequer, produced from the sinking fund, four millions five hundred thousand pounds to be raised by annuities, at three pounds ten shillings per cent. per annum, and five hundred thousand pounds by a lottery, attended with annuities redeemable by parliament, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum. these annuities to be transferable at the bank of England, and charged upon a fund to be established in this session of parliament for payment thereof, and for which the sinking fund should be a collateral security—one million six hundred and six thousand and seventy-five pounds, one penny, one farthing, issued and applied out of sums remaining in the exchequer, the receipts from the surpluses, excesses, and other revenues composing the sinking fund—a tax of one shilling in the pound to be annually paid from all salaries, fees, and perquisites of the kingdom, as well as from every kind of property and other gratuities payable out of any revenues belonging to his majesty in Great Britain, exceeding the yearly value of one hundred pounds—an imposition of one shilling annually upon every dwelling-house inhabited within the kingdom of Great Britain, over and above all other duties already chargeable upon them, to commence from the fifth day of April—an additional tax of sixpence yearly for every window or light in every dwelling-house inhabited in Britain which shall contain fifteen windows or upwards; a continuation of certain acts near expiring, with respect to the duties payable on foreign sail-cloth imported into Great Britain, the exportation of British gunpowder, the security and encouraging the trade of his majesty's sugar colonies in America, and the encouraging the importers and proprietors of spirits from the British sugar plantations to land them before payment of the duties of excise; to the above, might be added an own expense—an annual tax of forty shillings for a licence to be taken out by every person trading in, selling, or vending gold or silver plate, in lieu of the duty of sixpence per ounce on all silver plate, made or wrought, or which ought to be made or wrought in, into the kingdom, which duty now ceased and determined—a cessation of all drawbacks payable on the exportation of silver plate—a law prohibiting all persons from selling, by retail, any sweet or made wines, without licence, and a further licence for that purpose—and a loan by exchequer bills for eight hundred thousand pounds, to be charged on the first aids to be granted in the next session of parliament.

These provisions amounted to the sum of eleven millions seventy-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-two pounds, six shillings, and ten pence, exceeding the grants in the sum of five hundred ninety-three thousand two hundred and sixty-five pounds, six shillings, and nine pence, so that the nation had reason to hope that this surplus of above half a million would prevent any demand for deficiencies in the next session. By these copious grants of the House of Commons, whose compliance was so freely bestowed, the national debt was at this time swollen to that astonishing sum of eighty-seven millions three hundred and sixty-seven thousand two hundred and ten pounds, nineteen shillings, and ten pence farthing; a sum that would have crushed the national credit of any other state in Christendom.

§ XXXII. The liberality of the parliament was like the rock to the wilderness, which flowed with the welcome stream when touched by the rod of Moses. The present supply which the Commons granted for the subsistence of the Hanoverian army was, in pursuance of a message from his majesty, communicated to the House by Mr. Secretary Pitt, signifying, that the king had ordered his electoral army to be put into a state of preparation for raising a corps to the seventh of May, against the common enemy, in concert with his good brother and ally, the King of Prussia; that the exhausted and ruined state of the electorate having rendered it incapable of maintaining that army, until the further necessary charge thereof, as well as the more particular measures then concerting for the effectual support of his Prussian majesty, could be had before the House, the king, relying on the constant zeal of his faithful Commons for the support of the protestant religion, and of the liberties of France against the dangerous designs of France and her confederates, found himself, in the meantime, under the absolute necessity of recourse to the House; the present supply might enable his majesty, in this critical conjuncture, to subsist and keep together the said army. This address was no sooner recited by the speaker, than it was unanimously referred to a committee of supply, who granted his majesty's wish with an immediate resolution; and, considering their generous disposition, doubtless the same compliance would have appeared, even though no mention had been made of the protestant religion, which, to men of ordinary penetration, appeared to have no natural concern in the present dispute between the belligerent powers, although former ministers had often violently introduced it into messages and speeches from the throne, in order to dazzle the eyes of the populace, even while they insulted the understanding of those who were capable of exercising their own reason. This pretext was worn so threadbare, that, among the sensible part of mankind, it could no longer be used without incurring contempt and ridicule. In order to persuade mankind that the protestant religion might, on or before the twenty-first day of April, make a deposit of ten millions five hundred thousand pounds per annum, on such terms as he should choose to subjoin therein, raising these five millions with the column, as security for the deposit, an annual future payment on a perpetual annuity, as such sums so recovered by the receiver should be paid into the receipt of the exchequer, to be applied to the said ten millions of five hundred thousand pounds, for the purposes aforesaid, and the subscription provisions to the steps appeared for the respective payment, should be allowed an annuity for returning the such sums so recovered, upon the payment of such respective payments to the respective sums on which such pay out, were directed to be made, it was resolved, and this resolution was to be stated to the House of Commons in this session of parliament, and, if not otherwise, the subscription provisions to the steps appeared for the respective payment, should be allowed an annuity for returning the such sums so recovered, upon the payment of such respective payments to the respective sums on which such pay was in danger, it would have been necessary to specify the designs that were formed against it, as well as the names and secret propensities of the principal agents and to particularize the means by which they were to be properly authenticated. In that case great part of Europe would have been justly alarmed. The States-general of the United Provinces, who have made such glorious and indefatigable exertions to support the protestant religion in the Netherlands, and who have always lent a helping hand towards its preservation. The Danes would not have stood tamely neutral, and seen the religion they profess exposed to the rage of such a powerful confederacy. It is not to be imagined that the Northels, who had so solemnly sworn in the most solemn manner, the unpredjudiced part of mankind will be apt to conclude that the cry of religion was used, as in former times, to arouse, alarm, and inflame; nor that it would prove altogether without effect. Without regarding the general lawfulness of the age in matters of religion, it produced considerable effect among the fanatic sectaries that swarm through the kingdom of England. The leaders of those blind enthusiasts, either actuated by the spirit of delusion, or desirous of recommending themselves to the protection of the higher powers, immediately seized the hint, expatiating vehemently on the danger that unpromised over God's people, and exerting all their faculties to impress the belief of a religious war, which never fails to exasperate and impair the minds of men to such deeds of cruelty and revenge as must discredit all religion, and even disgrace humanity. The signal trust and confidence which the parliament of England reposed in the king, at this juncture, was in nothing more discreditable than in leaving to the crown the unlimited application of the sum granted for augmenting the salaries of the judges. In the reign of King William, when the act of settlement was passed, the parliament, jealous of the influence which the crown might acquire over the judges, provided, by an express clause of that act, that the commissions of the judges should be subject to a council in council; and that this council should be established: but now we find a sum of money granted for the augmentation of their salaries, and the crown vested with a discretionary power to proportion and apply this augmentation as they shall think best. In what manner, howsoever it may appear during the reign of a prince famed for integrity and moderation, will perhaps one day be considered as a very dangerous accession to the prerogative.

§ XXXIII. So fully persuaded were the ministers, that the Commons would cheerfully enable them to pay what subsidies they might promise to their German allies, that on the eleventh of April they concluded a new treaty of convention with his Prussian majesty, which, that it might have the firmer constancy, and the greater authority, was, on the part of Great Britain, transmitted and signed by almost all the privy counsellors who had any share in the administration.

This treaty, which was signed at Westminster, imposed, &c. that the contracting powers having mutually resolved to continue their efforts for their reciprocal defence and security, for the recovery of their possessions, the protection of their allies, and the support of the liberties of the Germanic body, his Britannic majesty had, from these considerations, determined to grant to his Prussian majesty an immediate succour in money, as being the most ready and the most efficacious; and their majesties having judged it proper that thereupon a convention should be made, for declaring and fixing their intentions upon this head, they had nominated and authorized their respective plenipotentiaries to that purpose. The plenipotentiaries of the contractors were first to treat with one another, and to communicate their respective views to their respective majesties. The plenipotentiaries of Great Britain were Henry Earl of Pembroke, one of the lord chancellors of England, one of the council of state, and President of the Chamber of the Exchequer; and William Pitt, Esq., another of the principal secretaries of state. In the and grant a seasonable relief to the petitioners, by the continuance of a free importation, and taking such other effectual means to reduce the growing price of corn as to their satisfaction necessary and expedient. This being an urgent case, that equally interested the humanity of the legislature and the manufacturers of the kingdom, it was deliberated upon, and discussed with remarkable despatch. In a letter to the king it was intimated to both Houses, and entered into a law, continuing till the twenty-fourth day of December, in the present year, the three acts of last session; for prohibiting the exportation of corn, and the transport of any corn or meal for foreign parts, allowing the importation of corn, datis-free. A second law was established, regulating the price and assize of bread, and subjecting to severe penalties those who should be concerned in its adulteration. In consequence of certain resolutions taken in a committee of the whole House, a bill was presented for prohibiting the paying of the bounty upon the exportation of corn, unless sold at a lower price than is allowed in an act passed in the first year of the reign of William and Mary; but this bill, after having been read a second time, and committed, was neglected, and proved abortive.

XXXV. In consequence of a motion made by Mr. Gage, that the militia was deemed necessary, and brought in for the encouragement of seamen employed in the royal navy, establishing a regular method for the punctual, frequent, and certain payment of their wages; enabling them more easily to provide for the sustenance of their wives and families, and preventing the frauds and abuses attending such payments. This bill, having passed the lower House, engaged in a very particular manner the attention of the Lords, as well as the lower House of Commons, desired the attendance of several members. These messages being taken into consideration, several precedents were recited: a debate arose about their formality, and the House unanimously resolved that a motion should be made, authorizing the Lords, if they thought fit, to give such a direction to the House of Commons, not being sufficiently informed by their messages upon what grounds, or for what purposes, their lordsships desired the House would give leave to such of their members as were named in the said messages to attend the House of Lords, in order to be examined upon the second reading of the bill, the Commons hoped their lordsships would make them acquainted with their intention. The Lords, in answer to this intimation, gave the Commons to understand, that they desired the attendance of the members mentioned in their messages, that they might be examined as witnesses upon the securities. In the meantime, the meetings being satisfactory, the members attended the House of Lords, where they were carefully and fully examined, as persons conversant in sea affairs, touching the inconveniences which had formerly attended the sea service, as well as the remedy that the House of Commons had given for the complaints of the seamen. A committee was appointed to view their messages through their House, though not without warm opposition, was enacted into a law by his majesty's assent. The militia act, as it passed in the last session, being found upon trial defective, Mr. Townshend moved for leave to bring in a new bill, to explain, amend, and enforce it: this was accordingly allowed, prepared, and passed into a law; though it did not seem altogether free from material objections, some of which were of an alarming nature. The power vested by law in the crown over the militia, is even more independent than that which it exercises over a standing army; for this last expires at the end of the year, if not renewed by act of parliament; but as the power of the militia is subjected to the power of the crown for the term of five years, during which it may be called out into actual service without consent of parliament, and consequently employed for sinister purposes. A commission officer in the militia may be detained, as subject to the articles of war, until the crown shall allow the militia to return to their respective places; and thus engaged, he is liable to death as a mutineer, or deserter, should be refused to appear in arms, and fight in support of the worst measures of the worst minister. Several merchants and manufacturers of the city of London, who in the common course of things, might probably have arrived in London before the act expired, if their cargoes had not been procured by the great rains and inundations in Italy and Germany, in the months of August and September last, which rendered the roads for many weeks impassable: that from unlucky accidents on shore, and storms and contrary winds after the silk was shipped, it could not possibly arrive within the time limited by the act; and unless it should be admitted to an entry, they, the petitioners, would be great sufferers, the manufacturers greatly prejudiced, and the consumers in a great measure frustrated: they therefore prayed leave to bring in a bill for allowing the introduction of all such fine Italian organize silk as should appear to have been imported into Hamburg and Hanover before the first day of December. The petition being referred to a committee, which reported that these allegations were true, the House complied with their request, and the bill having passed, was enacted into a law in the usual form. A speedy passage was given to the mutiny bill, and the other annual measures for regulating the marine forces, which contained nothing new or extraordinary. A committee being appointed to inquire into the expenses of the navy, and what laws were passed for preventing them, the bill was passed and performed this difficult task with indefatigable patience and perseverance; and, in pursuance of their resolutions, three bills were passed and prepared into laws, continuing acts for a certain time, and rendering others perpetual.

XXXVI. The lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, having drawn up a petition to the House of Commons alleging, that the toll upon loaded vessels, or other craft, passing through the arches of London bridge, granted by a former act, passed in the year one thousand seven hundred and thirty-five, for improving or repair some arches in the said bridge, which had been and were under and the said bridge, was altogether precarious and insufficient to defray the expense, including that of a temporary wooden bridge already erected; and praying that a bill might be prepared, for explaining and rendering that act unnecessary, and for power to examine the contents, and a bill brought in according to their request. This, however, was opposed by a petition from several persons, owners of barges, and other craft navigating the river Thames, who affirmed, that if the bill should pass into a law as it then stood, it would be extremely injurious to the petitioners in particular, and to the public in general. These were heard by their counsel before the committee, but no report was yet given, when the temporary bridge was reduced to ashes. Then the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London presented another petition, alleging, that, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by act of parliament, they had established a number of houses on London bridge, and directed the rest that were standing to be taken down with all convenient expedition, that two of the arches for encouraging the importation of silk works, &c. for the same period, and to this was added, a clause for the raising a special public revenue for the support of the navy, and another clause in the said act, to proceed to the whole raising of bounties upon the importation of British silk or silk manufactures, and to vest the power of setting on any fine, &c. The temporary part of the act for establishing the service of the militia was continued under the arches, relating to the power of appealing to courts. Those measures were granted, but the officers were to be paid in every prayer, &c. Until the twenty fourth day of September in the year one thousand seven hundred and thirty-four, a tax to be paid by the masters and owners of every vessel, and the members of the common council, for the support of parliament. 11. An act of the 3d of George II, to prevent frauds by banknotes, &c. for the same period. 111. An act of the 8th of George II.
might be laid into one for the improvement of the navigation; that they had, at a very great expense, erected a temporary wooden bridge, to preserve a public passage to and from the city, until the great arch should be finished, which temporary bridge being consumed by fire, they must rebuild it with the greatest expedition, at a further considerable expense; that the sum necessary for carrying on the work, being greater and exceeding the sum, included in the rebuilding of the said temporary bridge, was estimated at four score thousand pounds; and as the improving, widening, and enlarging London bridge was calculated for the great good of the public, for the advancement of the commerce, and commerce, among the making the navigation upon the river Thames more safe and secure; they, therefore, prayed the House to take the premises into consideration. This petition being recommended by his majesty to the House, it was read, and the passage over and through London bridge, enforcing the payment of the toll imposed upon loaded vessels, which had been found extremely burdensome to trade; but this encumbrance was prevented by a petition of several merchants, tradesmen, and others, inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, taking notice of the fifteen thousand pounds granted towards the repair of London bridge, and, as they were informed, intended to make it a free way for all heavy merchants' subject; they said they hoped to partake of this public bounty; but afterwards hearing that the bill then depending was confided to the tills formerly granted for requiring the said bridge, they represented the hardship which they and the traders would continue to labour under: they alleged, that the surveyors and workmen, then employed upon this work, had discovered the true principles on which the head was raised; that the foundation of the piers consisted of hard durable stone, well cemented together, and now a strong and firm as when first built; that when the bridge should be finished, great savings would be made in keeping it in repair, from the sums formerly expended, on a mistaken opinion, that the foundations were rotten; that they were very considerable estates appointed solely for the repairs of the bridge, which, they apprehended, would be sufficient to maintain it without any toll; or if they should not be thought adequate to that purpose, they hoped the deficiency would not be made up by a toll upon trade and commerce, but rather by an imposition on coaches, chariots, chaises, and saddle-horses. This remonstrance made no impression on the bill being on a motion of Sir John Philips, read a third time, passed through both Houses, and obtained the royal assent.

§ XXXVIII. The interest of the manufactures was also considered, with the encouragement of maulder, a plant essentially necessary in dyeing and printing calicoes, which may be raised in England without the least inconvenience. It was judged, upon inquiry, that the most effectual means to encourage the growth of this commodity would be to ascertain the title of it, and a bill was brought in for that purpose. The rate of the tithe was established at five shillings an acre; and it was enacted, that this law should continue in force for fourteen years, and to the end of the next session of parliament; but whereas this encouragement was made temporary, it is not easy to determine. The laws relating to the poor, though equally numerous and oppressive to the subject, having been found defective, a new clause, relating to the settlement of servants and apprentices, was now added to an act passed in the twenty-first year of the present reign, intituled, "An act for the better adjusting and more easily removing the hardships, grievances, and of certain complaints, of such apprentices." No country in the universe can produce so many laws made in behalf of the poor as those that are daily accumulating in England; in no other country is there so much money raised for their support, by private lhammer navigation, and, in a little time, diminish the number of seamen, of consequence act diametrically opposite to the purpose for which it was contrived. Numbers of persons committed, and the sums produced, by private and clandestine conveyances, a motion was made, and left given, to form a bill for the public registering of all deeds, conveyances, wills, and other encumbrances, that might affect any honours, mansions, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, within the kingdom of England, where public registers were not already appointed by act of parliament: but this measure so necessary to the ascertainment and possession of property, met with the desire of all, and was immediately dropped, not a little to the prejudice, the motion, some people imagine, through the influence of those who, perhaps, had particular reasons for countermarking the present mysterious forms of conveyancing. Such a bill must also have been disagreeable and mortifying to the pride of those landholders whose estates are encumbered, because, in consequence of such a register, every mortgage under which they laboured would be exactly known. The next object to which the House converted its attention, was a bill explaining and amending a late act for establishing a fish market in the city of Westminster, and preventing scandalous monopolies of a few engaging fishmongers, who imposed exorbitant prices on their fish, and, in this part of the bill, with a view to such an object, enacted, that every thousand of their fellow-citizens. Abundance of pains was taken to render this bill effectual, for putting an end to such flagrant imposition. Inquiries were made, petitions presented, and at last the whole bill, being passed through the lower House, was conveyed to the Lords, among whom it was suffered to expire, on pretence that there was not time sufficient to deliberate maturely on the subject.

§ XXXIX. The occasion that produced the next bill which miscarried we shall explain, as an incident equally extraordinary and interesting. By an act passed in the preceding session, for recruiting his majesty's land-forces and ships by violence and constraint, commissioned officers thereby appointed were vested with a power of judging ultimately, whether the persons brought before them were such as ought, by the rules prescribed in the act, to be impressed into the service: for it was expressly provided, that no person so impressed by those commissioners should be taken out of his majesty's service by any process, other than for some criminal accusation. During the recess of parliament, a gentleman having left his国家, was accused of injustice and neglect, in the Savoy, his friends made application for a habeas corpus, which produced some hesitation, and indeed an insurmountable difficulty; for, according to the act of habeas corpus, to which this privilege relates only to persons committed for criminal or supposed criminal matters, and the gentleman did not stand in that predicament. Before the question could be despatched, he was discharged, in consequence of his application to the secretary at war; but the nature of the case plainly pointed out a defect in the act, seemingly the most dangerous consequence to the liberty of the subject. In order to remedy this defect, a bill for giving a more speedy relief to the subject, upon the writ of habeas corpus, was prepared, and presented to the House of Commons, which formed itself into a committee, and made several amendments. It importuned, that the several provisions made in the act for impressing and committing, and committing the officers of the admiralty and Charles II. for the awarding of writs of habeas corpus, in cases of commitment or detainee, for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, should, in like manner, extend to all persons, not being committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, should be confined, or restrained of his or her liberty, under any colour or pretence whatsoever; that, upon oath made by such person so confined or restrained, or by any other on his behalf, and in the presence of the officers of the admiralty and Charles II., the tumultuous and disorderly meeting, and that such confinement or restraint, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so applying, was not by virtue of any commitment or detainee for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, an habeas corpus, directed to the person or persons so confining or restraining the party, as aforesaid, should be awarded and granted, in the same manner as is directed, and under the same penalties as are provided, by the said act, in the case of persons committed and detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter: that the person or persons so confined or restrained should be brought, by virtue of any habeas corpus granted in the vacation time, under the authority of this act, might and should, within three days after the return made, proceed to examine into the facts contained in such return, and into the cause of such confinement and restraint: and therupon either discharge, or bail, or remand the parties so brought, as the case should require, and as to justice should appertain. The rest of the bill related to the return of the writ in three days, and the penalties incurred by those who should neglect or refuse to make the due return, or to comply with any other clause of this regulation. The Commons seemed hearty in reading up this additional business for the liberty of their fellow-subjects, and passed the bill with the most laudable alacrity; but in the House of Lords, such a great number of objections were started, that it sunk at the second reading, and the judges were ordered to prepare a bill for the same purpose, to be laid before that House in the next session.

§ XL. His majesty having recommended the care of the Foundling Hospital to the House of Commons, which through the indefatigable zeal and courage of Mr. Grove, of that charity, the growing annual expense of it appeared worthy of further consideration, and leave was granted to bring in a bill, for obliging all the parishes of England and Wales to keep a foundling Hospital, or a number of marriages, that from these a fund might be raised towards the support of the said hospital. The bill was accordingly prepared by a committee appointed for the purpose; but before the House could take the report into consideration, the parliament was prorogued. The proprietors of the private called the Antigallican, which had taken a rich French ship homeward bound from China, and carried her into Cadiz, where the Spanish government had wrested the property, and, having, by the aid of some French owners, now presented a petition to the House of Commons, complaining of this interposition as an act of partiality and injustice: representing the great expense at which the privateer had been equipped, the legality of the capture, the loss and hardships which they the petitioners had sustained, and imploring such relief as the House should think requisite. Though these allegations were supported by a species of evidence that seemed strong and just and convincing, and might be thought incumbent on the parliament to vindicate the honour of the nation, when thus insulted by a foreign power, the House, upon this occasion, treated the petition with the most mortifying neglect, either giving the privateers no credit for the expense, or unwilling to take any step which might, at this juncture, embroil the nation with the court of Spain on such a frivolous subject. True it is, the Spanish government alleged, in their own justification, that the prize was taken under the guns of Corunna, insomuch that the shot fired by the privateer entered that place, and damaged some houses: but this allegation was never properly sustained, and the prize was certainly condemned as legal by the court of admiralty at Gibraltar.

§ XLI. As we have already given a detail of the trial of Sir John Mordaunt, it will be unnecessary to recapitulate any circumstances of that affair, except such as relate to its connexion with the present investigation. At the beginning of this session, Lord Barrington, as secretary at war, informed the House, by his majesty's command, that Lieutenant-General Sir John Mordaunt, a member of that House, was in great distress for discharging the necessary orders, while employed on the late expedition to the coast of France. The Commons immediately resolved, that an address should be presented to his majesty, returning him the thanks of this House for his gracious message of that day, in the commodities he had bestowed upon him, and of the reason for putting Lieutenant-General Sir John Mordaunt in arrest. Among the various objects of commerce that employed the attention of the House, one of the most considerable was the trade to the coast of India, for the protection of which an annual sum had been granted for some years, to be expended in the maintenance and reparis of castles and factories. While a committee was employed in perusing the accounts relating to the sums granted in the preceding session for this purpose, a petition from the committee of the African colonies, recommending a message in a letter from his majesty, was presented to the House, soliciting further assistance for the ensuing year. In the meantime, a remonstrance was offered by certain planters and merchants interested in extending to the British sugar colonies in America, alleging that the price of negroes was greatly advanced since the forts and settlements on the coast of Africa had been under the direction of the committee of the company of merchants trading to that coast. The committee, greatly alarmed at the undertaking, prevented the cultivation of the British colonies, and was a great detriment to the trade and navigation of the kingdom: that this misfortune, they believed, was in some measure owing to the ruinous state and condition of the forts and settlements: that, in their opinion, the most effectual method for maintaining the interest of that trade on a respectable footing, next to that of an incorporated joint-stock company, would be putting those forts and settlements under the sole direction of the commissioners for trade and plantations: that the preservation or ruin of the American sugar colonies went hand in hand with that of the coast of Africa: that by an act passed in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty, for extending and improving this trade, the British subjects were debarr'd from lodging their slaves and merchandise in the forts and settlements on the coast: therefore, prayed that the act might be reversed; that all commanders of British and American vessels, free merchants, and all other his majesty's subjects, who were settled, or might at any time thereafter settle, in Africa, should have free liberty, from sunrise to sunset, to enter the forts and settlements, and to deposit their goods and merchandise in the warehouses thereunto belonging; to secure their slaves or other purchases without paying any consideration for the same: however, the same to be recou'led at the proper cost and charge of their respective owners. The House having taken this petition into consideration, inquired into the proceedings of the company, and revised the act for extending and improving the trade to Africa, resolved, That the committee of the African company had faultily discharged the trust reposed in them, and granted ten thousand pounds for maintaining the British forts and settlements in that part of the world. The enemy were perfectly well acquainted with the weakness of the British castles on the coast of Africa; and had they known as well how to execute with spirit, as to plan with sagacity, the attempt which, in the course of the preceding year, they had made some progress in. The principal town of Guinea, would have succeeded, and all the other settlements would have fallen into their hands without opposition.1 § XLIII. The longest and warmest debate which was maintained in the course of this session arose from a motion for leaving in a bill for shortening the term and duration of future parliaments, a measure truly patriotic, against which no substantial argument could be produced, although the motion was rejected by the majority, on preference, that, whilst the nation was engaged in such a dangerous and expensive war, it would be improper in thought of introducing such an alteration in the form of government. Reasons of equal strength and solidity will never be wanting to the patrons and ministers of corruption and venality. The alteration proposed was nothing less than removing and annulling an enclosure which had been made on the constitution: it might have been effected without the lessening or corruption, to the general satisfaction of the nation: far from being unreasonable at this juncture, it would have enhanced the national reputation abroad, and rendered the war more formidable to the enemies of Great Britain, by convincing them that it was supported by the leal and patriotic spirit of its people. Indeed, a quick succeed-

1 Robert Hunter Morris represented, in a petition to the House, that as pp. 466 was made in the British colonies in America, they were obliged to demolish the buildings of that company, but in the second instance, they, being furnished with the former stock of their supplies, and having by the king's permission, as at his own cost, been continued in the employment of the profits which the works might produce, for the support of their respective trade, and the safe-guarding of their plantation, and adequate compensation for, to great an undertaking. The petition was change from indulgence to activity, from indifference to zeal, from timorous caution to fearless execution, was effected by the influence and example of an intelligent and industrious master, who, chagrined at the inactivity and disorders of the preceding campaign, had, on a very solemn occasion, lately declared his belief that there was a determined resolution, both in the naval and military commanders, against any voluntary exertion of the national power in the service of the country. He affirmed, that though he himself appeared ready to embrace every measure proposed by his ministers for the honour and interest of his British dominions, yet scarce a man could be found with whom the great number of merchant-ships then lying at the Cape bound for Europe, he took every precaution which he thought necessary to insure success. He reinforced his squadron with some store-ships, mounted with guns, and armed for the occasion, and supplied the deficiency in his complements, by taking on board seamen from the merchant-ships, and soldiers from the garrison. Thus prepared, he weighed anchor, and stood out to sea, having under his command four large ships of the line, and three stout frigates. They were no sooner perceived advancing, than Captain Forrest held a short council with his two captains. "Gentlemen, (said he,) you know our own strength, and see that of the enemy; shall we give them battle? They are the finer ships. "Then fight them we will, there is no time to be lost; return to your ships, and get them ready for engaging." After this laconic consultation among these three gallant officers, the French squadron put to sea, and charged further hesitation, and between three and four in the afternoon the action began with great impetuosity. The enemy exerted themselves with uncommon spirit, conscious that their honour was particularly at stake, and that they fought in sight, as it were, of their own coast, which was lined with people, expecting to see them return in triumph. But notwithstanding all their endeavours, their squadron was taken, after having given up a large engagement, that lasted two hours and a half, for their ships were in a shattered condition, that he made a signal for one of his frigates to come and tow him out of the line. His example was followed by the rest of his squadron, which, by this assistance, with the favour of the land breeze and the approach of night, made shift to accomplish their escape from the three British ships, which were too much disabled in their masts and rigging to prosecute their victory. One of the French squadron was rendered altogether unmaneuverable for action; their loss in men amounted to three hundred killed, and as many wounded; whereas that of the English did not much exceed one third of this number. Nevertheless, they were so much disabled, as not to be able to keep the sea, they returned to Jamaica, and the French commodore seized the opportunity of sailing with a great convoy for Europe. The courage of Captain Forrest was not more conspicuous in his engagement with the French squadron near Cape Francois, than his conduct and sagacity in a subsequent adventure near Port-au-Prince, a French harbour, situated at the bottom of a bay on the western part of Hispaniola, behind the small island of Gonave. After M. de Kersun had taken his departure from Cape Francois, for Europe, Admiral Cotes, beating up to windward from Port-Royal in Jamaica, with three ships of the line, received intelligence that there was a French fleet at Port-au-Prince, ready to sail on their way to Europe; Captain Forrest then presented the admiral with a plan for the attack on this place, and urged it earnestly. This, however, was declined, and Captain Forrest directed his course off the island; but the next day only, the admiral enjoining him to return at the expiration of the time, and rejoined the squadron at Cape Nicholas. Accordingly, Captain Forrest, in the Augusta, proceeded up the bay, between the island Gonave and the island of Hispaniola, with four ships of the line and one frigate, to execute an attack on the French. But the admiral, having taken, and a great number of merchant-ships fell into the hands of the English. Nor was the success of the British ships of war confined to the English channel. At this period the admirals, not contented at attending the inferior and dis- tinguished. A very gallant exploit was achieved by one Captain Avey, commander of the Adventure, a small armed vessel, in the government's service: falling in with the Marseilles, a ship of 20 guns, and the l'Isle d'Haiti, a frigate, both French, he ran her a-board, fastened her boltstap to his capstan, and, after a warm engagement, compelled her commander to submit. A French frigate of thirty-six guns was taken by Captain Parker, in a new frigate of inferior force. Dutch frigates also fell into the hands of the British, with a formidable prize. There was a large number of merchant-ships taken, and a great number of merchant-ships fell into the hands of the English. Nor was the success of the British ships of war confined to the English channel. At this period the admirals, not contented at attending the inferior and dis-all the sail he could carry. About ten he perceived two sail, one of which fired a gun, and the other made the best of her way for Léognan, another harbour in the bay. At this moment, Lord Forrest, the governor, sent his two ships near a port called Petit Gouave; coming up with the ship which had fired the gun, she submitted without opposition, after he had hailed, and told her captain what he was, and that he had two of his large carracks, and threatened to sink her if she should give the least alarm. He forthwith shifted the prisoners from this prize, and placed on board his five-and-thirty of his own crew, with orders to stand for Petit Gouave, and intercept any of the fleet that might be on the same course. The corsair ran after the rest, and in the dawn of the morning, finding himself in the middle of their fleet, he began to fire at them all in their turns, as he could bring his guns to bear: they returned the fire for some time; and after the carnage, the Solide, and the Theodore, struck their colours. These being secured, were afterwards used in taking the Maurice, Le Grand, and La Flore; the Brilliant also submitted; and the Mars made sail, in hopes of escaping; but the Augusta, coming up with her about noon, likewise fell into the hands of the victor. Thus, by a well-conducted stratagem, a whole fleet of nine sail were taken by a single ship, in the neighbourhood of four or five harbours, some of which they were said to have found shelter in. The prizes, which happened to be richly laden, were safely conveyed to Jamaica, and there sold at public auction, for the benefit of the captors, who had added another chapter in history to produce such another instance of success.

§ XLV. The ministry having determined to make vigorous efforts against the enemy in North America, Admiral Blowavsen was vested with the command of the fleet destined for that service, and sailed from St. Helen's on the nineteenth day of February, when the Invincible, of seventy-four guns, one of the best ships that constituted his squadron, ran aground, and perished; but her men, stores, and provisions were saved through the goodness of the succeeding mouth, Sir Edward Hawke steered into the bay of Biscay, with another squadron, in order to intercept any supplies from France designed for Cape Breton or Canada; and about the same time the town of Embden, belonging to his Prussian majesty, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy, was suddenly retrieved by the conduct of Commodore Holmes, stationed on that coast, who sent up two of his small ships to anchor in the river between Knok and the city. The garrison, amounting to three thousand seven hundred men, finding themselves thus cut off from all communication with the country below, abandoned the place with great precipitation, and some of their baggage and stores were washed ashore by the breaking of the ice, which the commodore armed for that purpose. It was in the same month that the admiral received advice of another advantage by sea, which had been gained by Admiral Osborne, who, while cruised between the Strait of Dant and Carthage, on the coast of Spain. On the twenty-eighth day of March he fell in with a French squadron, commanded by the Marquis du Quene, consisting of four ships, namely, the Fourdrain, of eighty guns, the Orphén, of sixty-four, the Orphite, of fifty, and the Pleade frigate, of twenty-four, in their passage from Toulon to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for some time been blockaded by Admiral Osborne in the harbour of Carthage. The enemy no sooner perceived the English squadron than he scattered his ships, and steered different courses: then Mr. Osborne detached divers ships in pursuit of each, while he himself, with the body of his fleet, stood off for the bay of Carthage, in which he were. In the meanwhile, of the French squadron which lay there at anchor. About seven in the evening, the Orphéa, having on board five hundred men, struck to Captain Storr, in the Revenge, who lost the calf of one leg in the engagement. After the French were driven before the ships of the line, he was sustained either by the ships of the line, or the Nevers and Preston. The Monmouth of sixty-four guns, commanded by Captain Gardner, engaged the Fourdrain, one of the largest ships in the French navy, mounted with forty-two carronades, and containing eight hundred men, under the direction of Monmouth and du Quene. The action was maintained with great fury on both sides, and the gallant Captain Gardner lost his life: nevertheless the fight was continued with unabating vigour by his lieutenant, Mr. Carkett, and the Foudroyant disabled in such a manner, that her commander struck, as soon as the other English ships could bear on the flagship. In Hampton-court, appeared, this mortifying step, however, he did not take until he saw his ship lie like a wreck upon the water, and the decks covered with carnage. The Orphite was driven on shore under the arquebuses by the ships Montagu and Monarque, commanded by the Captains Rowley and Montague, who could not complete their destruction without violating the neutrality of Spain. As for the Pleade frigate, she made her escape by being a prime sailer. This action was fought on the 9th of March. Osborne had of two of their capital ships, but saw them added to the navy of Great Britain, and the disaster was followed close by another, which they could not help feeling with equal sensibility of mortification and chagrin. In the beginning of April, Sir Edward Hawke, steering with his squadron into Basque road, on the coast of Poictou, discovered, off the isle of Anx, a French fleet at anchor, consisting of five ships of the line, with six frigates, and forty transports, having on board three thousand troops, and a large quantity of stores and provisions intended as a supply for their settlements in North America. They no sooner saw the English admiral advancing, than they began to slip their anchors, and make their preparations for a sudden escape by sea, but a great number ran into shoal water, where they could not be pursued; and next morning they appeared a-ground, lying on their broadsides. Sir Edward Hawke, who had rodden the isle of Anx, finished the ships Intrepid and Medway with trusty pilots, and sent them further in when the flood began to make, with orders to sound a-head, that he might know whether there was any possibility of surprising the enemy, but the want of a sufficient depth of water rendered the scheme impracticable. In the meantime, the French threw overboard their cannon, stones, and ballast; and boats and launches from Rochefort were employed in carrying away the iron in their magazines. The Enemy, landing in the mud, as soon as they should be water-borne by the flowing tide. By these means their large ships of war, and many of their transports, escaped into the river Charente; but their loading was lost, and the end of their equipment totally defeated. Another convoy of merchant ships, under the protection of three frigates, Sir Edward Hawke, a few days before, had chased into the harbour of St. Mary's in the isle of Ré, where they still remained, waiting an opportunity for hazarding a second departure: a third, consisting of twelve sail, bound from Bordeaux to Gbene, under convoy of a frigate and armed vessel, was encountered at sea by one British ship of the line and two frigate ships. The enemy, finding the repair of the convoy afterwards met with the same fate; but this advantage was overbalanced by the loss of Captain James Home, commander of the Plote fire-ship, a brave accomplish officer, who, in an unequal combat with the enemy, refused to quit the deck, even when he was disabled, and tell gloriously with wounds, exhorting the people, with his latest breath, to continue the engagement while the ship could swim, and acquit themselves with honour in the service of their country.

§ XLVI. On the twenty-ninth day of May the Baisenable, a French ship of the line, mounted with sixty-four cannons, having on board six hundred and thirty men, commanded by the Prince de Montmorenci, was captured by the Rohan, was, in her passage from Port l'Orrent to Brest, attacked by Captain Denis, in the Dorsershire, of seventy guns, and taken after an obstinate engagement, in which one hundred and sixty men of the prince's complement were killed or wounded, and he sustained great damage in his hull, sails, and rigging. These successes were moreover overcheered by the tidings of a lamentable disaster that had happened to the English on the 15th of March in the Mediterranean; for Rear-Admiral Bradderick, in his passage to the Mediterranean. On the thirteenth day of April, between one and two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the foremost deck of the third-rate, the Minotaur, in a manner, that not only occasioned the death of the master and two dozen people, but saved several hours, the flames increased, and the ship being commended to the water's edge, the remnant sunk about six o'clock in the evening. The horror and consternation of such a scene are not easily described. When all endeavors proved fruitless, and no hope of saving the troops remained, the barge was hoisted out for the preservation of the admiral, who entered it accordingly; but all distinction of persons being now abolished, the seamen rushed into the crowd, that in a few moments it overran. The admiral, foreseeing that this would be the case, stripped off his clothes, and committing himself to the mercy of the waves, was saved by the boat of a merchant-ship, after he had sustained himself in the sea a full hour by swimming. Captain Payton, who was the second in command, remained upon the quarter-deck as long as it was possible to keep that station, and then descending by the stern ladder, had the good fortune to be taken into a boat belonging to the Alderman sloop. The hull of the ship, masts, and rigging, were now in a blaze, bursting tremendous in several parts through horrid clouds of smoke; nothing was heard but the cracking of the flames, mingled with the dismal cries of terror and distraction; nothing was seen but acts of frenzy and desolation. The miserable wretches, affrighted at the horrors of such a confagration, sought a fate less dreadful, by plunging into the sea, and about three hundred men were preserved by the boats belonging to the commerce of the city. Two powerful squadrons by sea were destined for the service of this expedition: the first, consisting of eleven great ships, was commanded by Lord Anson and Sir Edward Hawke; the other, composed of four ships of the line, seven frigates, six fireships, ten cutters, twenty tenders, ten store-ships, and one hundred transports, was put under the direction of Commodore Howe, who had signalled himself by his gallantry and conduct the course of the preceding campaign. The plan of a descent upon France having been adopted by the ministry, a body of troops, consisting of sixteen regiments, nine troops of light horse, and six thousand marines, was assembled for the execution of this design, and embarked under the command of the Duke of Marlborough; a nobleman, who, though he did not inherit all the military genius of his grandfather, yet far excelled him in the amiable and social qualities of the heart: he was brave beyond all question, generous to profession, and good-natured to excess. On this occasion he was assisted by the council of Lord George Sackville, second in command, son to the Duke of Dorset; an officer of experience and reputation, and in the course of the siege of Namur, exhibited proofs of extraordinary genius and uncommon application. The troops having been encamped for some time upon the Isle of Wight, were embarked in the several transports on the 6th of June, the magazine of stores in the magazine of June for the coast of Bretagne, leaving the people of England flushed with the gayest hopes of victory and conquest. The two fleets parted at sea; Lord Anson, with his squadron, proceeded to the bay of Biscey, in order to watch the motions of the enemy's ships, and harass their navigation; while Commodore Howe, with the land forces, steered directly towards St. Maloës, a strong place of considerable commerce, situated on the coast of Bretagne, against which the proposed invasion seemed to be chiefly intended. The town, however, was found too well fortified, both by art and nature, to admit of an attempt by sea with any prospect of success; and, therefore, it was resolved to make a descent in the neighbourhood. After the fleet had been, by contrary winds, detained several days in sight of the French coast, it arrived in the bay of Cancale, about two leagues to the eastward of St. Maloës. Having silenced a small battery which the enemy had occasionally raised upon the beach, the troops were landed, without farther opposition, on the sixth day of June. The Duke of Marlborough immediately began to march towards St. Servan, which may be termed the suburbs of St. Maloës, he ordered one small storehouse to be spared, because it could not be set on fire without endangering the whole town. The Duke took the place of St. Maloch, about five hundred light horse, which had been disciplined and carried over with a view to scour the country, the fleet was detained by contrary winds in the bay of Cancale for several days, during which a design seems to have been formed for attacking Granville, which had been reconnoitred by some of the engineers; but, in consequence of their report, the scheme was laid aside, and the fleet stood out to sea, where it was exposed to some rough weather. In a few days, the wind blowing in a northern direction, they steered again towards the French coast, and ran in with the land near Flavere-de-Grace, where the flat-bottomed boats provided for landing were hoisted out, and a second disembarkation expected. But the wind blowing violently towards the evening, the boats were reshipped, and the fleet obliged to quit the land, in order to avoid the dangers of a lee-shore. Next day, the weather being more moderate, they returned to the same place, where they were given to prepare for a descent; but the Duke of Marlborough having taken a view of the coast in an open cutter, accompanied by Commodore Howe, thought proper to waive the attempt. Their next step was to bear away before the wind for Cherbourg, in the neighbourhood of which place the fleet came to anchor. Here some of the transports received the fire of six different batteries; and a considerable body of troops appeared in arms to dispute the landing: nevertheless, the general resolved that the fort would be, and, Tironville, and Galite, should be attacked in the night by the first regiments of guards. The soldiers were actually distributed in the flat-bottomed boats, and every preparation made for this enterprise, when the wind began to blow with such violence, that the troops could not get a riding without extreme danger and difficulty, nor properly sustained in case of a repulse, even if the disembarkation could have been effected. This attempt, therefore, was laid aside; but at the same time a resolution taken to stand on towards the whole fleet, to cover a general landing. A disposition was made accordingly; but the storm increasing, the transports ran foul of each other, and the ships were exposed to the danger of low-water, for the tide blew down the coast; besides, the provisions began to fail, and the hay for the horses was almost consumed. These concurring reasons induced the commanders to postpone the disembarkation to a more favourable opportunity. The fleet stood out to sea, and the tempest abating, they steered for the Isle of Wight, and next day anchored at St. Helen's. Such was the issue of an enterprise achieved with considerable success, if we consider the damage done to the enemy's shipping, and the other objects which the ministry had in view, namely, to secure the navigation of the channel, and make a diversion in favour of the German allies, by alarming the French king, and obliging him to employ a considerable number of troops to prevent the insult and invasion; but whether such a mighty amusement was necessary, for the accomplishment of these petty aims, and whether the same amusement might not have been employed in executing schemes of infinitely greater advantage to our own, we shall leave to the judicious reader's own reflection.

§ XLVIII. The designs upon the coast of France, though interrupted by tempestuous weather, were not as yet laid aside for the whole season; but, in the meantime, the troops were disembarked on the Isle of Wight; and one brigade marched to the northward, to join a body of troops, with which the government resolved to augment the army of the allies in Germany, commanded by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick. The Duke of Marlborough and Lord George Sackville being appointed to conduct this British corps upon the continent, the command of the marine expeditions devolved to Lieutenant-General Bligh, an old experienced officer, who had served with reputation; and his royal highness Prince Edward, afterwards created Duke of York, entered as a volunteer with Commodore Howe, in order to learn the rudiments of the sea-service. This fleet, with the troops being properly everything prepared for the second expedition, the fleet sailed from St. Helen's on the first of August; and after a tedious passage from calms and contrary winds, anchored on the second of August on the west of Cherbourg; the enemy had intrenched themselves within a mile, extending from the fort Eureville, which stands about two miles to the westward of Cherbourg, along the coast for the space of four miles, fortified with several batteries at proper distances. Beyond this intrenchment a body of horse and infantry appeared in red and blue uniforms; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the less risk was run in landing the British forces. At first a bomb-ketch had been sent to anchor near the town, and throw forward some imbraces into the place, as a feint to amuse the enemy, and deceive them with regard to the place of disembarkation, while the general had determined to land about a league to the westward of Querqueville, the most western fort in the bay. The other bomb-ketches being posted along shore, did considerable execution upon the intrenchments, not only by throwing shells in the usual way, but also by using ball machines, which shot great quantities of shot to a great distance, and, by scattering as they fly, do abundance of mischief. While the ketches fired without ceasing, the grenadiers and guards were rowed regularly ashore in the flat-bottomed boats, and landing without opposition, instantly formed on a small open portion of the beach, with a natural breast-work in their front, having on the other side a hollow way, and a village rising beyond it with a sudden ascent: on the left, the ground was intersected by ledges, and covered with orchards; and from this quarter the enemy advanced in order. The British lines were formed, the town being attacked in order to meet them half way, and a straggling fire begun; but the French, edging to the left, took possession of the hill, from whence they piqueted with the advanced posts of the English. In the meantime, the rest of the infantry were embarked in the transports, and landed at sunrise, the light troops were not yet landed, General Bligh encamped that night at the village of Eureville, on a piece of ground that did not extend above four hundred paces; so that the tents were pitched in a crowded and inky manner. Next morning, the general having received intelligence that no parties of the enemy were seen moving on the hill, or in the plain, and that fort Querqueville was entirely in possession of the British, and the two columns to Cherbourg. An advanced party took immediate possession of Querqueville; and the lines and batteries along the shore were now deserted by the enemy. The British forces marched behind St. Aulne, Eureville, Hommet, and La Gaite, found the town of Cherbourg likewise abandoned, and the gates being open, entered it without opposition. The citizens, encouraged by a manifesto containing a promise of protection, which had been published and distributed, in order to quiet their apprehensions, received their new guests with a good grace, overwhelming them with civilities, for which they met with a very ungrateful return; for as the bulk of the army was not returned, and all the coast forts were at liberty to indulge themselves in riot and licentiousness. All night long they ravaged the adjacent country without restraint; and as no guards had been regularly placed, the roads and avenues of Cherbourg, to prevent disorders, the town itself was not exempted from pillage and brutality. These outrages, however, were so soon known, than the general took immediate steps for putting a stop to them for the present, and preventing all irregularities for the future. Next morning a general order was committed, he determined to destroy, without delay, all the forts and the baston; and the execution of this design was left to the engineers, assisted by the officers of the fleet and artillery. Great sums of money had been expended upon the harbour and bastion of Cherbourg, which at one time was considered by the French court as an object of great importance, from its situation respecting the river Seine, which is the opposite coast of England; but as the works were left unfinished, in all appearance, it had grown into disreputation. The enemy had raised several unconnected batteries along the bay; but the town itself was quite open and defenceless. While the engineers were embarking the contrivance, and every thing was prepared for the destruction of the fort, Bligh sailed; and the ships of a contrario formed a little after, so that the horse scoured the country, and detachments were every day sent out towards Wallon, at the distance of four leagues from Cherbourg, where the enemy were encamped, and every thing was expected. At this time, the garrisons were fought by the out-parties of each army, in one of which Capt. Lindsay, a gallant young officer, who had been very instrumental in training the light-horse, was mortally wounded. The harbour and bastion of Cherbourg being destroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of brass cannon secured on board the English ships, a contribution, amounting to about three thousand pounds sterling, was exacted upon the town; and a plan of re-embarkation concerted; as it appeared from the report of peasants and deserters, that the enemy were already increased to a formidable number. A slight intrenchment being raised, sufficient to defend the last division that should be re-embarked, the stores and artillery were shipped, and the light horses conveyed on board their respective transports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed vessels. On the sixteenth day of August, at three o'clock in the morning, which was thirteen days from Cherbourg down to the beach, and re-embarked at Fort Galet, without the least disturbance from the enemy.
the French coast, came to anchor in the bay of St. Lunoire, two leagues to the westward of St. Maloës, against which it was determined to make another attempt. The town and vessels being ranged along shore to cover the disembarkation, the troops landed on a fair open beach, and a detachment of grenadiers was sent to the harbour of St. Browes, where three or four small ships and three bomb-ketches were brought about fifteen small vessels; but St. Maloës itself being properly surveyed, appeared to be above insult, either from the land forces or the shipping. The mouth of the river that forms its basin extends above two miles in breadth at its mouth, and has the appearance of a considerable number of batteries; and the entrance is defended by such forts and batteries as the ships of war could not pretend to silence, considering the difficult navigation of the channel; besides which there were five pieces of large cannon planted on these forts and batteries, the enemy had mounted forty on the west side of the town; and the basin was, moreover, strengthened by seven frigates or armed vessels, whose guns might have been brought to bear upon any batteries that could be raised on shore, as well as upon ships entering by the usual channel. For these substantial reasons the design against St. Maloës was dropped; but the general being unwilling to re-embark, without having taken some step for the further annoyance of the enemy, resolved to penetrate into the country, conducting his motions, however, so as to be near the fleet, which had by this time quitted the bay of St. Lunoire, where it could not ride with safety. The entrance to the bay of St. Cas, near three leagues to the westward.

§ On Friday the eighth of September, General Bligh, with his little army, began his march for Guildo, at the distance of six miles, which he reached in the evening; next day he crossed a little gut or inlet of the sea, at low water, and his troops being incommoded by the peasants, who fired at them from hedges and houses, he sent a priest with a message, in which he intimated that they would not desert, he would reduce their houses to ashes. No regard being paid to this intimation, the houses were actually set on fire as soon as the troops had formed their camp about two miles up the side of the inlet. Next morning he proceeded to the village of Malignon, where, after some smart skirmishing, the French piquets appeared, drawn up in order, to the number of two batteries; but having sustained a few shot from the English field-pieces, and seeing the grenadiers advance, they suddenly dispersed. General Bligh continued his route through the village enclosed in the open ground, about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was this day reconnitred for embarkation, the General determining that the Duke d'Agillon had advanced from Brest to Lombarde, within six miles of the English camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, six squadrons, two regiments of light horse, a body of picked men, and two corps of seamen. The bay of St. Cas was covered by an intrenchment which the enemy had thrown up, to prevent or oppose any disembarkation; and on the outside of this work there was a range of sand-hills extending along shore, which could have served as a cover to the enemy, from whence they might have annoyed the troops in re-embarking; for this reason a proposal was made to the general, that the forces should be re-embarked from a fair open beach on the left, between St. Cas and Guildo; but this advice was rejected, and, indeed, the subsequent operations of the army subverted strongly of blind security and rash presumption. Had the troops decamped in the night without noise, in all probability they would have escaped, and the beach before the French had received the least intelligence of their motion; and, in that case, the whole army, consisting of about six thousand men, might have been re-embarked on the left, between the two inlets of the bay. The three miles, the halts and interruptions were so numerous and frequent, that they did not arrive on the beach of St. Cas till nine. Then the embarkation began, and might have been happily finished, had the transports lain near the shore, and received the men as fast as the boats could have conveyed them on board, without distinction; but a considerable number of the boats carried the men on board the respective transports to which they belonged; a punctilio of disposition by which a great deal of time was unnecessarily consumed. The French troops were brought up in considerable force to cover the embarkation; and a considerable number of sea-officers were stationed on the beach, to superintend the boats' crews, and regulate the service; but, notwithstanding all the caution and authority, some of the boats were otherwise employed than in carrying the happy soldiers. Had all the cutters and small craft belonging to the fleet been properly occupied in this service, the disgrace and disaster of the day would scarce have happened. The British forces had skirmished a little on the march, but no considerable body of the enemy appeared until the embarkation was begun; then they took possession of an eminence by a windmill, and forthwith opened a battery of ten cannon and eight mortars, from whence they fired with considerable effect upon the soldiers on the beach, and on the boats in their passage. They afterwards began to march down the hill, partly covered by a hollow way on their left, with a design to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themselves along the front of the English, and advance against them under shelter of the sand-hills; but in their descent they suffered extremely from the cannon and mortars of the shipping, which made great havoc among them, and into confusion. Their line of march down the hill was staggered, and for some time continued in suspense; then they turned off to one side, extended themselves along a hill to their left, and advanced in a hollow way, from whence they suddenly rushed out to the attack. Though the greater part of the British troops were already embarked, the rear-guard, consisting of all the grenadiers, and half of the first regiment of guards, remained to the number of fifteen hundred, under the command of Major-General Dury. This officer, seeing the French advance, ordered his troops to form in grand divisions, and advance from the bottom of the hill to the bank that charge the enemy before they could be formed on the plain. Had this step been taken when it was first suggested to Mr. Dury, before the French were disengaged from the hollow way, perhaps it might have so far succeeded as to disconcert and throw them into confusion; but by this time they had extended themselves into a very formidable front, and no hope remained of being able to withstand such a superior number. Instead of attempting to charge with the men in an open field, they might have retreated along the beach to a rock on the left, in which progress their right flank would have been secured by the intrenchment; and the enemy could not have pursued them on the same side, because exposed to such a fire from the shipping, as in all probability they could not have sustained. This scheme was likewise proposed to Mr. Dury; but he seemed to be actuated by a spirit of infatuation. The English line being drawn up in uneven ground, began the action with an irregular fire from right to left, which the enemy returned; but their usual fortitude and resolution seemed to forsake them on this occasion. They saw themselves in danger of being surrounded, and cut in pieces; their officers dropped on every side; and all hope of retreat was now intercepted. In this cruel dilemma their spirits failed; they were seized with a panic: they faltered, they broke; and in less than five minutes after the engagement began they fled in the utmost confusion, pursued by the enemy, who no sooner saw them give way than they fell in among them with their bayonets fixed, and made a great caracasse. General Dury being dangerously wounded, Dury being dangerously wounded, the enemy, where he persisted; and this was the fate of a great number, officers as well as soldiers. Many swam towards the boats and vessels, which were ordered to give them all manner of assistance; but by far the greater number were either butchered or cut a conside, rate distance in the water by a small body, however, instead of throwing themselves into the sea, retired to the rock on the left, where they made a stand, until they had exhausted their ammunition, and then surrendered at discretion. The havoc was moreover increased by the shot and shells discharged from the battery which the enemy had raised on the hill. The slaughter would not have been so great, had not the French soldiers been exasperated by the fire from the frigates, which was still maintained even after the English troops were routed; but this was no sooner silenced by a signal from the commodore, than the enemy exhibited a noble example of moderation and humanity, in granting immediate quarter and procuring refreshment for the vanquished.-But one thousand chosen men of the English army were killed and taken prisoners on this occasion: nor was the advantage cheaply purchased by the French troops, among whom the shot and shells from the frigates and ketches had done great execution.-The conduct of the French was the more remarkable, as the British troops in this expedition had been shamefully guilty of marauding, pillaging, burning, and other excesses. War is so dreadful in itself, and so severe in its consequences, that the exercise of generosity and compassion, by which its horrors are mitigated, ought ever to be applauded, encouraged, and imitated. We ought also to use our best endeavours to deserve this treatment at the hands of a civilized enemy. Let us be humane in our turn to those whom the fate of war has subjected to our power: let us, in prosecuting our military operations, maintain the most rigid discipline among the troops, and proceed without seriously abating from all acts of violence and oppression. Thus, a laudable emulation will undoubtedly ensue, and the powers at war vie with each other in humanity and politeness. In other respects, the commander of an invading army will always find his accentuated by the insight he takes the soldiers, and even form friendships among them; serve as guides, messengers, and interpreters; let out their cattle for hire or draft-horses; work in their own persons as day-labourers; discover breaches, bridges, roads, and defiles, and, if artfully managed, communicate many useful hints of intelligence. If great care and circumspection be not exerted in maintaining discipline, and hushing the licentious disposition of the soldiers, such innovations will be productive of nothing but miscarriage and disgrace: for this, at best, is but a pitiable way of carrying on war: and the troops engaged in it are, in some measure, debased by the nature of the service. They are crowded together in transports, where the minute particulars of military order cannot be observed, even though the good of the service greatly depends upon a due observance of these forms. The soldiers grow negligent, and inattentive to cleanliness; and, as an exterior custom, their dress; they become slovenly, slothful, and altogether unfit for a return of duty; they are tumbled about occasionally in ships and boats, landed and re-embarked in a tumultuous manner; under a divided and disorderly command: they are accustomed to retire at the first report of an approaching enemy, and to take shelter on another element: nay, their small pillaging parties are often obliged to fly before unsatisfied peasants. Their duty on such occasions is to be the least unmanly part of a soldier's office; namely, to run, ravage, and destroy. They soon yield to the temptation of pillage, and are habituated to rapine: they give loose to intemperance, riot, and intoxication; commit a thousand excesses; and are employed in such a manner that the officers, who should superintend them, are not only unable to prevent these excesses, but are often themselves in a state of as great disorder as themselves, and procuring refreshment for the soldi the English privates swarmed to such a degree in the channel, that scarce a French vessel durst quit the harbour, and consequently there was little or no booty to be obtained.

In this dearth of legal prizes, some of the adventurers as merchants, at this time, and conspired and ruffled the ships of neutral nations. A Dutch vessel, having on board the baggage and domesties belonging to the Marquis de Pignatelli, ambassador from the court of Spain to the court of Denmark, had three times sucessively by the crews of three different privates, who forced the hatch, rummaged the hold, broke open and ruffled the trunks and boxes of the ambassador, insulted and threatened him with violence, extorted money with threats and promises, and carried off his effects, together with letters of credit, and a bill of exchange. Complaints of these outrages being made to the court of London, the lords of the admiralty promised, in the gazette, a reward of five hundred pounds, without deduction, to any person who should discover the offenders concerned in these acts of piracy. Some of them were detected accordingly, and brought to condign punishment.

§ 11. The Dutch had for some time carried on a very considerable trade, not only in taking the fair advantage of their neutrality, but also in supplying the French with naval stores, and transporting the produce of the French sugar plantations. It was with designs of France to purchase the French privates. The English government, incensed at this unfair commerce, prosecuted with such flagrant partiality for their enemies, issued orders for the cruisers to arrest all ships of neutral powers that should have French property on board; and they had reason to believe their design too frequent succeeded.

A great number of Dutch ships were taken, and condemned as legal prizes, both in England and Jamaica: sometimes the owners met with hard measure, and some were tried with insolvency and barbarity. The subjects of the United Provinces raised a loud clamour against the English, for, having by these captures, violated the law of nations, and the particular treaty of commerce subsisting between Great Britain and the United Provinces, the subjects and monstirons were made to the English ministry, who expostulated, in their turn, with the deputies of the States-general; and the two nations were infamed against each other with the most bitter animosity. The British resident at the Hague, in a conference with the States, represented, that the king, his master, could not hope to see peace speedily re-established, if the neutral princes should assume a right of carrying on the trade of his enemies; that he could not expect his subjects, by whom they were so nearly connected with his subjects, would honestly abandon this fraudulent commerce, and agree that naval stores should be comprehended in the crown. The States were sensible of the justice of these articles of the complaints they had made with an appearance of candour and moderation; declared his majesty's abstinence of the violence which had been committed upon the subjects of the United Provinces; explained the steps which had been taken by the English government to bring the offenders to justice, as well as to prevent such outrages for the future; and assured them that his British majesty had nothing more at heart than to renew and maintain, in full force, the mutual confidence and friendship by which the maritime powers of England and Holland had been so long united.

§ 111. These professions of esteem and affection were not attended with the observance of the sentiment of the Dutch merchants; and the French party, which was both numerous and powerful, employed all their art and influence to exasperate their passions, and widen and stir up the animosity of the English. The French Versailles did not fail to seize this opportunity of insinuation; while, on one hand, their ministers and emissaries in Holland exaggerated the indignities and injuries which the States had sustained from the insolence and rapacity of the English; they, on the other hand, flattered and cajoled them with little advantages in trade, and formal professions of respect. Such was the memorial delivered by the Count D'Auffray, intimating that the empress-queen being unable to receive the commission for acting alone, and actually defend her hereditary dominions in Germany, she had been obliged to withdraw her troops from Ostend and Neu-port; and applied to the French king, as her ally nearest at hand, to garrison these two places, which, however, should be restored at the peace, or sooner, should her imperial majesty think proper. The spirit of the Dutch adventurers, and their pretences with respect to England, appeared with very high colouring in a memorial to the States-general, subscribed by two hundred and sixty-nine traders, composed and presented with equal secrecy and circumspection. In this famous remonstrance they complained, that the violations and unjust depredations committed by the English ships of war and privates on the vessels and effects of them and their fellow-subjects, were not only continued, but daily multiplied; and cruelty and excess carried to such a pitch of wanton barbarity, that the petitioners were forced to implore the assistance of their high mightinesses to protect, in the most efficacious manner, the commerce and navigation, which were the two sources of the power and greatness of the Dutch nation. Should they offer to contribute each his contingent, and to arm at their own charge; and other propositions were made for an immediate augmentation of the marine. While this party industriously exerted all their power and credit to effect a rupture with England, the princess governante employed all her interest and address to divert them from this object, and alarm them with respect to the power and designs of France, against which she earnestly exhorted them to augment their military forces by land, that they might be prepared to defend themselves against all invasion. At the same time she spared no pains to adjust the differences between her husband's country and her father's kingdom; and, with equal doubt, her work was equally of great efficacy in preventing matters from coming to a very dangerous extremity.

§ 1. The whole strength of Great Britain, A. D. 1728. was afterwards increased by the petty descents upon the coasts of France. The continent of America was the great theatre on which her chief vigour was displayed; nor did she fail to exert herself in successful efforts against the French settlements on the coast of Africa. The whole coast of Africa, from Senegal to Gambia, an extent of five hundred miles, had been engrossed by the French, who built Fort Louis within the mouth of the Senegal, extending their factories near three hundred leagues up the coast, and fortified the island of Goree, in which they maintained a considerable garrison. The gun-senega, of which a great quantities is used by the manufacturers of England, being wholly in the hands of the enemy, the English dealers were obliged to buy it at second-hand from the Dutch, who purchased it in France, and paid in excise-pieces for that commodity. This consideration forwarded the plan for annexing the country to the possession of Great Britain. The project was first conceived by Mr. Thomas Cumming, a sensible quaker, who, as a private merchant, had made a study of the commerce of the coast of Senegal, and, on making an adjournment of the commerce, and contrived a personal acquaintance with Amir, the Moonsh King of Leghembu. He found this African prince extremely well disposed towards the subjects of Great Britain, which was an important part of the strategy, and so exasperated against the French, that he declared he should never be easy till they were exterminated from the river Senegal. At that very time he had commenced hostilities against them, and earnestly desired that the king of England would send out an armament to reduce Fort Louis and Goree, with some ships of force to protect the traders. In that case, he promised to join his Britanian major's forces, and grant an exclusive trade to his subjects. Mr. Cumming not only perceived the advantages that would result from such an exclusive privilege with regard to the gum, but foresaw other important consequences of an extensive trade, in a country, which, over and above the important nature of the articles, such as gold dust, elephants' teeth, hides, cotton, bees-wax, slaves, ostrich feathers, indigo, ambergis, and caviar. Elevated with the prospect of an acquisition so valuable to his country, Mr. Cumming formed the plan of an expedition for the conquest of Fort Louis. This was presented to the board of trade, by whom it was approved, after a severe examination; but it required the patriotic zeal and invincible perseverance of Cumming, to surmount a variety of obstacles before it was adopted by the ministry; and even then it was not executed in its full extent. He was abridged of one large ship, and in lieu of six hundred land forces, to be drafted from different regiments, which he in vain demanded, first from the Duke of Cumberland, and afterwards from Lord Ligonier, the lords of the admiralty allotted two hundred marines only for this service. After repeated solicitation, he, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven, obtained an order, that the two annual ships bound to the coast of Guinea should be joined by a sloop and two busses, and make an attempt upon the French settlement in the river Senegal. These ships, however, were detained by contrary weather until the season was too far advanced to admit a probability of success, and therefore the design was postponed. In the beginning of the present year, Mr. Cumming being reinforced with the interest of a considerable part of the city, to whom he had communicated the plan, renewed his application to the ministry, and they resolved to hazard the enterprise. A small squadron was equipped for this expedition, under the command of Captain Marsh, having on board a body of marines, commanded by Major Mason, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a considerable quantity of warlike stores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer; and Mr. Cumming was concerned as principal director and promoter of the expedition. This little armament sailed in the beginning of March; and in their passage touched at the island Teneriffe, where, while the ships supplied themselves with wine and water, Mr. Cumming landed, proceeded in the sloop to Portenderrick, being charged with a letter of credence to his old friend the king of that country, who had favoured him in his last visit with an exclusive trade on that coast, by a formal treaty made in the Arabian language. This prince was now up the country, engaged in a war with his neighbours, called the Diable Moors; and the queen dowager, who remained at Portenderrick, gave Mr. Cumming to understand, that she could not at present spare any troops to join the English in their expedition against Fort Louis; but she assured him, that, should the French be exterminated, she and her subjects would go thither and settle. In the meantime, one of the chiefs, called Prince Amur, despatched a messenger to the king, with a letter in which he declared he would, with all possible diligence, assemble three hundred warriors to join the English troops, and that, in his opinion, the king would reinforce them with a detachment from his army. By this means, Mr. Cumming, with the French and three hundred English, arrived at Portenderrick, and fearing that the enemy might receive intimation of his design, resolved to proceed on the expedition, without waiting for the promised auxiliaries. On the thirtieth day of April, he was a bed anchor, and next day, at four o'clock, discovered the French flag flying upon Fort Louis, situated in the midst of a pretty considerable town, which exhibited a very agreeable appearance. The commodore having made prize of a Dutch ship richly laden with gum, which lay at anchor without the bar, came to anchor in Senegal-road at the mouth of the river, and here he perceived several armed sloops which the enemy had detached to defend the mouth of the river, which is extremely dangerous. All the boats were employed in conveying the stores into the small craft, while three of the sloops continued exchanging fire over a narrow tongue of land with the vessels of the enemy, consisting of two small frigates and a sloop. The enemy cut off the guns and swivels. At length, the channel being discovered, and the wind, which generally blows down the river, chopping about, Captain Millar, of the London buss, seized the opportunity, and immediately dropped anchor on the inside, where he lay till night, exposed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other small vessels, and a regular engagement ensued. This was warmly maintained on both sides, until the busses and one dogger running aground, immediately bulged and were filled with water. Then the troops they contained took to their boats, and with some difficulty reached shore, where they formed a little band, and were soon joined by their companions from the other vessels: so that now the whole amounted to three hundred and ninety marines, besides the detachment of artillery. As they had their account with being attacked by the natives, who lined the shore at some distance, seemingly determined to oppose the descent, they forthwith threw up an intrenchment, and began to disembark the stores, great part of which lay under water. While they were employed in raising the intrenchment, and部份ing the ships, the enemy submitted; and on the succeeding day they were reinforced by three hundred and fifty seamen, who passed the bar in sloops, with their ensigns and colours flying.

§ 5. While the expeditions were in their operations, when two French deputies arrived at the intrenchment, with proposals for a capitulation from the governor of Fort Louis. After some hesitation, Captain Marsh and Major Mason agreed. That all the white people belonging to the French company at Senegal should be safely conducted to France in an English vessel, without being deprived of their private effects, provided all the merchandise and unconfined treasure should be delivered up to the receivers, and all the forts, storehouses, and the expeditions, and every article belonging to the company in that river, should be put into the hands of the English immediately after the capitulation was signed. They promised that the free natives living at Fort Louis should remain in quiet possession of their effects, and in the free exercise of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themselves free, should have the like security. This was agreed upon by all to any other part of the country. The Captains Camp-

b In this occasion Mr. Cumming may be seen to have acted directly contrary to the views and principles of the society, a body of men who never declared to the ministry, that he was fully persuaded his schemes must be accomplished without the assistance of the society. He was not only by no means acquainted himself about them. He also desired, let the consequences be what it might, his brotherhood should not be changeable with what was his own single act. If it was the first military scheme of bell and Walker were immediately sent up the river with a flag of truce, to see the articles signed and executed; but they were so retarded by the rapidity of the stream, that the garrison was left without notice. As soon as the day broke they hoisted their flag, and rowed up towards a battery on a point of the island, where they lay upon their oars very near a full hour, beating the champaign; but no notice was taken of their message. The reserve appearing mysterious, they retired down the river to their intrenchment, where they understood that the negroes on the island were in arms, and had blocked up the French in Fort-Louis, resolving to defend the place to the last. Keppel, in the batteries, and some pieces of cannon, in the immediate capital town. This intelligence was communicated in a second letter from the governor, who likewise informed the English commander, that unless the French direct general should be permitted to remain with the natives, as a surety for that article of the capitulation in which they were concerned, they would allow themselves to be cut in pieces rather than submit. The request being granted, the English forces began their march to Fort-Louis, accompanied by a number of long boats, in which the artillery and stores had embarked. The French, seeing them advance, immediately struck their flag; and Major Mason took possession of the fort. The houses, and most of the pieces of cannon, with treasure and merchandise to a considerable value. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal submitted, and swore allegiance to his Britannic majesty; the neighbouring princes, attended by numerous deputies, presented, compliments of congratulation, and assurances of friendship. The number of free independent aegreos and mulattoes, settled at Senegal, amounted to three thousand, and many of these enjoyed slaves and possessions of their own. The two French factors, Bastide and Gabarus, the latter suffered nine hundred miles further up the river, were included in the capitulation; so that Great Britain, almost without striking a blow, found herself possessed of a conquest, from which, with proper management, she may derive inconceivable riches. This important acquisition was in a great measure, if not entirely, owing to the sagacity, zeal, and indefatigable efforts of Mr. Cumming, who not only formed the plan, and solicited the armament, but also attended the execution of it in person, at the hazard of his life, and to the interruption of his private concerns.

§ III. Fort-Louis being secured with an English garrison, and some armed vessels left to guard the passage of the river, and to protect and distract the enemy, it was deemed necessary to make an attempt upon the island of Goree, which lies at the distance of thirty leagues from Senegal. There the French company had considerable magazines and warehouses, and stored, and loaded into three thousand and five hundred ships, for the West Indies. If the additional force which Mr. Cumming proposed for the conquest of this island had been added to the armament, in all probability the island would have been reduced, and in that case, the nation would have gained the considerable expense of a subsequent expedition against it, under the conduct of Commodore Keppel. At present, the ships by which Goree was attacked were found unequal to the attempt, and the expedition returned in a manner most disagreeable, though the muscarine was attended with little or no damage to the assailants.

§ IV. Scenes of still greater importance were acted in North America, where, exclusive of the fleet and marines, that only had not approach the fort till three in the morning, the conduct of Brigadier-General Forbes, were allotted for the conquest of Fort Du Quene, which stood a great way to the southward, near the river Ohio; and a considerable garrison in Canada, in the reduction of Louisbourg and the island of Cape Breton being an object of immediate consideration, was undertaken with all possible dispatch. Major-General Amherst being joined by Admiral Hood, with the fleet and forces from England, the whole armament, consisting of one hundred and fifty-seven sail, took their departure from the harbour of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, on the twenty-eighth of May, and on the last day of June part of the transports anchored in the bay of Gabarus, opposite the westward of Louisbourg. The garrison of this place, commanded by the Chevalier Drucour, consisted of two thousand five hundred regular troops, three hundred militia, formed of the burghers, and towards the end of the siege they were reinforced by three hundred and fifty Canadians, including threescore Indians. The harbour was secured by six ships of the line, and five frigates, three of which the enemy sunk across the harbour's mouth, in order to render it inaccessible to the English ships. The fortifications were in bad repair, many parts of them crumbling down the covered way, and several bastions expressed in such a manner, as to be thought unable to resist the attack. All the magazines were blown up, and batteries erected; but there were some intermediate places, which could not be properly secured; and in one of these the English troops were disembarked. The disposition being made for landing, a detachment, in several sloops under convoy, passed by the mouth of the harbour towards Lorembee, in order to draw the enemy's attention that way, while the landing should really be effected on the other side of the town. On the eighth day of June, the troops being assembled in the boats, before day-break, in three divisions, several sloops and frigates, that were stationed along shore in the bay of Gabarus, began to scour the beach with their shot; and after the fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats, containing the division on the left, were rowed towards the shore, under the command of Brigadier-General Wolfe, an accomplished officer, who, in the sequel, displayed very extraordinary proofs of military genius. At the same time the two other divisions, on the right and in the centre, commanded by the Brigadiers Whittmore and Laurence, made a show of landing, in order to divide the enemy's attention, and distract the enemy's fire. The enemy was completely taken in the rear, and the surf, by which many boats were overset, and a very severe fire of cannon and musketry from the enemy's batteries, which did considerable execution, Brigadier Wolfe purposed his point with admirable composure and deliberation. The soldiers leaped into the water with the most eagerness and alacrity, and, gaining the shore, attacked the enemy in such a manner, that in a few minutes they abandoned their works and artillery, and fled in the utmost confusion. The other divisions landed also; but without an obdurate opposition; and the stores, with the artilleries, being brought on shore, the town of Louisbourg was formally invested. The difficulty of landing stores and implements on this boisterous weather, and the nature of the ground, which was very marshy, was unfit for the conveyance of heavy cannon, retarded the operations of the siege. Mr. Amherst made his approaches with great circumspection, securing his camp and works, and the establishment of the stores of Canadians, of which he imagined there was a considerable body behind him on the island, as well as from the fire of the French shipping in the harbour, which would otherwise have annoyed him extremely.

§ V. The governor of Louisbourg, having destroyed the grand battery, which was detached from the body of the place, and recalled his out-posts, prepared for making a vigorous defence. A very severe fire, well-directed, was maintained against these posts, and they works from the town, the island battery, and the ships in the harbour; and the Apollo, of fifty guns; the Chervis, Birca, Eidele, Diana, and Echon frigates. divers sallies were made, though without much effect. In the meantime Brigadier Wolfe, with a strong detachment, had marched round the north-east part of the harbour, and taken possession of the Light-house point, where he erected several batteries against the ships and the island fortification, which last was soon silenced. On the nineteenth day of June, the Echo, a French frigate, was taken by the English cruisers after having escaped from the harbour: from the officers on board of this ship the admiral learned that the Bizarre, another frigate, had sailed from thence on the day of the disembarkation, and the Comete had successfully followed her example. Besides the regular approaches to the town, the English used to send over the immediate command and inspection of General Amherst, divers batteries were raised by the detached corps under Brigadier Wolfe, who exerted himself with amazement, and grippingly incommenced the enemy, both of the town and the shipping. On the twenty-first day of July the three great ships, the Entrepreneante, Capricieux, and Celebre, were set on fire by a bomb-shell, and burned to ashes; so that none remained but the Prudent and Debenarue, which the admiral undertook to destroy. For this purpose, in the night between the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth days of the month, the boats of the squadron were in two divisions detached from the harbour under the command of two young captains, Laforey and Balfour. They accordingly penetrated, in the dark, through a terrible fire of cannon and musketry; and boarded the enemy sword in hand.

The Prudent, being a gound, was set on fire, and destroyed; but the other vessel was seized by the English, and thus was the triumph of the siege. In the prosecution of the siege, the admiral and general co-operated with remarkable harmony; the former cheerfully assisting the latter with cannon and other implements, with detachments of marines to maintain posts on shore, with parties of seamen to act as pioneers, and concur in working the guns and mortars. The fire of the town was managed with equal skill and activity, and kept up with great perseverance, till, at length, their shipping being all taken and destroyed, the casue, ruined in the two principal bastions, forty out of fifty-two pieces of cannon dismounted, broke, or rendered useless, and divers practicable breaches effected, the governor, in a letter to Mr. Amherst, proposed a capitulation on the same articles that were granted to the English at Port Mahon. In answer to this proposal he was given to understand, that he and his garrison must surrender themselves prisoners of war, otherwise he might now morning expect a general assault by the shipping under Admiral Boscawen. The Chevalier Ducruet, permed at the severity of these terms, replied, that he would, rather than consent, defend his post, and stand an assault, which the admiral and general of the colony presented a petition from the traders and inhabitants of the place, in consequence of which he submitted. On the twenty-seventh day of July, by a capitulation, signed by Major Farquhar, took possession of the western gate; and Brigadier Whitmore was detached into the town, to see the garrison lay down their arms, and deliver up their colours on the esplanade, and to post the necessary guards on the stores, magazines, and ramparts. Thus at the expense of about four hundred men, killed and wounded, the English obtained possession of the important island of Cape Breton, and the strong town of Louisbourg: in which the victory found two hundred and twenty-two pieces of cannon, with eighteen mortars, and a considerable quantity of stores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were sent to France in English bottoms; but the garrison was joined with the seamen, marines, and other mariners, amounting in all to five thousand six hundred and thirty-seven prisoners, were transported to England.

The loss of Louisbourg was the more severely felt by the English, who had been attention of so many considerable ships and frigates. The particulars of this transaction were immediately brought to England, in a vessel despatched for that purpose, with Captain Amherst, brother to the commander; who was intrusted with eleven pieces of colour taken at Louisbourg: these were, by his majesty's order, carried in pompous parade, escorted by detachments of horse and foot guards, with kettle-drums and trumpets, from the palace of Kensington to St. Paul's cathedral, where they were deposited as trophies, under a discharge of cannon, and other noisy expressions of triumph and exultation. Indeed, the public rejoicings for the conquest of Louisbourg were diffused through the British dominions, and addresses of congratulation were presented to the king by a great number of flourishing towns and corporations.

§ VI. After the reduction of Cape Breton, some ships were detached with a body of troops under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Rollo, to take possession of the island of St. John, which also lies in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and, by its fertility in corn and cattle, had, since the beginning of the war, supplied Quebec with a great quantity of provisions. It was likewise the asylum to which the French neutrals of Newfoundland fled for shelter from the English government; and the retreat from whence they and the Indians used to make their sudden irruptions into Nova Scotia, where they perpetrated the most inhuman barbarities on the defenceless subjects of Great Britain. The number of inhabitants amounted to four thousand one hundred, who submitted to the king's arms, loaded with the deathless and the session of the governor's quarters, where he found several scalps of Englishmen, whom the savages had assassinated, in consequence of the encouragement they received from their French patrons and allies, who gratified them with a large present of goods. The town and the fort was stocked with above ten thousand head of black cattle, and some of the farmers raised each twelve hundred bushels of corn annually for the market of Quebec.

§ VII. The joy and satisfaction arising from the conquer of Louisbourg and St. John was not a little checked by the disaster which befell the main body of the British forces in America, under the immediate conduct of General Abercrombie, and the loss of the fort of the lakes George and Champlain, as the chief object of his enterprise, with a view to secure the frontiers of the British colonies, ready for a passage for the winter, and the conquest of Canada. In the beginning of July his forces, amounting to near seven thousand regular troops, and ten thousand provincials, embarked on the lake George, in the neighborhood of Lake Champlain, on board of nine hundred boats, and one hundred and thirty-five whale boats, with provision, artillery, and ammunition; several pieces of cannon being mounted on rafts to cover the proposed landing, which was next day effected without opposition. With the advantage of this success, the British were situated on a tongue of land, extending between lake George and a narrow gut that communicates with Lake Champlain. This fortification was, on three sides, surrounded by water and woods, where they were supplied with a morass. The English troops being disembarked, were immediately formed into three columns, and began their march to the enemy's advanced posts, consisting of one battalion, encamped behind a breast-work of logs, which they now abandoned with precipitation, after having set them on fire, and burned their tents and implements. The British forces continued their march in the same order; but the route lying through a thick wood that did not admit of a regular progression or passing-five white boats being extremely ignorant, the troops were bewildered, and the columns broken by falling in one upon another. Lord Howe, being advanced at the head of the right centre column, encountered a French detachment which likewise lost their way in the retreat from the advanced post, and, a warm skirmish ensuing, the enemy were routed with considerable loss, a good number were killed, taken prisoners, and from the destruction of two taken prisoners, including five officers. This party advanced, after the loss of Lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, unhesitatingly regretted, as a young nobleman of the most promising talents, who had distinguished himself in a peculiar manner in his career, ac-

I may not be amiss to observe, that a cavalier, which Admiral Knowles had built at an enormous expense to the nation, which Louis-bourg remained in the hands of the English in the last war, was, in the tivity, and rigid observation of military discipline, and had acquired the esteem and affection of the soldiers by his generosity, awakened by manners, and engagements.

The general, however, the troops were greatly fatigued and disordered from want of rest and refreshment, thought it advisable to march back to the landing-place, where they reached about eight in the morning. Then he deterred Lieutenant-Colonel Bradstreet, with a body of three thousand men, chiefly provincials, to execute a plan which this officer had formerly proposed; and Fort Frontenac, situated on the north side of the river St. Lawrence, just where it takes its origin from the lake Ontario.

To the side of this lake he penetrated with his detachment, and embarking in some sloops and batteaux, provided for the purpose, landed within a mile of Fort Frontenae, the garrison of which, consisting of one hundred and ten men, with a few Indians, immediately surrendered at discretion. Considering the importance of this post, which, in a great measure, commanded the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, and served as a magazine to the more southern castles, the French general was inexcusable for leaving it in such a defenceless condition. The fortification itself was unconsidered and ill contrived; nevertheless, it consisted of fifty pieces of cannon, sixteen small mortars, and an immense quantity of merchandise and provisions, deposited for the use of the French forces detached against Brigadier Forbes, their western garrisons, and Indian allies, and to prevent the subsistence of the corps commanded by M. de Levis, on his enterprise against the Mohawk river. Mr. Bradstreet not only reduced the fort without bloodshed, but also made himself master of all the enemy's shipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed vessels, some of which earned eighteen guns. Two of these Mr. Bradstreet conveyed to Oswego, whether he returned with his troops, after he had destroyed Fort Frontenae, with all the artillery, stores, provision, and provisions, more than was contained in one consequence of this exploit, the French troops to the southward were exposed to the hazard of starving; but it is not easy to conceive the general's reason for giving orders to abandon and destroy a fort, which, if properly strengthened and sustained, might have rendered the English masters of the lake Ontario, and grievously harassed the enemy, both in their commerce and expeditions to the westward.

Indeed, great part of the Indian trade centred at Frontenae, to which place the Indians annually repaired from all parts of America, some of them at the distance of a thousand miles, and here exchanged their furs for European commodities. So much did the French traders excel the English in the acquisition of the latter, that British traders, from their number of the enemy, sold at three times the price of the same articles in France, loaded with the expense of a tedious and dangerous navigation, from the sea to the source of the river St. Lawrence.

§ IX. In all probability, the destruction of Fort Frontenae facilitated the expedition against Fort Du Quesne, intrusted to the conduct of Brigadier Forbes, who, with his little army, began his march in the beginning of July from Philadelphia to the river Ohio, a prodigious tract of country very little known, destitute of military roads, encum-

be reinforced in his turn; for General Amherst no sooner heard of his disaster than he returned with the troops from Cape Breton to New England, where he left a strong garrison in Louisbourg. At the head of six regiments he began his march to Albany, about the middle of September, in order to join the forces on the lake, that they might undertake some other service before the season should be exhausted. Lieutenant-Colonel Abercrombie, with six companies of the royal Americans, with the batteaux, and a body of rangers, to take possession of a saw-mill in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, which the enemy had also abandoned. The general advanced again towards Ticonderoga, where, he understood from the prisoners, the enemy had assembled eight batteaux, with a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in all to six thousand. These, they said, being encamped before the fort, were employed in making a formidable intrenchment, where they intended to wait for a reinforcement of three thousand men, who had been de-Queene, and advanced Colonel Bouquet, with two thousand men, about fifty miles further to a place called Lyl-Henning, this officer detached Major Grant, at the head of eight hundred men, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks. The enemy perceiving him approach sent a body of troops against him, sufficient to surround his whole detachment: a very severe action began, which the English, from among their dead for three hours against cruel odds, but at length, being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to give way, and retired in disorder to Lyl-Henning, with the loss of about three hundred killed and taken; in which was Major Grant, who was carried prisoner to Fort du Queene, and nineteen officers. Notwithstanding this mortifying check, Brigadier Forbes advanced with the army, resolved to prosecute his operations with vigour; but the enemy, dreading the prospect of a step, disabled and abanoned the fort and retired down the river Ohio, to their settlements on the Mississippi. They quitted the fort on the twenty-fourth day of November, and next day it was possessed by the British forces. As for the Indians of this country, they seemed hearty to renounce their connections with France, and be perfectly reconciled to the government of its Britanic majesty. Brigadier Forbes having repaired the defences at Engeon Duque, in consequence of Pittsburgh, secured it with a garrison of provincials, and concluded treaties of friendship and alliance with the Indian tribes. Then he marched back to Philadelphia, and in his retreat he found near Lyl-Henning, for the defence of Pennsylvania: but he himself did not long survive these transactions, his constitution having been exhausted by the incredible fatigue of the service. Thus have we given a particular detail of all the remarkable operations by which this part of Great Britain acquired many important advantages; and, indeed, paved the way for the reduction of the continent of America; the reader will be convinced that, notwithstanding the defeat at Ticonderoga, and the disaster of the advanced party in the neighborhood of Fort du Queene, the conduct of Great Britain secured many important advantages; and, indeed, paved the way for the reduction of the continent of America, and conquest of all Canada. In the meantime, the Admirals Boscawen and Hardy, having left a considerable squadron at Halifax in Nova Scotia, returned with four ships of the line to England, where they arrived in the beginning of November, after having given chase to six large French ships, which they desirous to the westward coast, but could not overtake or bring to an engagement.

§ X. The conquest of the French settlement in the river Senegal being deemed imperfect and incomplete, whilst France still kept possession of the island of Gooee, the ministry of Great Britain resolved to crown the campaign in Africa by the reduction of this fortress. For that purpose Commodore Keppel, brother to the Earl of Albemarle, was vested with the command of a squadron, consisting of four ships of the line, several frigates, two bomb vessels, and some transports, having on board seventy-two hundred men of the regular troops, commanded by Colonel Worgie, and embarked in the harbour of Cork in Ireland, from whence this whole armament took their departure on the eleventh day of November. After a tempestuous passage, in which they touched at the isle of Teneriffe, they arrived at Gooee in the latter end of December, and the commodore made a disposition for attacking this island, which was remarkably strong by nature, but very indifferently fortified. Gooee is a small barren island, extending about three quarters of a mile in length, of a triangular form; and on the south-west side rising into a rocky hill, on which the palace fort of St. Michael is situated. There is another, still more inaccessible, called St. Francis, towards the other extremity of the island: and several batteries were raised around its sweep, mounted with about one hundred pieces of cannon, and four mortars. The French of 8000 men, under the command of M. de St. John de la Motte, and his garrison amounted to about three hundred men, exclusive of as many negro inhabitants. The flat-bottomed boats, for disembarking the troops, being hoisted out, and disposed along-side of the different vessels, were stationed, and the ships weighed on the twenty-second of November, and the engagement began with a shell from one of the ketches. This was a signal for the great ships, which poured in their broadsides without intermission, and the fire was returned with equal vivacity from all the batteries of the island. In the course of the action the cannonading from the ships became so severe and terrible, that the garrison concluded that all the efforts of the governor, who acquitted himself like a man of honour; but he was obliged to strike his colours, and surrender at discretion, after a short but warm dispute, in which the ships lost not exceed one hundred men killed and wounded. The success of the day was the more extraordinary, as the French garrison had not lost a man, except one negro killed. The French were so incomparably more wounded that their wounded was very inconceivable. While the attack lasted, the opposite shore of the continent was lined with a concourse of negroes, assembled to view the combat, who expressed their sentiments and surprise in loud clamour and shouts, and were engaged with awe and astonishment at the power and execution of the British squadron. The French colours being struck, as a signal of submission, the commodore sent a detachment of marines on shore, who disarmed the garrison, and hooted the British flag upon the castle of St. Michael. In the meantime, the governor and the rest of the prisoners were secured among the shipping. Thus the important island of Senegal was in the first instance set free with two trading vessels that chanced to be at anchor in the road, and stores, money, and merchandise, to the value of twenty thousand pounds. Part of the troops being too far distant, the commodore, Major Newton, together with three ships for his service, the squadron being watered and refreshed from the continent, that part of which is governed by one of the Jalo kings, and the prisoners, with their baggage, being discharged in three cartel vessels to the commodore; set sail for Senegal, and reinforced Fort-Louis with the rest of the troops, under Colonel Worgie, who was at this juncture favoured with a visit by the King of Leghville: but was not allowed to partake of the bonfire set up in great humour, or maintain the disposition he professed to favour the commerce of Great Britain. True it is, he was desirous of engaging the English in his quarrels with some neighbouring nations, and such engagements were cautiously and politically avoided, because it was the interest of Great Britain to be upon good terms with every African prince who could promote and extend the commerce of his subjects.

§ XI. Commodore Keppel having reduced Gooee, and reinforced the garrison of Senegal, returned to England, where all his ships arrived, after a very tempestuous voyage, in which the squadron had been dispersed. This expedition was considered as one of the most important adventures in the war, and was much talked of; but was at the same time reproved by some, who thought the command of the commodore was not in the right disposition: so little dependence can be placed on the faith of such barbarian princes, with whom it is even a disgrace for any civilized nation to be in alliance, whatever commercial advantages may arise from the connexion.

destroyed four privateers riding under its protection; but its valor appeared much more conspicuous in a subsequent engagement, which happened in the month of November. Being detached on a cruise in his own ship, the Buckingham, by Commodore Moore, who commanded at the Leeward islands, he fell in with the Weasel sloop, commanded by Captain Boles, between the islands of Montserrat and Guadalupe. The engagement was immediately discovered, where they engaged in a fleet of nineteen sail, under convoy of a French ship of war carrying seventy-four cannon, and two large frigates. Captain Tyrell immediately gave chase with all the sail he could bear; but he was so much hindered by the number of ships he had to engage, that he was forced to leave off, received a broadside from the large ship, which, however, she sustained without much damage: nevertheless, Mr. Tyrell ordered his commander to keep aloof, as he could not be supposed able to bear the shock of large metal, and he himself prepared for the engagement. The enemy's large ship, the Florissant, though of much greater force than the Buckingham, instead of lying-to for his coming up, made a running fight with her stern-chasers, while the two frigates annoyed him in his course, sometimes taking him fore and aft, and sometimes lying on his quarter. At length he came alongside of the Florissant, within pistol-shot, and poured in a broadside, which did not produce any considerable effect, but was answered, with equal vivacity, and a furious engagement ensued. Captain Tyrell was wounded in the face, and lost three fingers of his right hand: so that, being entirely disabled, he could neither order nor direct the conduct of the ship, his first lieutenant, Mr. Marshal, who continued the battle with great gallantry until he lost his life: then the charge devolved to the second lieutenant, who acquitted himself with equal honour, and sustained a desperate fight against four enemy's ships; and the officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themselves with equal vigour and deliberation, and Captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, piled his small arms so effectually, as to drive the French ship of the second rate, and force her to strike. The officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themselves with equal vigour and deliberation, and Captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, piled his small arms so effectually, as to drive the French ship of the second rate, and force her to strike. The officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themselves with equal vigour and deliberation, and Captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, piled his small arms so effectually, as to drive the French ship of the second rate, and force her to strike.
was mortally wounded in a rally at the siege of Madras. Admiral Pocokoe, having, to the best of his power, repaired the damaged and the sail again set the whole squadron in order to attempt the relief of Fort St. David's; but notwithstanding his utmost endeavours, he could not reach it in time to be of any service. On the thirteenth day of the month of July, the Pocokoe sloop, being plundered, and the French squadron stood away early next morning, nor was it in his power to come up with them, though he made all possible efforts for that purpose. Then receiving intelligence that the admiral's was surprised to the enemy, he returned again to Madras, in order to refresh his squadron. On the twenty-fifth of July, he sailed a third time in quest of M. d'Apêche, and in two days perceived his squadron, consisting of eight ships of the line and a frigate, at anchor in the road of Pondicherry. They did not sooner descried him advancing than they stood out to sea as before, and he continued to chase, in hopes of bringing them to an engagement; but all his endeavours proved fruitless till the third of August, when, having obtained the weather-gage, he bore down upon them in order of battle. The engagement began with great impetuosity on both sides; but in little more than ten minutes M. d'Apêche set fire to sail and bore away, his whole squadron following his example, and maintaining a running ght in a very irregular line. The British admiral then signalled the general chase, which the enemy perceiving, thought proper to cut away their boats, and so they escaped, and the sail there joined to them. They were escaped, by favour of the night, into the road of Pondicherry, and Mr. Pocokoe anchored with his squadron off Carcar, a French settlement, having thus obtained an undisturbed victory, with the loss of thirty men killed, and one hundred and sixteen wounded, including Commodore Stevens and Captain Martin, though their wounds were not dangerous. The number of killed and wounded on board the French squadron amounted, according to reports, to five hundred and forty; and their fleet was so much damaged, that in the beginning of September their commodore sailed for the island of Bourbon, in the same latitude with Madagascar, in order to refit; thus leaving the command and sovereignty of the Indian seas to the Eng- lish admiral, whose fleet, from the beginning of this campaign, had been much inferior to the French squadron in number of ships and men, as well as in weight of metal.

§ XV. Mr. Lally having reduced Cuddalore and Fort St. David's, resolved to extort a sum of money from the King of Tanjore, on pretence that, in the last war, he had granted an obligation to the French governor for a certain sum, which had never been paid, and was matched with a body of three thousand men into the do- minions of Tanjore, and demanded seventy-two, which was extravagant demand being rejected, he plundered Naccare, a trading town of the sea-coast, and afterwards advanced to the capital; but he had pur- chased the siege till a breach was made, his provisions and ammunition beginning to fail, several vigorous sallies being made by the forces of the King of Tanjore, and the place well defended by European gunners, sent from the English garrison at Trichinopoly, he found himself obliged to raise the siege and retreat with precipitation, leaving his cannon behind. He arrived at Carail about the middle of August, and from hence retired with his army towards the end of September. He afterwards cantonned his troops in the province of Arcot, entered the city without opposition, and began to make preparations for the siege of Madras, which shall be recorded among the inci- dents of the succeeding year. In the meantime, the land- forces belonging to the East India company were so much out-numbered by the reinforcements which arrived with Mr. Lally, that they could not pretend to keep the field, but were obliged to remain on the defensive, and provide as well as they could for the security of Fort St. George, and the other settlements in that part of India.

§ XVI. Having particularized the events of the war which has taken place this year in Europe, Africa, and Asia, those remote scenes in which the interest of Great Britain was immediately and intimately concerned, it now remains to record the incidents of the military operations in Germany, supported by British subsidies, and enforced by British force. While in the West, from whose solitary friendship the British nation can never reap any solid benefit, and to defend a foreign elector, in whose behalf she had already lavished an immeasurable sum of money, from whence she obtained not the smallest benefit, and whose services were not necessary to the support of the French government, she has been nearly engaged in those of the Swedes, who, from the defection of her allies, have been left to bear the brunt of the French army. Both Empresses had been engaged in a sort of civil war, and the disaffection of the emperor of Russia to his mother, and the changes in the coalition and in the disposition of her forces, have rendered it difficult if not impossible for the British government to form a plan to secure her victories. The Radetzky, who had been so long the enemy of Austria, has now turned his arms against the Swedes, and accordingly drove them before him almost without opposition. By the beginning any provisions of fresh water, the garrison surrendered in twelve days, on capitulation, after having sustained a severe bombardment. of January they had evacuated all Prussian Pomerania, and Leewaladt invaded their dominions in his turn. He, in a little time, made himself master of all Swedish Pom- erania, except Stralsund and the island of Rugen, and pos- sesses himself of several magazines which the enemy had erected. The Austrian army, after their defeat at Breis- lau, had retired into Bohemia, where they were cantonized, the head-quarters being fixed at Koniggratz. The King of Prussia, having clothed all the troops of the most christian monarch to the campaign, to remove the receivers who had been employed in any part of the direction, receipt, and administration of the duties and revenues of Hanover, and appoint others in their room. The Breislau business was settled at the town of Schweinitz, which he circumscribed with a blockade, sent detachments from his army cantonised in the neighbourhood of Breislau, to penetrate into the Austrian or Silesian territory. To John Faida, or his attorneys; that the magistrates of the towns, districts, and common- alities, as well as those who directed the administration of particular states and provinces, should deliver to the said John Faida, or his attorneys, the produce of six years of the duties and revenues belonging to the said towns, dis- tricts, and provinces, reckoning from the first of January in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one, together with an authentic account of the sums they had paid during that term to the preceding sovereign, and of the charges necessarily incurred. It appears from the nature of this decree, which was dated on the eighteenth day of October, that immediately after the conventions of Closter-Seven, France had determined to change the government and system of the electorate, contrary to an express article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it surrendered on the 23rd of March 1712. France inten- ded to take advantage of the cessation of arms, in the purchasing places and provinces which were not yet subdued; for, by the decree above mentioned, the administration of John Faida extended to the countries which might here- after be conquered; and as at no time neither in a large, nor considerable sum, the Prussian troops began to put their monarch's threats in execution. He justified these pro- ceedings, by declaring that the enemy had practised the same, and had even conquered the country of his allies; but bow the practice of his declared enemies, in the countries which they had invaded and subdued in the common course of war, should justify him in pillaging and oppressing a people, with whom neither he nor his allies were at war, it is not easy to conceive. As little can we reconcile this conduct to the character of a prince, assuming the title of protector of the protestant religion, which is the established faith among those very Saxons who were subjected to his dominion, not, as promised to remove thereof, and to settle his dominions in the Kingdom of Great Britain and Prussia, but even solicited the court of France to receive him among the number of its dependents; for, on the eighteenth day of October, the minister of the Duc de Deuxponts, in behalf of the royal pretender, the landgrave, the plan of a treaty found on the following conditions: The landgrave, having expressed an ardent desire of attaching himself wholly to France, proposed these articles: That he should enter into no engagement against the king and his allies; and give no assistance, directly or indirectly, to the enemies of his majesty and his allies: that he should never give his vote, in the general or particular assemblies of the empire, against his majesty's interest; but, on the contrary, employ his interest, jointly with France, to quiet the troubles of the empire: that, for this end, his troops, which had served in the Hanoverian army, should engage in the service of France, on condition that they should not act in the present war against his Britannic majesty: that, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, his most christian majesty should restore the dominions of the landgrave in the same condition they were in when subdued by the French forces: that these dominions should be exempted from all further contribu- tions, either in money, corn, forage, wood, or cattle, though already imposed on the subjects of Hesse; and the French troops pay for all that is supplied; in which case the landgrave should exact no toll for wareike stores, provisions, or other articles of that nature, which might pass through his dominions: that the King of France should confirm all that the Electors, Princes, and Rights of the house of Hesse-Cassel, particularly the act of

assurance signed by his son, the hereditary prince, with regard to religion; use his interest with the emperor and the empress-queen, that in consideration of the immense losses and his most serious suffering, and of the French invasion of his country, and of the great sums he should lose with England in arms and subsidies by this accommodation, he might be excused from furnishing his contingent to the army of the empire, as well as from paying the interest due by him, and the passage money of the troops, and if, in renovation of this convention, the states of his sovereign should be attacked, his most Christian Majesty should afford the most speedy and effectual succours. This negotiation was carried on the due respect of the reading upon the resolution of the Diet, and if he be not blinded by the darkest mists of prejudice, exhibit a clear and distinct idea of a genuine German ally. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel had been led with the good things of England, even in time of peace, when his friendship could not avail, nor his averring prejudice, the interests of Great Britain: but he was retained in that season of tranquillity as a friend, on whose services the most unimportant, expedients might be placed in any future storm or commotion. How far he readily concurred in this confidence and favour might have been determined by reflecting on his conduct during the former war, and in the course of which his troops were hired to the King of Great Britain, and his government, alternately, as the scale of convenience happened to preponderate. Since the commencement of the present troubles, he had acted as a mercenary to Great Britain, although he was a principal in a plan that stood connected with a solemn treaty, as well as by all the ties of gratitude and honour: but now that the cause of Hanover seemed to be on the decline, and his own dominions had suffered by the fate of the war, he not only appeared willing to abandon his benefactor and ally, but even sued to be exalted in the service of his adversary. This intended defection was, however, prevented by a sudden turn of fortune, which he could not possibly foresee; and his troops continued to act in conjunction with the Hanoverians.

§ XXI. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel was not singular in making such advances to the French monarch. The Duke of Brunswick, still more nearly connected with the King of Great Britain, used such uncommon expedition in detaching himself from the totering fortune of Hanover, that in ten days after the convention of Closter-Seven he had concluded a treaty with the courts of Vienna and Versailles: so that the negotiation must have been begun before that convention took place. On the twentieth day of September his minister at Vienna, by virtue of full powers from the Duke of Brunswick, accepted and signed the convention between the French king and his Austrian ally, thought proper to impose. These importations, that his most Christian Majesty should keep possession of the cities of Brunswick and Wolfenbuttel during the war, and make use of the artillery, arms, and military stores deposited in those arsenals; that the duke's forces, on their return from the camp of the Duke of Cumberland, should be disembarked and disarmed; and take an oath, that they should not, during the present war, serve against the king or his allies: that the duke should be permitted to maintain a battallion of foot, and two squadrons of horse, for the guard of his person and family, and that he should be furnished with money and other necessaries from the exchequer. Mar-eschal Richelieu and the intendant of his army should subsist on their present footing: that the duke should furnish his contingent in money and troops, agreeably to the laws of the empire: that his forces should immediately join the army of the empire, and be under the orders of those who should be appointed for that purpose. If the Duke of Brunswick should order his minister at Ratisbon to vote conformably to the resolutions of the Diet, approved and confirmed by the emperor. In consideration of all these concessions, he undertook to support the French king, and to execute proposals that would gratiously promised that neither his revenues nor his treasure should be touched, nor the administration of justice invaded; and that nothing further should be demanded, but winter-quarters for the regiments which should pass that season in the country of Brunswick. How scrupulously soever the duke might have intended to observe the articles of this treaty, his intentions were frustrated by the conduct of his brother Prince Ferdinand, who, being invested with the command of the Hanoverian army, had ordered to resume the operations of war against the enemy, detained the troops of Brunswick, as well as his nephew the hereditary prince, notwithstanding the treaty which his brother had entered into with the French court; and the Duke of Brunswick, upon his son to quit the army, and make a tour to Holland. The duke wrote an expostulatory letter to Prince Ferdi- nand, pathetically complaining that he had seduced his troops from the avowed designs of his brother upon the prince's pursuing his journey, as well as upon the return of the troops; and threatening, in case of non-compliance, to use other means that should be more effectual. Notwithstanding this warm remonstrance, Prince Ferdinand adhered to his plan. He detained the troops and the hereditary prince, who, being fond of the service, in a little time signalized himself by very extraordinary acts of bravery and conduct; and means were found to reconcile his father à propos that expressly contracted his engagements with the courts of Vienna and Versailles.

§ XXII. The defeat of the French army at Rossbach, and the retreat of the Russians from Pomerania, had entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire. The French king was soon obliged to abandon his conquests on that side of the Rhine, and his threats sounded no longer terrible in the ears of the Hanoverian and Prussian allies. At little formidable were the denunciations of the empress, who had, by a decree of the Aulic council, communicated to the diet certain mandates, issued in the month of August in the preceding year, on pain of the ban of the empire, and with all the avowed discontents of the King of Great Britain, Elector of Hanover, and the other princes acting in concert with the King of Prussia. The French court likewise published a virulent memorandum, after the convention of Closter-Seven had been violated, and set aside, drawing an invincible parallel between the conduct of the French king and the proceedings of his Britannic majesty; in which the latter is taxed with breach of faith, and almost every meanness that could sting the character of a monarch. And in answer to the emperor’s decree and this virulent charge, Baron Gimmimgin, the electoral minister of Brunswick Lueneburg, present to the diet, in November, a long memorial, recapitulating the important services his sovereign had done to the house of Austria, and the ungrateful return he had reaped, in the queen’s refusing to assist him, when his dominions were threatened with an invasion. He endeavored to prove the contrary, but likewise extenuating the noble exhortation, and encouragement, and even joined the enemies of the elector, in contempt of her former encouragements, and directly contrary to the constitution of the empire. He refuted every argument in this charge which his minister had brought against him, as well his virulent libel, retorted the imputations of perfidy and ambition, and, with respect to France, justified every particular of his own conduct.

§ XXIII. While the French and Hanoverian armies remained in their winter-quarters, the former at Zell, and the latter at Lueneburg, divers petty enterprises were executed by detachments with various success. The Hanoverian General Juncheim, having taken post at Halberstadt and Quedlinburg, from whence he made excursions even to the gates of Brunswick, and kept the French army in continual alarm, was visited by a large body of the enemy, who compelled him to retire to Aeschersleben, committed great excesses in the town of Halberstadt, and with naked and shameless violence seized and carried off hostages for the payment of contributions. General Hardenberg, another Hanoverian officer, having dislodged the French detachments that occurred in Burgh, Vogelsack, and Rüthenhude, and cleared the whole territory before the gates of Halberstadt, the Duke de Broglio assembled a considerable corps of troops that were cantonned at Otzberg, Rothenburg, and the adjacent country, and advancing to Bremen, demanded a surrender of it. Perceiving that, in case of refusal, he would have recourse to extremities, and punish the inhabitants severely, should they make the least opposition. When their deputies waited upon him, to desire a short time for deliberation, he told them, that such favours, as Richelem’s orders are peremptory, and admit of no delay.

He accordingly ordered the cannon to advance; the wall was scaled, and the gates would have been forced open had not the magistrates, at the earnest importunity of the people, resolved to comply with the demand. A second detachment was immediately despatched to the Duke de Broglio, signifying their compliance; and the gates being opened, the enemy marched into the city at midnight, after having promised unconditional surrender, on the hope of being released from the prejudice of its rights and prerogatives, and no outrage offered to the privileges of the regency, to the liberty, religion, and commerce of the inhabitants. This conquest, however, was not determined, but the army, under the command of Prince George of Holstein Gottorp, the whole army was put in motion, and advanced to the city of Bremen about the middle of February. The enemy were dislodged from Rothenburg, Otzberg, and Verden, and they abandoned the city of Bremen at the approach of the Hanoverian general, who took possession of it without opposition.

§ XXIV. By this time the court of Versailles, being dissatisfied with the conduct of the Duke de Richelieu, had recalled that general from Germany, where his place was supplied by the Count de Clermont, to the general satisfaction of the army. The latter did not attempt to enter Hanover, but marched directly from Hanover, took possession of the city of Halberstadt, and joined his predecessor in the army, of which he had committed many flagrant and inhuman acts of rapine and oppression. The new commander found his master’s forces reduced to a deplorable condition, by the accidents of war, and dis- tempers arising from hard duty, severe weather, and the want of necessaries. As he could not pretend, with such a wretched remnant, to oppose the designs of Prince Friederich of Brunswick, who had advanced towards the rear of the Hanoverian army, and March 4th, he established his head-quarters: but he abandoned them at the approach of the allies, and leaving behind all his sick and wounded, with part of his magazines, retired without halting to Paderborn, and from thence to the Rhine, calling in his march the troops that were in Emelien, Cassel, and the landgrave of Hesse, all which places were now evacuated. They were terribly harassed in their retreat by the horses of theHanoverian army, which had in the fall of the preceding year, by cutting their public roads, seized one thousand fine horses, distinguished by the name of Hanoverian hunters, who took a great number of prisoners, together with many baggage-wagons, and some artillery. Such was the phụcishment of this retreat, that it was considered as the last time to destroy all their magazines of provision and forage; and even forgot to call in the garrison of Vechte, a small fortress in the neighbourhood of Dehnhof, who were made whom they were pursued. The inhabitants of Hanover, perceiving the French intended to abandon that city, were overwhelmed with the fear of being subjected to every species of violence and abuse; but their apprehensions were happily disappointed by the honour and integrity of the Duke de Randan, the French governor, who not only took effectual measures for restraining the soldiers within the bounds of the most rigid discipline and moderation, but by the true integrity of his whole conduct, convinced them without example. Instead of destroying his magazine of provisions, according to the usual practice of war, he ordered the whole to be either sold at a low price, or distributed among the poor on the approach of winter, so that the people became long exposed to the horrors of famine; an act of godlike humanity, which ought to dignify the character of that worthy nobleman above all the tules that military fame can deserve, or arbitrary monarchs bestow. The regency of Hanover were so deeply impressed with a sense of his heroic behaviour on this occasion, that they gratefully acknowledged it, in a letter of thanks to him and the Count de Clermont; and on the day of solemn thanksgiving to Heaven, for their being delivered from their enemies, the clergy, in their sermons, did not fail to celebrate and extol the charity and benevolence of the Duke de Randan. Such glorious testimonies, even from enemies, must have afforded the most exquisitely pleasing and happy sentiment, and such a satisfaction to all the inhabitants of Hanover, who have reason to admire great merit, in the Duke de Broglio, and who would have rejoiced to be able to extol the generosity of his liberality, who, without a doubt, may be termed one of the fairest triumphs of humanity.

§ XXV. The two grand divisions of the French army, quartered at Zell and Hanover, retired in good order to Hamelin, where they collected all their troops, except those that were left in Hoya, on the marches of which army the enemy placed in garrison at Minden, to retake the operations of the combined army. Towards the latter end of February, Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, having received intelligence that the Duke de Chabot, with a considerable body of troops at Hoya, upon the Weser, despatched the hereditary prince of Brunswick, with four battalions, and some light troops and dragoons, to dislodge them from that place. This detachment, however, was repulsed with the utmost intermitancy. The hereditary prince passed the Weser at Bremen with part of his detachment, while the rest advanced on this side of the river; and the army, being attacked in front and rear, were in a little time forced, and thrown into confusion. The bridge being abandoned, and near seven hundred men taken prisoners, the Count de Chabot threw himself, with two battalions, into the castle, where he resolved to support himself, in the event of the enemy dislodging the hostiles; but some detachments of dragoons, were actually on the march to his assistance. The hereditary prince being made acquainted with this circumstance, being also destitute of cavalry artillery, the Duke de Richelieu, desponding, and frustrated in his design, it was considered, for the sake of safety, he should not be able to maintain the post after it might be taken, he listened to the terms of the capitulation proposed by the French general, whose garrison was suffered to march out with the honours of war; but his cannon, stores, and ammunition, were surrendered to the victor. This was the first exploit of the hereditary prince, whose valor and activity, on many subsequent occasions, shone with distinguished lustre. He had no sooner reduced Hoya, than he marched to the attack of Minden, which he invested on the fifth day of March, and on the fourteenth the garrison surrendered at discretion. After the reduction of this city the hereditary army advanced towards Hameln. The regiment of Rettichow, one of Hanover’s fraternities, established his head-quarters; but he abandoned them at the approach of the allies, and leaving behind all his sick and wounded, with part of his magazines, retired without halting to Paderborn, and from thence to the Rhine, calling in his march the troops that were in Emelien, Cassel, and the landgrave of Hesse, all which places were now evacuated. They were terribly harassed in their retreat by the horses of the Hanoverian army, which had in the fall of the preceding year, by cutting their public roads, seized one thousand fine horses, distinguished by the name of Hanoverian hunters, who took a great number of prisoners, together with many baggage-wagons, and some artillery. Such was the punishment of this retreat, that it was considered as the last time to destroy all their magazines of provision and forage; and even forgot to call in the garrison of Veghte, a small fortress in the neighbourhood of Dehnhof, who were made prisoners of war, and here was found a complete train of battering cannon and mortars. The Count de Clermont, having the greatest share of the blame, distributed his forces into quarters of cantonment in Wesel and the adjoining country, while Prince Ferdinand cantonised the allied army in the bishopric of Münster; here, however, he had the misfortune to remain inactive. May he be ordered a detachment to pursue the Rhine at Duisburg, under the command of Colonel Scheithauer, who executed his order without loss, defeated three battalions of the enemy, and took five pieces of cannon. In the beginning of September the whole French army under the Rüd the night before, constructed a bridge to the French cavalry, and obtained divers other advantages in their march towards Wesel. Kueseworth was surprised, the greater part of the garrison either killed or taken, and Prince Ferdinand began to make preparations for the siege of Düsseldorf. To the meantime the Count de Clermont, being unable to stop the rapidity of his progress, was obliged to secure his troops with strong intrenchments, until he should be properly reinforced.

§ XVI. The court at Versailles, though equally mortified and confounded at the turn of their affairs in Germany, did not sit tamely and behold this reverse; but exerted their usual spirit and expedition in retrieving the losses they had sustained. They assembled a body of troops at Hanau, under the direction of the Prince de Bourbon, who, it was said, had received orders to penetrate, by this route, into Friesien, and join the French army in Saross at Hanover. In the meantime, reinforcements daily arrived in the camp of the Count de Clermont; and, as repeated complaints had been made of the want of discipline and subordination in that army, measures were taken for re-forming the troops by severity and example. The Marshal Duke de Belleisle, who now acted as secretary at war with uncommon ability, wrote a letter directed to all the corps of the army, threatening them, in the king's name, with the severest measures should they continue any longer at the scandalous practice of having commissions; an abuse which had crept into the service under various pretences, to the discouragement of merit, the relaxation of discipline, and the total extinction of laudable emulation. The Prince of Clermont having quitted his strong camp at Rhinefeldt, retired to Nuiys, a little higher up the river, and detached a considerable corps, under the command of the Count de St. Germain, to take post at Crevelt, situated in the plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs: after several motions on both sides, Prince Ferdinand resolved to evacuate that place, and fortified a small place for this purpose. He assigned the command of the whole left wing, consisting of eighteen battalions and twenty-eight squadrons, to Lieutenant-General Sporcken; the command of the right wing, composed of sixteen battalions and twenty-eight squadrons, was assigned to Prince de Bourbon and Major-General Wachenheim; the squadrons, with the addition of two regiments of Prussian dragoons, were under the immediate direction of the Prince of Holstein, while the hereditary prince commanded the infantry. The light troops, consisting of five squadrons of hussars, were divided between the Prince of Holstein and Lieutenant-General Sporcken. Major Luckner's squadron, together with Scheithauer's corps, were ordered to occupy the flank of the enemy's right, and with this view were posted in the village of Papendock; and a battalion of the troops of Wolfenbuttel were left in the town of Hulsle, to cover the rear of the army. Prince Ferdinand's design was to attack the enemy on their left flank; but the execution was rendered extremely difficult by the woods and ditches that embroiled the route, and the numerous ditches that intersected this part of the country. On the twenty-third day of June, at four in the morning, the army began to move; the right advancing in two columns as far as St. Anthony, and the left marching up within half a league of Crevelt. The prince, having viewed the position of the enemy and the obstacles that occurred, gave guides, and having received all the necessary hints of in-impeded, until he himself, being joined by the British troops, should be in a condition to pass the Meuse, transfer the seat of war into the enemy’s country, thus make a diversion from the Rhine, and perhaps oblige the Prince de Soubise to come to the assistance of the principal French army, commanded by M. de Contades. He had formed a plan which would have answered these purposes effectually, and, in execution of it, marched to Aixen on the twenty-third of July, with a number of troops greatly superior to that which the Hessian general commanded. The Duke de Broglio, who commanded the corps that formed the vanguard of Soubise, having learned at 6 o’clock, that the Hessian troops, under the Prince of Ysenburg, were retreating towards Munden, he advanced, on the twenty-third of July, with a body of eight thousand men, to the village of Sangershausen, where he found them drawn up in order of battle, and forthwith made a disposition for the attack. At first his cavalry were repulsed by the Hessian horse, which charged the French infantry, and were broke in their order. The Hessians, though in great inferiority to the enemy, now gave a very obstinate resistance, by favour of a rock in the Fulde that covered their right, and a wood by which their left was secured. The dispute was so obstinate, that the enemy’s left was obliged to give ground. In consequence of the loss of the bridge, he advanced, changed the fortune of the day. The Hessians, overpowered by numbers, gave way; part plunged into the river, where many perished, and part threw themselves into the water; and the Frankfurt regiment, pursuing the pursuit of the hussars, who took above two hundred soldiers and fifty officers, including the Count de Canitz, who was second in command. They likewise found on the field of battle seven pieces of cannon, and eight at Munden; but the carnage was pretty considerable, and nearly equal on both sides. The number of the killed and wounded, on the side of the French, exceeded two thousand; the loss of the Hessians was not so great. The Prince of Ysenburg, having collected the remains of his little army, took post at Embeck, where he soon was reinforced, and found himself at the head of twelve thousand men: but, in consequence of this advantage, the enemy became masters of the Weser, and opened to themselves a free passage into Westphalia.

§ XXVIII. The progress of Prince Ferdinand upon the Meuse had been retarded by a long succession of heavy rains; and it had happened that he found itself incapable of advancing; and now the certain information of this unlucky check left him no alternative but a battle or a retreat across the Rhine; the first was carefully avoided by the enemy; the latter resolution, therefore, he found himself under a necessity to embrace. In his present position he was hemmed by the French army on one wing, the other by the fortress of Guelders, the garrison of which had been lately reinforced, as well as by divers other posts, capable of obstructing the convoys and subsistence of the combined army: besides, he had reason to apprehend, that the Prince de Soubise would endeavour to intercept the British troops in their march from Embeck. Induced by these considerations, he determined to repass the Rhine, after having offered battle to the enemy, and made several motions for that purpose. Finding them averse to an engagement, he made his dispositions for forcing the strong post of Aachen, a passage on the left bank, and, with the troops of the Niers, of very difficult approach, and situated exactly in his route to the Rhine. This service was performed by the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who, perceiving the enemy had delayed too long the passage of the river at Embeck. That well determined the Prince de Soubise, his grenadiers, who drove them away with their bayonets, and cleared the bridges for the passage of the army towards Rhineberg. At this place Prince Ferdinand received intelligence from the Prince of Nassau, that part of the army, which had crossed the Lippe with fourteen battalions and several squadrons, to join the garrison of Wesel, and fall upon Lieutenant-General Imhoff, who commanded a detached corps of the combined army at Meer, that he might be at hand to guard the bridge which the Prince had thrown over the Rhine at Rees. His serene highness was extremely desirous of sending succours to General Imhoff; but the troops were too much fatigued to begin another march before morning; and the Rhine had overflowed its banks in such a manner as to render the bridge at Rees impassable, so that M. Imhoff was left to the mercy of his own resources, and the bravery of his troops, consisting of six battalions and four squadrons, already weakened by the absence of different detachments. This general having received advice, on the fourth of August, that the enemy intended to pass the Lippe the same way, he contrived, by a laborious march, in order to burn the bridge at Rees, decamped with a view to cover this place, and join two battalions which had passed the Rhine in boats, under the command of General Zastrow, who reinforced his accordingly; but the enemy not appearing, he concluded the information was false, and resolved to resume his advantageous post at Meer. Of this he had no sooner reproposed himself, than his advanced guards were engaged with the enemy, who marched to the attack from Wesel, under the command of Lieutenant-General de Chevert, consisting of the whole corps intended for the siege of Dusseldorp. Imhoff’s front was now covered by a strong division of troops, which appeared as if they were marching on the ground on his right, from whence he could plainly discern the whole force that advanced against him, together with the manner of their approach. Perceiving them engaged in that difficult ground, he posted one regiment in a copse, with orders to the other, that it might come on in its proper place, which appeared quite uncovered; and as soon as their fire began, advanced with the rest of his forces to attack them in front. The battery was used on this occasion, and the charge giren with such ardency and precision, that after a short resistance, the enemy fell into confusion, and fled towards Wesel, leaving on the spot eleven pieces of cannon, with a great number of wagons and other carriages: besides the killed and wounded, which amounted to a pretty considerable number, the victor took three hundred and fifty-four prisoners, including eleven officers; whereas, on his part, the victory was purchased at a very small expense.

§ XXIX. Immediately after this action, General Wangenheim passed the Rhine with several squadrons and battalions, to reinforce General Imhoff, and to enable him to prosecute the advantage he had gained, while Prince Ferdinand marched with the rest of the army to Saxten: from whence he proceeded to Rheineberg, where he intended to pass; but the river had overflowed to such a degree, that here, as well as at Rees, the shore was inaccessible; so that he was obliged to march to得很 high on the left bank of the river, and lay a bridge at Giehthuyen. The enemy had contrived four vessels for the destruction of this bridge; but they were all taken before they could put the design into execution, and the very next army passed on the tenth day of August, without any loss or further interruption. At the same time the prince withdrew his garrison from Dusseldorp, of which the French immediately took possession. Immediately after his passage he received a letter from the Duke of Marlborough, acquainting him that the British troops had arrived at Lingen, in their route to Coesfeld; to which place General Imhoff was sent to receive them, with a strong detachment. Notwithstanding the enemy returned, the two armies on the Rhine were so well matched, that no stroke of importance was struck on either side during the remaining part of the campaign. M. de Contades, seeing no prospect of obtaining the least advantage over Prince Ferdinand, detached Prince Xaverius of Saxony with a strong reinforcement to the Prince de Soubise, who had taken possession of Gottengen, and seemed determined to attack the Prince of Ysenburg at Rhineberg. But the enemy, whose troops were too much dispirited, did not exceed twenty thousand men, of whom General Oberg now assumed the command; whereas the troops of Soubise were increased to the number of thirty thousand. The allies had taken post upon the river Fuide at Sandershausen, where they hoped the French would attack them; but the design of Soubise was first to dispose on the first of November. With this view, he made a motion, as if he had intended to turn the camp of the allies by the road of Munden. In order to prevent the execution of this supposed design, General Oberg decamped on the tenth of October, and, passing by the village of Lattenberg, advanced towards Lattenberg, where, understanding the enemy were at his heels, he forthwith formed his troops in order of battle, his right to the Fulde, and his left extending to a thicket upon an eminence, and taking five field-pieces. The cavalry supported the wings in a third line, the village of Lattenberg was in the rear, and four pieces of cannon were mounted on a rising ground that flanked this village. The French having likewise passed Lauterwangen, posted their left towards the Fulde, their right extending far beyond the left of the allies, and their front being strengthened with above thirty pieces of cannon. At four in the afternoon the enemy began the battle with a severe cannonading, and at the same time the first line of their infantry attacked Major-General Zastrow, who was posted on the left wing of the allies. This body of the French was repulsed; but in the same moment, a considerable line of cavalry advanced, and the allies in front and flank. They were supported by a fresh body of infantry with cannon, which, after a warm dispute, obliged the confederates to give way: and General Oberg, in order to prevent a total defeat, formed a retreat, which was performed in tolerable order; but that he suffered greatly, in passing through a defile, from the fire of the enemy's cannon, which was brought up and managed under the direction of the Duke de Breglio. Having marched through Munden, where it was evening, the army lay till morning under arms in the little plain near Gropen, on the other side of the Weser; but at day-break prosecuted their march, after having withdrawn the garrison from Munden, until they arrived in the neighbourhood of Fulde, where they encamped. In this engagement General Oberg lost about fifteen hundred men, his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. He was obliged to abandon a magazine of hay and straw at Munden, and leave part of his wounded men in that place to the humanity of the victor. But, after all, the French general reapplied very little advantage from his victory.

By this time, Prince Ferdinand had retired into Westphalia, and fixed his head-quarters at Monster, while M. de Contades encamped near Ham under the Jippe; so that, although he had obliged the French army to evacuate Hanover and Hesse in the beginning of the year, without stopping, he had also dispersed them beyond the Rhine, where they sustained a defeat; yet they were soon put in a condition to harass all his future endeavours, and penetrate again into Westphalia. Several of his outposts were established, those extending themselves in such a manner as to command the whole course of the Rhine on both sides, while the allies were disposed in the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and in the bishoprics of Munster, Paderborn, and Hildesheim. The British troops had joined them so late in the season, that they had no opportunity to signalize themselves in the field; yet the fatigue of the campaign, which they had severely felt, proved fatal to their commander, the Duke of Marlborough, who died of a dysentery at Munster, universally lamented.

§ XXXI. Having thus partially considered the operations of the allied army since the commencement of the campaign, we shall now endeavor to trace the steps of the King of Prussia, from the period at which his army was assembled for action. Having collected his force as soon as the season would permit, he undertook the siege of Schweidnitz in form on the twenty-first day of March; and carried on his operations with such vigour, that in thirteen days the garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war, after having lost one half of their number in the defence of the place. While one part of his troops were engaged in this service, he himself, at the head of another, advanced to the eastern frontier of Bohemia, and sent a detachment as far as Trnovany, garrisoned by a body of Austrians, who, after an obstinate resistance, abandoned the place, and retreated towards their grand army. By this success he opened to himself a way into Bohemia, by which he poured in detachments of light troops, to raise contributions, and harass the communications of the army of the Elector of Saxony. The Baron de la Mothe Fouquet marched with another body against the Austrian general, Jahnus, posted in the county of Glatz, whom he obliged to abandon all the posts he occupied in that county, and abandoned the place, and retreated within twenty miles of Koniggratz, where the grand Austrian army was encamped, under the command of Marschal Daun, who had lately arrived from Vienna. Over and above these excursions, the king ordered a body of thirty thousand men to be assembled, to act under the command of his brother Prince Henry, an accomplished warrior, against the army of the empire, which the Prince de Deuxponts, with great difficulty, made a shift to form again near Hamberg, in Franconia.

§ XXXII. The King of Prussia, whose designs were, perhaps, even greater than he cared to own, resolved to shift the theatre of the war, and penetrate into Moravia, a fertile country, by which he expected to ravage and contribute. Having formed an army of fifty thousand choice troops near Niess, in Silesia, he divided them into three columns; the first commanded by Marschal Daun, which was composed, as the French army, was divided in the service, of the landgraviate of Hesse, with the design of conducting by Prince Maurice of Anhalt Dessau. In the latter end of April they began their march towards Moravia; and General de la Ville, who commanded a body of troops in that country, retired as they advanced, after having assembled his forces at Zastrow, in the princi- pal, to which the king was determined to besiege. Had he passed by this fortress, which was strongly fortified, and well provided for a vigorous defence, he might have advanced to the gates of Zastrow, and perhaps have been enabled to the necessity of suing for peace on his own terms; but it seems he was unwilling to deviate so far from the common maxims of war as to leave a fortified place in the rear; and, therefore, he determined to make himself master of it before he should proceed. For this purpose it was immediately invested: orders were issued to hasten up the heavy artillery, and Marschal Keith was appointed to superintend and direct the operations of the siege. Mean- while, the Austrian commander, Count Daun, being informed of his Prussian majesty’s motions and designs, quit his camp at Leutomyssel in Bohemia, and entered Moravia by the way of Bilia. Being still too weak to encourage an investment, he managed to formidable, in the neighbourhood of the king’s army, between Gewitz and Littau, in a mountainous situation, where he ran little or no risk of being attacked. Here he remained for some time in waiting. The detaching of Gunterberch, on the right of the army, which the king was determined to besiege. Had he passed by this fortress, which was strongly fortified, and well provided for a vigorous defence, he might have advanced to the gates of Zastrow, and perhaps have been enabled to the necessity of suing for peace on his own terms; but it seems he was unwilling to deviate so far from the common maxims of war as to leave a fortified place in the rear; and, therefore, he determined to make himself master of it before he should proceed. For this purpose it was immediately invested: orders were issued to hasten up the heavy artillery, and Marschal Keith was appointed to superintend and direct the operations of the siege. Meanwhile, the Austrian commander, Count Daun, being informed of his Prussian majesty’s motions and designs, quit his camp at Leutomyssel in Bohemia, and entered Moravia by the way of Bilia. Being still too weak to encourage an investment, he managed to formidable, in the neighbourhood of the king’s army, between Gewitz and Littau, in a mountainous situation, where he ran little or no risk of being attacked. Here he remained for some time in waiting. The detaching of Gunterberch, on the right of the army, which the king was determined to seize the besieged occasionally; to harass the besiegers, and to intercept their conveya from Silesia; and this scheme was succeeded to his wish. Olmütz is so extensive in its works, and so peculiarly situated on the river Morava, that it could not be completely invested without weakening the posts of the besieging army, by extending them to a pro- digious circuit; so that, in some parts, they were easily forced by detachments, in the night, which fell upon them suddenly, and seldom failed to introduce into the place supplies of men, provisions, and ammunition. The forger here illustrated, in the Prussian army, the necessity of an investment of the place, and the whole force of that army. The Prussians were inevitably forced to the conclusion that it was impossible to invest the place. With the garrison made repeated sallies to retard the operations of the be-The Austrian general harassed his foraging parties, fell upon different quarters of their army in the night, and kept them in continual alarm. Nevertheless, the king finished his first parallel, and his main army took possession of the town, with much vigor, as seemed to promise a speedy reduction of the place; but when his design was entirely frustrated by an untoward incident. Mareschal Dauw, having received intelligence that a large convoy was about to leave Silesia for the Prussian camp, resolved to seize this opportunity of intimating the king to desist from his enterprise. He sent General Jahnus, with a strong body of troops, towards Bahn, and another detachment to Stadtholtebe, with instructions to attack the convoy, and, in readiness to himself advanced towards the besiegers, as if he intended to give them battle. The King of Prussia, far from being deceived by this feint, began, from the motions of the Austrian general, to suspect his real scheme, and immediately despatched General Zieten, with a strong reinforcement, to protect the convoy, which was escorted by eight battalions, and about four thousand men, who had been sick, and were just recovered. Before this officer joined them, the convoy had been attacked on the twenty-eighth day of June; but the assailants were repulsed with considerable loss. Mareschal Dauw, how-to, took care that they should be immediately reinforced; and next day the attack was renewed. An action of four hours, guarded by four battalions, and about one thousand troopers, had just passed the defiles of Domadtet, when the Austrians charged them furiously, and it was even contested, as long as the head and the rest of the convoy was cut off; and General Zieten, after having exerted all his efforts for its preservation, being obliged to abandon the wagons, retired to Troppau. Thus the whole convoy fell into the hands of the enemy, who took above six hundred prisoners, together with General Puttkamer; and the King of Prussia was obliged to relinquish his enterprise. This was a mortificing necessity for a monarch who, as he saw himself on the eve of reducing the place, notwithstanding the gallant defence which had been made by General Marshal, the governor. Nothing now remained but to raise the siege, and retire without loss in the face of a vigilant enemy, prepared to seize every opportunity of advantage: a task which, how hardsoever it may appear, he performed with equal dexterity and success. Instead of retiring into Silesia, he resolved to avert the war from his own dominions, and take the route of Bohemia, the frontiers of which were left uncovered by Mareschal Dauw’s last motion, when he advanced his quarters to Posna, in order to succour Olimutza the more effectually.
After having secured the city, and welded his citizen’s army, Mareschal Dauw unravelled his design from the eveny, and, notwithstanding the loss of his convoy, prosecuted the operations of the siege with redoubled vigour, till the first day of July, when he vacated the intrenchments he had made within his own province, and proceeded to Bohemia. He himself, with one division, took the road to Konitz; and Mareschal Keith having brought away all the the artillery, except four mortars, and one disabled cannon, postred his march by the way of Liatau to Mughitz and Tribau. Although his Prussian majesty had gained an entire march upon the Austrians, their light troops, com-maded by the Generals Bucow and Laudohn, did not fail to attend and harass his army in their retreat; but the conduct and circumcision of the Prussian commanders After the rear of the army had passed the defiles of Kre-sna, General Laci, who was posted at Gibau with a large body, had not been able, by dint of every measure and funds, to receive the retreat of the Austrians with a detachment of grenadiers, who were soon dislodged; and the Prussians pursued their march by Zittau to Leutmysse, where they seized a magazine of meal and the Prussians, pursued their march by Zittau to Leutmyssel, where they seized a magazine of meal and forage, which had been left to them by the army in its retreat the provisions and artillery, found the hills of Hohenlaufen possessed by the enemy, who cannonaded him as he advanced; but Mareschal Keith coming up, ordered him to be attacked in the rear, and they fled into a wood with the loss of six thousand men, having three hundred men, who were taken prisoners. While the march was thus employed, the king proceeded from Leutmyssel to Königsgratz, where General Bucow, b distinguished by the epithet of Cunctator. He possessed all the vigilance, caution, and sagacity of that celebrated Roman. Like him, be hovered on the skirts of the enemy, hampering their parties, accosting the soldiers to strict hard service, and the face of a formidable foe, and watching for opportunities, which he knew how to seize with equal courage and celerity.

§ XXX. The King of Prussia, being induced by a consciousness of his parts to stop the progress of the Russians in Silesia, made his dispositions for retreating from Bohemia, and on the twenty-fifth day of July quitted the camp at Koeniggratz. He was attended in his march by three thousand baggage horses, which, not fitted for the road, made his march hot; but, notwithstanding these impediments, he passed the Mittau, proceeded on his route, and on the ninth day of August arrived at Landshut. From thence he hastened with a detachment towards Frankfort on the Oder, and joined the army commanded by Lieutenant-General Donha at Gorgas. Then the whole army passed the Oder by a bridge, thrown over it at Gatavise, and having resided one day advanced to Detmold, where he encamped. The Russians, under General Fermor, were posted on the other side of the little river Mittel, their right extending to the village of Zwicker, and their left to Quetschau. Without being determined to hazard a battle, the army passed the Mittel on the twenty-fifth in the morning, and turning the flank of the enemy, drew up his army in order of battle in the plain between the little river and the town of Zomendorf. The Russians, by whom he was outnumbered, did not wish to dispute; but as the ground did not permit them to extend themselves, they appeared in four lines, forming a front on every side defended by cannon and a chevaux-de-frise, their right flank covered by the village of Zomendorf. After a round cannonade, the Russian infantry were ordered to attack the villages, and a body of grenadiers advanced to the assault; but this brigade unexpectedly giving way, occasioned a considerable opening, and left the left flank of the enemy uncovered. Before the enemy could take advantage of this incident, the interval was filled up by the cavalry under the command of General Seydtitz; and the king, with his usual presence of mind, substituted another choice body of troops to carry on the attack. This began about noon, and continued for some time, during which both sides fought with equal courage and perseverance; at length General Seydtitz, having routed the Russian cavalry, fell upon the flank of the infantry with great fury, which being also dreadfully annoyed by the Prussian artillery, they abandoned the village, together with their military chest, and great part of their baggage. Notwithstanding this loss, which had greatly disordered their right wing, the flood was continued to stand the Russian storm; the baggage was made among them, not only with the sword and bayonet, but also by the cannon, which were loaded with grape shot, and being excellently served, did great execution. Towards evening the confusion among them increased, and it was reported some of the army had been entirely routed, had they not been favoured by the approaching darkness, as well as by a particular operation which was very elegantly performed. One of the Russian generals perceiving the fortune of the day turned against them, rally a select body of troops, and made a vigorous impression on the right wing of the Prussians. This effort diverted their attention so strongly to that quarter, that the right of the Russians enjoyed a complete success, during which they retired in tolerable order, and occupied a new post on the right, where the rest of their forces were the more easily assembled. In this battle they are reported to have been very stoutly attacked by von Dieskau, in four squares, with five standards, twelve mortars, the greater part of their baggage, and above one hundred pieces of cannon. Among the prisoners that fell into the hands of the victors, were several generals, and a good number lost their lives in the hands of the Russians. One officer, who was above two thousand men, including some officers of distinction, particularly two aides-de-camp, who attended his own person, which he exposed without scruple to all the dangers of the field, and the whole army, exasperated against this enemy, because they had had to battle the country, burned the villages, ruined the peasants, and committed many horrid acts of barbarity, which the practice of war could not authorize. The Prussian army passed the night under arms, and next morning the cannonade was renewed against the enemy, who, never... thoroughly, maintaining the position without attacking. On the twenty-seventh, they seemed determined to hazard another action, and even attack the conquerors; instead of advancing, however, they took the route of Landenberg; but afterwards turned off towards Viertel, and posted them- selves in a scheme for attacking the Turks and that village. Immediately after the battle, General Ferme, who had received a slight wound in the action, sent a trumpet, with a letter to Lieutenant-General Dohna, desiring a suspension of arms for two or three days to bury the dead and take care of the wounded; and proceeded to his Prussian general with the humble request of General Browne, who was much weakened with the loss of blood, that he might have a passport, by virtue of which he could be removed to a place where he should have such medical assistance as the situation required. In answer to this message, Count Dohna gave the Russian general to understand, that as his Prussian majesty remained master of the field, he would give the necessary orders for interring the dead and taking care of the wounded on both sides: he refused a suspension of arms, but granted the request of General Browne; and concluded his letter by complaining of the outrages which the Russian troops still continued to commit, in pillaging and burning the king's villages.

§ XXXVI. The King of Prussia had no sooner re- pulsed the enemy in one quarter, than his presence was required in another. The powerful forces of the camp of Mareschal Daun, at the head of the Austrian army, and the Prince de Deuxponts, who commanded the forces of the empire, advanced to the Elbe, in order to surround the king's brother, Prince Henry, who, without immediate succour, would not have found such an asylum as Saxony could offer in Saxony. The Prussian monarch, therefore, determined to support him with all possible expedition. In a few days after the battle, he began his march from Custrin, with a reinforcement of his forces; and in a few days, the army, composed of part of his cavalry, and pursued his route with such un- wearied diligence, that by the fifth day of September he reached Torsau, and on the eleventh joined his brother. Meanwhile the enemy marched a great distance to the eastward of the Elbe, in order to preserve an easy com- munication with the army of the empire encamped in the neighbourhood of Konigstein, to favour the operations of General Laudohn, who had advanced through the Lower Lusatia to the frontiers of Brandenburch; to make a diversion from the southern parts of Silesia, where a body of Austrian troops acted under the command of the Gener- al-Henrle and Dr. Voss; and to interrupt the commu- nication between Prince Henry and the emperor. On the fifth day of September, the garrison in the strong fortress of Konigstein surrendered themselves prisoners of war, by a very feeble resistance, to the Prince de Deux- ponts, who forced the gates. The same night they entered to Pirm. When the King of Prussia, therefore, arrived at Dresden, he found the army of the empire in this position, and Mareschal Daun in a still stronger situation at Stolpen, with bridges of communication thrown over the Elbe, so that he could not attack them with any prospect of advantage. He had no other resolution to take, but that of endeavouring to cut them off from supplies of pro- vision, and with this view he marched to Bautzen, which he occupied. This motion obliged the Austrian general to quit his camp at Stolpen, but he chose another of equal strength at Libau; yet he afterwards advanced to Rittitz, that he might be enabled to seize the invariable occasion of executing the resolution he had formed to attack the Prussians. The king having detached General Ratzow on his left, to take possession of Wessenberg, marched forwards with the rest of his army, and posted himself in the neighbourhood of Hochkirchen, after having discharged the Austrians from that village. Matters were now brought to such a delicate crisis, that a battle seemed inevitable, and equally desired by both quarters, as an event that would determine whether the Austrians should be obliged to retreat for winter-quarters into Bohemia, or be enabled to maintain their ground in Saxony. In this situation Mareschal Daun resolved to set offensively; and formed his plan for attacking the right flank of the Prussians by surprise. This measure was suggested to him by an over- sight of the Prussians, who had neglected to occupy the heights that commanded the village of Hochkirchen, which was only guarded by a few free companies. He deter- mined to take the advantage of this, and to employ the flower of the whole army on this important service, well knowing, that should they penetrate through the flank of the enemy, the whole Prussian army would be disconcerted, and, in all probability, completely defeated.

Having taken his measures with wonderful secrecy and circumspection, the troops began to move in the night between the thirteenth and fourteenth of October, favoured by a thick fog, which greatly increased the darkness of the night. Their first care was to take possession of the hill that commanded Hochkirchen, from whence they poured down upon the village, of which they took possession, after having cut in pieces the free companies posted there.

The action began in this quarter about four in the morning, and continued several hours with great fury, for, notwith- standing the impetuous efforts of the Austrian troops, and the confusion and dispersion of the French army, the enemy, so surprised, a vigorous stand was made by some general officers, who, with admirable expedition and presence of mind, assembled and arranged the troops as they could take to their arms, and led them up to the attack without being in want of order or place of support, to the great advantage of the Prussians, who, in consequence of their victory, the Prussian army, in consequence of their success, and made the French general commit another attack upon the left, which was with difficulty sustained, and effectually pre- vented him from securing reinforcements on their part, where Mareschal Keil, under the greatest disadvantages, bore the brunt of the enemy's chief endeavours. Thus the battle raged till nine in the morning, when this gallant monarch shot the heart through the breast of Prince Francis of Brunswick had the misfortune to be the sample: Prince John of Anhalt was wounded and taken prisoner, and many others were either slain or disabled. As the right wing had been surprised, the tents continued standing, and greatly embarrassed the operation of their detachments, which had never been properly drawn up in order; the enemy still persevered in their attack with successive reinforce- ments and resolute resolution; and a considerable slaughter was made by their artillery, which they had brought up to the heights of Hochkirchen. All these cir- cumstances concurring, could not fail to increase the con- fusion and disaster of the Prussians; so that about ten the king was obliged to retire to Dobreschütz, with the loss of seven thousand men, of all his tents, and part of his bag- age. Nor had the Austrian general much cause to boast of his victory. His loss of men was pretty near equal to that of the Prussians; and, whatever reputation he might have acquired in foiling that enterprise prince, certainly his design did not take effect in its full exten- sion, for the Prussians were next day in a condition to hazard another engagement. The King of Prussia had sustained no damage which he could not recover, except the death of Mareschal Keil, which was doubtless an irreparable misfortune.
men, in the redoubts that surrounded the suburbs, that in case of emergency they might support the irregulars: at the same time as the Austrian troops were being so generally as to overlook the ramparts, and command the city, he prepared combustibles, and gave notice to the magistrates that they would be set on fire as soon as an Austrian force should appear on his side. The suburbs had been a dreadful declaration to the inhabitants of these suburbs, which compose one of the most elegant towns in Europe. To these houses, which were generally lofty and magnificent, the fashionable and wealthy class of people residing there, in masses, had been assembled by the words of stragel, rather than by the hand of valour. Count Daun, having more nothing to hope from the active operations of his own army, contented himself with amusing the Prussian monarch to Lusatia, while the Austrian generals, Harasce and De Ville, should prosecute the reduction of Neuss and Coesel in Slesia, which they now actually invested. As the Prussian monarch could not spare detachments to oppose every different corps of his enemies that acted against him in different parts of his dominions, he resolved to make up to activity what he wanted in number, and, if possible, to raise the siege of Neuss and Liegnitz. With this view he decamped from Dolberschts, and in this situation his army marched to the enemy, marched to the enemy, marched to the enemy, without the least interruption. From thence he proceeded towards Slesia with his usual expedition, notwithstanding all the endeavours and activity of General Laudohn, who harassed the Prussian forces, and gained some petty advantages over the army. Count Daun not only sent his detached corps to retard them in their march; but at the same time, by another route, detached a strong reinforcement to the army of the asengers. In the meantime, having received intelligence that the army of Prince Henry in Saxony was considerably weakened, he himself marched thither, in hopes of expelling the prince from that country, and reducing the capital in the king's absence. Indeed, both these armies, which were still more extensive, for he proposed to reduce Dresden, Leipsic, and Torgau at the same time; the first with the main body under his own direction, the second by the army of the emperor under Prince de Deuxponts, and the third by a corps under General Haddick, while the forces directed by Laudohn should exclude the king from Lusatia. In execution of this plan he marched directly to the Elbe, which he passed at Pirna, and advanced to Dresden, which he hoped would render without putting him to the trouble of a formal siege.

The army of Prince Henry had already retired to the westward of this capital before the Prussians, with whose forces he had put off from his enemy, marched towards Leipsic, and even invested that city. During these transactions, General Haddick advanced against Torgau.

§ XXXVII. The Field-Marshal Count Daun appeared on the sixth of November within sight of Dresden, at the head of sixty thousand men, encamped next day at Lockwitz, and on the eighth his advanced troops attacked the Prussian husars and independent battalions, which were posted at Striesen and Gruenenwiese. Count Schmettau, who commanded the garrison, amounting to ten thousand men, apprehensive that, in the course of skirmishing, the Austrian troops might enter the suburbs bellmell, posted Colonel Lamitsch, with seven hundred thority that which he derived from illegal force and violence; nor was he at all reduced to the necessity of sacrificing the palace to his own safety, inasmuch as he might have retired unmolested, by virtue of an honourable capitulation, which however he did not demand. Whether the peremptory order of a superior will, in furo conscientiae, justify an officer who had committed an illegal or inhumane action, is a question that an English reader will scarcely care to consider. One hundred and fifty thousand men in arms were thus during the campaign, observed the Swedes, who had now entirely evacuated the Prussian territories, so that Wedel was at liberty to co-operate with the king in Saxony. He accordingly marched to Torgau, the siege of which had been undertaken by the Austrians with moderate success, and the city was repulsed by Wedel, and even pursued to the neighbourhood of Eulenburg. Wedel, being afterwards joined by Dohna, drove him from thence with considerable loss, and then raised the siege of Leipsic. Meanwhile, the king prosecuted his march towards the capital of Saxony, driving before him the body of Austrian troops, under Daun, who retreated to Zittau. On the tenth day of November Count Dohna retired from Dresden, and with the army of the empire fell back towards Bohemia; and on the twentieth the king arrived in that city, where he approved of the governor’s conduct. The Russian general, therefore, should be forewarned that a large body of Prussian soldiers posted in the streets for that purpose: he enumerated particular instances of inhuman barbarity, and declared that a great number of people perished, either amongst the flames, or under the roofs of the houses. The descron of the humbly and falsely false inhabitants, the total ruin of the habitations, were circumstances in themselves so deplorable, as to need no aggravation; but the account of the Saxony minister was shamefully exaggerated, and all the particulars therein alleged, in a fair detail, authenticate the truth of the proceedings of the Prussian troops, and principal inhabitants of Dresden. The most extraordinary part of this defence or vindication was the conclusion, in which the baron solemnly assured the diet, that the King of Prussia, from his grief at the murder of those old friends of his, who had always felt the greatest emotion of soul, and the most exquisite concern, at the effusion of blood, the devastation of cities and countries, and the horrors of war, by which so many fellow-creatures were overthrown; and that if his sore was such, the innocent inhabitants of Germany, his dear country, had met with the least regret, the present war, attended with such bloodshed and desolation, would have been prevented and avoided. He, therefore, called upon the Prussians to renounce all the concerns, who, instead of extinguishing, threw oil upon the flames, must answer to God for the blood of that had been and would be shed, for the devastation of so many countries, and the entire ruin of so many innocent individuals. Such declarations cost nothing to those hardened politicians, who, feeling no internal check, are determined to sacrifice every consideration to the motives of rapacity and ambition. It would be happy, however, for mankind, if princes taught to believe, that there is really an omnipotent and all-judging Power, that will exact a strict account of their conduct, and punish them for their guilt, without respect to their persons; that pillaging a whole people is more cruel than the demolition of a single person; and that the massacre of thousands is, at least, as criminal as a private murder.

XXXIX. While Count Dohna was employed in making a fruitless attempt upon the capital of Saxony, the King of Prussia proceeded in his march to Neisse, which was completely invested on the third day of October. The operations of the siege were carried on with great vigour by the Austrians; and Harsdorff, by the presence of a force vigorously defended by the Prussian governor, Thesky, till the first day of November, when the Prussian monarch approached, and obliged the besiegers to abandon their enterprize. It was, however, observed that the king, on this occasion, seems to have been more disposed to avoid the consequences of the successful efforts of his troops, conducted by generals of consummate skill and unassuming resolution. His character would have been still more complete, if his moderation had been equal to his courage; but in this particular, the Austrians had the advantage. It was, however, by the persecuting spirit of his enemies, he wreaked his vengeance on those who had done him no injury; and the cruelties which the Russians had committed in his dominions were recalled upon the unfortunate inhabitants of Saxony. In the latter part of September the president of the Prussian military directory sent a letter to the magistrates of Dresden, commanding them to pay a new contribution of six hundred thousand crowns, and to begin immediately with the payment of one third part, on pain of military execution. In answer to this demand, the magistrates represented to the king's representatives, who had been exhausted by the enormous contributions already raised, that they were absolutely incapable of furnishing further supplies: that the trade was stagnated and raised, and the inhabitants oppressed, that they could no longer pay the ordinary taxes. This remonstrance made no impression. At five in the morning the Prussian soldiers assembled, and were posted in all the streets, squares, market-places, cemeteries, towers, and steepleps; then the gates being shut, in order to exclude the populace of the suburbs from the city, the senators were brought into the town-hall, and accosted by General Hauss, who told them, the king his master would have money; and if they refused to part with it the city should be plundered. To this peremptory address they replied to this effect:—We have no more money; we have nothing left but life; and we recommend ourselves to the king's mercy." In consequence of this declaration, proceedings were made for giving up the city to be plundered. Cannon were planted in all the streets, the inhabitants were ordered to remain within doors, and every house resounded with dismal cries and lamentations. The dreadful plague, however, was converted into a regular exaction. A party of soldiers, commanded by a subaltern, went from house to house, signifying to every burgler that he should produce all his specie, on pain of immediate pillage and massacre; and every inhabitant delivered up his all without further hesitation. About six in the evening the soldiers returned to their quarters; but the magistrates were detained in confinement, and all the customs were overwhelmed with grief and consternation. Happy Britain, who knowest such grievances only by report! When the King of Prussia first entered Saxony, at the beginning of the war, he declared he had no design to make a conquest of that electorate, but only to keep it as a depository for the security of his own dominions, until he could oblige his enemies to acquiesce in reasonable terms of peace; but upon his last arrival at Dresden, he adopted a new resolution. In the beginning of December, the Prussian directory of war issued a decree to the deputies of the states of the electorate, demanding a certain quantity of flour and forage, according to the convention formerly settled; at the same time the spies were set on foot, and whilst thus the Prussian army treated the electorate as a country taken under his special protection, the face of affairs was now changed in such a manner, that for the future he would consider it in no other light than that of a conquered country. The Prussian generals had seized in Prussia all the estates and effects belonging to the king's officers: a retaliation was now made upon the effects of the Saxon officers, who served in the Russian army. Seals were put on all the cabinets containing papers belonging to the privy-councillors of his Polish majesty, and they themselves ordered to depart for Warsaw at a very short warning. Though the city had been impoverished by former exactions, and very lately subjected to military execution, the King of Prussia demanded new contributions, and even extorted them by dint of severity that shocked humanity. He surrounded the exchange with soldiers, and confining the merchants to straw-beds, he extorted from them several thousand bills for large sums on their foreign correspondents: a method of proceeding much more suitable to the despotism of a Persian sophi towards a conquered people who professed a different faith, than to a people who were capable of a protestant prince towards a peaceable nation of brethren, with whom he was connected by the common ties of neighbourhood and religion. Even if they had acted as declared enemies, and been subdued with arms in their hands, the extent of war on the side of the conqueror ought to have been balanced with the hostilities of the conquered, who, by submitting to his sway, would have become his subjects, and in that capacity had a claim to his protection. To retaliate upon the Saxons, who had espoused no quarrel, the baronies committed by the Russians, with whom he was actually at war; and to treat as a conquered province a neutral country, whose inhabitants had never been involved, and been obliged to evacuate by force of arms; was a species of conduct founded on pretences which overturn all right, and confound all reason.

§ XLII. Having recorded all the transactions of the campaign which had terminated with the defeat of the Swedes, it now remains that we should particularize the progress which was made in Pomerania by the troops of that nation, under the command of Count Hamilton. We have already observed, that in the beginning of the year 1758, General, Lehwald, had compelled them to evacuate the whole province, except Stralsund, which was likewise invested. This, in all probability, would have been besieged in form, had not Lehwald resigned the command of the Prussians, on account of his great age and infirmities, and his successor Count Dohna been obliged to withdraw his troops, in order to oppose the Russian army on the other side of Pomerania. The blockade of Stralsund being consequently raised, and that part of the country entirely evacuated by the Prussians, the Swedish troops advanced again from the isle of Rugen, to which they had retired: but the supplies and reinforcements expected from Stockholm were delayed in such manner as to occasion, to the money of the subsides promised by France, or from the management of those who were averse to the war, that part great season was elapsed before they undertook any attempt to answer the purposes they had designed under the cannon of Stralsund, waiting for these supplies, their operations were retarded by the explosion of a great ship-load of gunpowder intended for their use; an event impeded to the practices of the Prussian army. The Swedish army, which at this period seemed to gain ground, and even threatened a change in the ministry. At length the reinforcement arrived about the latter end of June, and their general seemed determined to move against the army of the Electorat of Saxony, and the beginning of July, his army being in motion, he sent a detachment to dislodge the few Prussian troops that were left at Anschum, Demmin, and other places, to guard that frontier; and they retreated accordingly. Count Hamilton having nothing further to oppose him in the field, in a very little time recovered all Swedish Pomerania, and even made hot incursions into the Prussian territories. Meanwhile, a combined fleet of thirty-three Russian and seven Swedish ships of war appeared in the Baltic, and the beginning of July, his army being in motion, he sent a detachment to dislodge the few Prussian troops that were left at Anschum, Demmin, and other places, to guard that frontier; and they retreated accordingly. Count Hamilton having nothing further to oppose him in the field, in a very little time recovered all Swedish Pomerania, and even made hot incursions into the Prussian territories. were now reinforced by many patriots, who dreaded the vicinity, and suspected the designs, of the Russian army.

The diet of the republic was opened on the second day of November; but it was dissolved on the third, as if by mutual consent. The march of the French troops was unbeknown to the Polish government; and heavy complaints were made of the damages sustained from their cruelty and rapine. Great pains were taken to appease these clamours; and many were prevailed upon to retire gently to their homes, in a state of tranquillity, but when this ill-advised attempt miscarried, Pauloph, the son of the nuncio of Volpiana, stood up and declared that he would not permit any other point to be discussed in the diet, while the Russians maintained the least footing within the territories of the republic. Vain were all the attempts of the courtiers to persuade and mollify this inflexible patriot, he solemnly protested against their proceedings, and hastily withdrew; so that the mareschal was obliged to dissolve the assembly, and recourse was had to a secessus consilium, to concert proper measures to be taken in the present conjuncture. The King of Poland was, on this occasion, likewise disappointed in his views of providing for his children. Duke Charles, in the duchy of Courland, had been recommended by the court of Russia, and even approved by the states of that country; but two difficulties occurred. The States declared, they could not proceed to a new election during the life of their former duke, Counts Regenvald and Palz dated their resignation, and the king of Poland; and, according to the laws of that country, no prince could be elected, until he should have declared himself of the Augsburg confession. His Polish majesty, however, being determined to surmount all obstacles to his son’s interest, ordered Count Malachowski, high chancellor of Poland, to deliver to Prince Charles a commission, which the king intended, on payment of a stipulated sum, to the states of Courland to elect that prince for their duke, and appointed the day for his election and instalment; which accordingly took place in the month of January, notwithstanding the clamour of many Polish grandees, who persisted in affirming that the king had no power to grant such permission without the consent of the diet. The vicissitudes of the campaign had produced no revolutions in the several systems adopted by the different powers in Europe. The canons, who in the month of June had signed her sentiments and designs against the King of Prussia, in a declaration delivered to all the foreign ministers at Petersburg, seemed now, more than ever, determined, to resist the encroachments of the German body, which, under the command of the Elector of Saxony and the King of Prussia, he had a right, when deserted by his former allies, to seek assistance wheresoever it could be procured: and surely no just grounds of complaint could be offered against whom his Prussian majesty lent, to deliver the electoral states of Brunswick, as well as those of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttle, Hesse, and Buskeburg, from the oppressions of their common enemy. Post Ferry, he said, would hardly believe, at that a time when the troops of Austria, the Palatinate, and Wittelsbach, were engaged to invade the countries of the empire, other members of the Germanic body, who employed auxiliaries in their defence, should be threatened with outlawry and sequestration. He owned, that, in quality of king, he had sent over English troops to Germany, and taken possession of Embden: steps for which he was accountable to no power upon earth, although the constitutions of the empire permitted the co-operation of one or more foreign troops, not, indeed, for the purpose of invasion or conquest in Germany, but for their defence and preservation. He also acknowledged that he had resisted the conduct, and chastised the injustice, of those co-states, who had assisted his enemies, and maintained that his troops should be restored to him. He added, that if the crown of France was free to pillage the estates of the Duke of Brunswick, and the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, because they had supplied the King of England with auxiliaries, it was as much as was becoming and proper to herself half of the contributions raised by the French king in these countries; surely his Britannic majesty had an equal right to make those feel the burden of the war who had favoured the unjust enterprises of his enemies. He expressed his hope, that the diet, after having duly considered these circumstances, would, by way of advice, propose to his imperial majesty that he should annul his most inconsistent mandates, and not only take effectual measures to protect the electorate and its allies, but also give orders for commencing against the emperor-queen, the faculties of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the Duke of Württemberg, such proceedings as she wanted to enforce against his Britishic majesty, Elector of Brunswick-Lunebourg. For this purpose the minister most urgently desired that she should immediately give the necessary instructions for their principals. The rest of this long memorial contained a justification of his Britishic majesty's conduct in deviating from the capitulation of Closter-Seuen; with a refutation of the arguments adduced, and a restoration of the approaches styled against the King of England, in the paper or manifesto composed and published under the direction of the French ministry, and entitled, "A Parallel of the Conduct of the King of France with that of the King of England, relative to the Breach of the Capitulation of Closter-Seuen by the Hanoverian."

But to this invective a more circumstantial answer was published: in which, among other curious particulars, the learned, exposition, said to have been written by the Prussian commander to the King of Great Britain after the defeat at Colm, is treated as an infamous piece of forgery, produced by some venal pen employed to impose upon the public. He also, in his address to his Britishic majesty's aversion to a continental war, very justly observes, that "none but such as are unacquainted with the maritime force of England can believe that, without a diversion on the continent, to employ part of the enemy's fleet, they had a fair prospect of success, and maintain her superiority at sea. England, therefore, had no interest to foment quarrels or wars in Europe; but, for the same reason, there was room to fear that France would not be satisfied with a diversion, but she took no pains to conceal her views, and her emissaries declared publicly, that a war upon the continent was inevitable; and that the king's dominions in Germany would be its principal object." He afterwards, in the course of his argumentation, adds, "that they must be very ignorant, indeed, who imagine that the forces of England are not able to resist those of France, unless the latter be hindered from England all her efforts to the sea. In case of a war upon the continent, the two powers must pay subsidies: only with this difference, that France can employ her own land forces, and aspire at conquests."

Such were the professional sentiments of the British ministry, founded on clear truth and demonstrable, when the business was to prove that it was not the interest of Great Britain to maintain a war upon the continent; but, afterwards, when this continental war was extinguished, suppressed, and changed into the grand and treatise of the English nation, then the partisans of that very ministry, which had thus declared that England, without any diversion on the continent of Europe, was an overmatch for France by sea, which may be termed the British element; then their partisans, their champions, declaimers, and dependants, were taught to rise in rebellion against their former doctrine, and, in defiance of common sense and reflection, affirm that a diversion in Germany was absolutely necessary to the successful issue of England's operations in Asia, Africa, and America. Notwithstanding all the facts and arguments assembled in this elaborate memorial, to expose the ingenuity of the emperor-queen, and demonstrate the opposite measures adopted by the imperial power, it remains to be proved, that the member of a community is not obliged to yield obedience to the resolutions taken, and the decrees published, by the majority of those who compose this community; especially when reinforced with the authority of the supreme magistrate, and not repugnant to the fundamental constitution on which that community was established.

§ XLIV. If the empress-queen was not gratified to the extent of her wishes in the fortune of the campaign, at least her self-importance was flattered in another point, which could not fail of being interesting to a princess famed for a glowing zeal and inviolable attachment to the religion of Rome. In the month of August the pope conferred upon her the title of Apostolic Queen of Hungary, conveyed by a brief, in which he exalted her purity, and launched out into retrospective eulogiums of her predecessors, the princes of Hungary, who had always accustomcd to fight and overcome for the catholic faith under his holy and meritorious constitution, which he stated to derive from the regard of Prosper Lombartini, who exercised the papal sway under the assumed name of Benedict XIV. That pontiff, universally esteemed for his good sense, had been dear to his predecessor in the month of April, in the eighty-fourth year of his age; and in July was succeeded in the papacy by Cardinal Charles Rezzonico, Bishop of Padua, by birth a Venetian. He was formerly auditor of the Rosia; afterwards promoted to the patriarch by Pope Clement XII. In the nomination of the republic of Venice: was distinguished by the title of St. Maria d'Ara Celi, the principal convent of the Cordeliers, and nominated Protector of the Pandours, or Galicians. When he ascended the papal chair, he assumed the name of Clement XIII. in gratitude to the last of that name, who was his benefactor. Though of a disagreeable person, and even deformed in his body, he enjoyed good health, and was a vigorous spirit of devotion among his successors: so that his life was exemplary; his morals were pure, and unimpeached: in his character he is said to have been learned, diligent, steady, devout, and, in every respect, worthy to succeed to the apostolic sway.

§ XLV. The King of Spain wisely persisted in reaping the advantages of a neutrality, notwithstanding the intrigues of the French partisans at the court of Madrid, who endeavored to alarm his jealousy by the conquests which were made by the house of Parma in the provinces of Sardinia sagaciously kept aloof, resolving, in imitation of his predecessors, to maintain his power on a respectable footing, and be ready to seize all opportunities to extend and preserve his dominions; according to the position of his country. As for the King of Portugal, he had prudently embraced the same system of forbearance: but, in the latter end of the season, his attention was engrossed by a domestic event, but very alarming. Whether he had, by particular instances of severity, exasperated the minds of certain individuals, and exercised his dominion in such acts of arbitrary power as excited a general spirit of dissatisfaction among his subjects; or, finally, by the vigorous measures pursued against the encroaching Jesuits in Paraguay, and their correspondents in Portugal, had incurred the resentment of that society, we shall not pretend to determine; perhaps all these motives concurred in giving to the people, and the States, which was actually executed at this juncture with the most desperate resolution. On the third day of September, the King, according to custom, going out in a carriage to take the air, was met, and stopped by the bishop of Evora, who met him at a solitary place near Belem, attacked by three men on horseback, armed with musketeons, one of whom fired his piece at the coachman without effect. The man, however, terrified both on his own account and that of his sovereign, drove the mules at full speed; a circumstance which, in some measure, disconcerted the other two companions, who pursued him at full gallop, and having no leisure to take aim, discharged them to return to the tandem through the back of the carriage. The slugs with which they were loaded happened to pass between the king's right arm and his breast, dilacerating the parts from the shoulder to the elbow, but without damaging the bone, or penetrating into the cavity of the body. Finding himself self grievously wounded, and the blood flowing upon him, with such presence of mind as cannot be sufficiently admired, instead of proceeding to the palace, which was at some distance, composed the conclusion to retum to quarantine, where his principal surgeon resided, and there his wounds were immediately dressed. By this resolution, he not only prevented the irreparable mischief that might have arisen, and the excessive effusion of blood; but without all doubt, saved his life from the hands of other assassins, posted on the road to accomplish the reprise, in case he should escape alive from the first attack. That instance of the king's recollection was magnified into a miracle, on a supposition that it must have been the effect of Divine inspiration; and, indeed, among a people addicted to superstition, might well pass for a favourable interposition of Providence. The king, being thus disabled in his right arm, issued a decree, investing the queen with the absolute power of government. In the meantime, no person had access to his presence but herself, the first minister, the Cardinal de Salabendra, the physicians, and surgeons. An embargo was immediately put on all the shipping, in the port of Lisbon. Rewards were publicly offered, together with the promise of pardon to the accomplices, for detecting any of the assassins; and such other measures used, the result of which was, that the persons engaged in a conspiracy the more dangerous, as it appeared to have been formed by persons of the first quality and influence. The Duke de Aveiro, of the family of Mazarinches; the Marquis de Tavora, who had been viceroy of Goa, and now actually enjoyed the commission of general of the horse; the Count de Attougui, the Marquis de Alloria, together with their wives, children, and whole families, were arrested immediately after the assassination, as principals in the design; and many other accomplices, including some Jesuits, were apprehended in the sequel. The further proceedings on this mysterious affair, with the fate of the conspirators, will be particularized among the transactions of France and Spain; and it will therefore be unnecessary to observe, that the king's wounds were attended with no bad consequences; nor did the imprisonment of those noblemen produce any disturbance in the kingdom.

The countries were tissued with a continuation of the disputes between the parliament and clergy, touching the bull Unigenitus. In vain the king had interposed his authority: first proposing an accommodation; then compelling the parliament forbear taking cognizance of a religious contest, which did not fall under their jurisdiction; and, thirdly, abating their persons, and abrogating their power. He afterwards found it necessary to the peace of his dominions to recall and reinstate those venerable patriots and divines, who, during the convulsions of the irreligous insolence and turbulent spirit of the Archbishop of Paris, had exiled that prelate in his turn. He was no sooner re-admitted to his function, than he resumed his former conduct, touching the denial of the sacraments to those who refused to acknowledge the bull Unigenitus: he even acted with redoubled zeal; intrigued with the other prelates; caballed among the inferior clergy; and not content with depriving, he augmented, the troubles throughout the whole kingdom. Bishops, curates, and monks, presumed to withhold spiritual consolation from persons in extremity, and were punished by the civil power. Other prelates, being of opinion that the bishops had been encroached upon by that of Paris, in asserting their authority and privileges. The king commanded them to desist, on pain of incurring his indignation; they renounced and persevered; and the bishop repented his injudicious and censures, and continued to inflame the dispute to such a dangerous degree, that he was given to understand he should be again obliged to quit the capital, if he did not proceed with more moderation. But the chief care of the French ministry was employed in regulating the finances, and establishing funds of credit for raising money to pay subsidies, and maintain the war in Europe and America. In the course of this year they had not only considerably reduced the national debt of Germany, but made surprising efforts to supply the colony of Canada with troops, artillery, stores, and ammunition, for its defence against the operations of the British forces, which greatly outnumbered and overpowered it. They also forbad the exportation of gold and silver bullion; and practised every stratagem to elude the vigilance of the English cruisers. The ships destined for America they detained, both single and in convoys, sometimes from the harbor of Havre; from the colonies from their havens to the channel. They assembled transports in one port, in order to withdraw the attention of their enemies from another, where their convoys lay ready for sailing; and in boisterous weather, when the English could no longer block up their harbours, their ships came forth, and hazarded the voyage, for the relief of their American settlements. Those that had the good fortune to arrive on the coast of that continent were obliged to have recourse to different expedients for escaping the British squadrons stationed at Halifax, or cruising in the bay of St. Lawrence. They either ventured to navigate the river before it was clear of the ice, so early in the spring, that the enemy had not yet quitted the harbours of Nova Scotia; or they waited on the coast of Newfoundland for such thick fogs as might screen them from the notice of the English cruisers, in sailing up the gulf; or, lastly, they penetrated through the straits of Belleisle, daring to approach the continent, which, ever, led them directly into the river St. Lawrence, at a considerable distance above the station of the British squadron. Though the French navy was by this time so reduced that it needed to fetch new shipping, or furnish proper convey for commerce, her minister nevertheless attempted to alarm the subjects of Great Britain with the project of an invasion. Flat-bottomed boats were built, transports collected, large ships of the line equipped, and troops ordered to assemble on the coast for embarkation; but this was no more than a feint to arouse the apprehension of the English, disconcert the administration, prejudice the national credit, and deter the government from sending forces to keep alive the war in Germany. A much more effectual method they took to distress the trade of England, by laying up their useless ships of war, and encouraging the equipment of stout privateers, which did come down to the French coast and succeeded in these expedients. The ministry of England did not think it necessary to furnish intelligence from boats employed for that purpose. Some chose their station in the North sea, where a great number of captures were made upon the coast of Scotland; others cruised the coast of the channel, and even to the westward of Ireland; but the far greater number scoured the seas in the neighbourhood of the Leeward Islands in the West Indies, where they took a prodigious number of British ships, sallying too from the sugar colonies, and cruised among the French settlements in Martinique, Guadaloupe, or St. Domingo.

§ XLVIII. With respect to the war that raged in Germany, the King of Denmark wisely pursued that course, which happily preserved him from being involved in those troubles by which great part of Europe was agitated, and terminated in that point of national advantage which a king ought ever to have in view for the benefit of his people. By observing a scrupulous neutrality, he enhanced his importance among his neighbours: he saw himself courted by all the belligerent powers; he saved the blood and treasure of his subjects; he received large subsidies, in connection with the French ministry and occupation of the German dominions; and much more considerable share of commerce than he could expect to carry on, even in times of universal tranquillity. He could not perceive that the protestant religion had anything to apprehend from the confederacy which was formed against the Prussian monarch: nor was he misled into all the expense, the perils, and disquiets of a sanguinary war, by that ignis fatuus which hath seduced and impoverished other opulent nations, under the specious title of the balance of power in Germany. However he might be swayed by private inclination, he did not think it was a point of consequence to his kingdom, whether Pomerania was possessed by Sweden or Prussia; whether the French army was driven back beyond the Rhine, or permitted once more into the electorate of Hanover; whether the empress-queen was stripped of her remaining possessions in Silesia, or the King of Prussia circumscribed within the original bounds of his dominions. He might observe that France, for her own sake, would prevent the ruin of that enterprising monarch; and that the house of Austria would not be so impolitic, and blind to its own interest, as to permit the Empire of Russia to be drawn in, and remain conjurists in the kingdom of Prussia; but even if the enemy should be weak enough to sacrifice all the maxims of sound policy to caprice or resentment, he did not think himself so deeply concerned in the event, as, for the distant prospect of what might possibly happen, to put himself into war that must be attended with certain and immediate disadvantages. True it is, he had no hereditary electorate in Germany that was threatened with invasion; nor, if he had, it is to be supposed that a prince of his capacity and patriotism would have impoverished his kingdom of its revenues, and endangered its distant territories. It was reserved for another nation to adopt the pernicious absurdity of wasting its blood and treasure, exhausting its resources, loading its own back with the most goryous'im-practicable, an enormouse business with bankrupt deer ; and in a word, of expending above a hundred and fifty millions sterling in fruitless efforts to defend a distant country, the entire property of which was never valued at one sixth part of that sum; as it had no material existence, but a common alliance arising from accident. The King of Denmark, though himself a prince of the empire, and possessed of dominions in Germany, almost contiguous to the scenes of the present war, did not yet think himself so nearly concerned in the issue, as to declare himself either principal or auxiliary in the quarrel; yet he took care to maintain his forces by sea and land upon a respectable footing; and by his conduct, he not only provided for the security of his own country, but overawed the belligerent powers, who considered him as a prince capable of making either scale preponderate, just as he might choose to trim the balance. Thus he preserved his wealth, commerce, and consequence undiminished; and, instead of being harassed as a party, was honoured as an umpire.

§ XLVIII. The United Provinces, though as adverse as his Danish majesty to any participation in the war, did not then yet think himself so nearly concerned in the issue,
land upon a respectable footing; and by his conduct, he
prince capable of making either scale preponderate, just as he might choose to trim the balance. Thus he preserved his wealth, commerce, and consequence undiminished;
and, instead of being harassed as a party, was honoured as an umpire.

The charge of violence and injustice, which they brought against the English, for taking and confiscating the ships that transported to Europe the produce of the French islands in the West Indies, they founded on the tenth article of the trade of commerce between Great Britain and the states-general of the United Provinces, concluded in the year one thousand six hundred and sixty-eight, stipulating, That whatever shall be found on board the ships of the states-general of the United Provinces, though the said part thereof, may belong to the enemies of Great Britain, shall be free and unmoiisted, except these be prohibited goods, which are to be served in the manner described by the foregoing articles. From this article the Dutch mer-cchants, when they said there were no prohibited goods on board, the English had no right to stop or molest any of their ships, or make the least inquiry to whom the merchandise belonged, whereas it was brought, or whither bound. This plea the English casuists would by no means admit, for the following reasons: A general and perpetual license to carry on the whole trade of their enemy would be such a glaring absurdity, as no convention could agree to: common sense has dictated, and Grotius declared, that no man can be supposed to have consented in an absurdity; therefore, the interpretation given by the Dutch to this article could not be supposed to be its true and genuine meaning; which, indeed, relates to nothing more than the common course of trade, as it was usually carried on in peace. But, even should this interprefile be accepted, the article, and the treaty itself, would be superseded and annulled by a subsequent treaty, controverted between the two nations in the year one thousand sand six hundred and seventy-five, and often confirmed since that period, stipulating, in a special article, that neither of the contracting parties should give, nor consent that any of their subjects or inhabitants should give, any protection to the enemy's merchandise at sea, or on the fresh waters; or should furnish, or permit the subjects or inhabitants of their respective territories to furnish, any ships, soldiers, seamen, victuals, monies, insurance, instruments of war, or other necessary to continue the war, to the enemies of either party, of any rank or condition soever. Now, the Dutch have infringed this article in many instances during the present war, both in Europe and America; and wherever they have so openly constra-tioned one of their subjects, the English have been obliged to contrary any other. They, moreover, forfeited all right to the observance of the treaty in question, by refusing the succours with which they were bound, in the most solemn manner, to furnish the King of Great Britain, in case any of his territories in Europe should be attacked; for nothing could be more weak and frivolous than the allegation upon which this refusal was founded: namely, that the hostilities in Europe were commenced by the English, when they seized and confiscated the vessels of France; and they, being the aggressors, had no right to insist upon the succours stipulated in a treaty which was purely defensive. If this argument has any weight, the treaty itself has no significance. The French, as in the present case, will always commence the war in America; and when their ships, containing reinforcements and stores for the maintenance of that war, shall be taken on the European coasts by the English, the French have no right to ask for that purpose, they will exclaim that the English were the aggressors in Europe, consequently deprived of all benefit accruing from the defensive treaty subsisting between them and the States-general of the United Provinces.
It being impossible for the English to terminate the war, while their enemies derive the sinews of it from their commerce carried on in neutral bottoms, they are obliged to suppress such collusion by that necessity; Grotius himself hath allowed to be a sufficient excuse for desisting from the letter of any treaty whatsoever. In time of peace no Dutch ships were permitted to carry the produce of any French sugar island, or even to trade in any of the French ports in America or the West Indies; consequently the treaty which they quote can never justify them in carying on a commerce, which, as it did not exist, and was not foreseen, could not possibly be guarded against when that convention was ratified. Grotius, whose authority is held in such veneration among the Dutch, has determined that every nation has a right to seize and confiscate the goods of any neutral power, which shall attempt to carry them without permission, whether by land or sea. The French islands in the West Indies were so blocked up by the English cruisers, that they could receive no relief from their own government, consequently no neutral power could attempt to supply them without finding under this precept. It was for these reasons that the King of England declared, by the mouth of Mr. Yorke, his minister plenipotentiary at the Hague, in a conference held in the month of August, with the deputies of the States-general, that though he was ready to concur in every measure that should be proposed for giving satisfaction to their high mightinesses, with whom he bad always studied to live in the most perfect union; he could by no means, nevertheless determined not to assist in confiscating the ships that were found to contain the merchandise of their enemies. The individual traders of

In the reign of King William, when the English and Dutch were engaged in a war against France, the northern powers of Sweden and Denmark also entered into the contest, on the side of the latter, which, as the Dutch and English joined in seizing the vessels that were commerce carriers, the complaints of these carriers had not the less, and the grievances were given to understand, at both places, that these should not be allowed to carry on any trade with France, but what was usual in time of peace. In consequence of this declaration, the Dutch, under the weight of that which Grotius had written in his note upon that author's treatise on the Laws of Nature and Nations, every mercantile nation will run considerable risks in extending their particular commerce, even when they know it must be detrimental to the general interest of their country. In the war maintained by the confederates against Louis XIV. of France, the merchant ships of the Dutch carried on an uninterrupted trade to the French ports: and, notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of Holland and the other subject states of Great Britain, they were frustrated of their efforts to prohibit this commerce, which undoubtedly enabled France to protract the war. The truth is, they gave the British ministry to understand, that unless they connived at this traffic, their subjects could not possibly defray their present expenses, and that the national credit of the country was at stake. It is well known through all Europe, that the subjects of the United Provinces reaped considerable advantage, not only from this branch of illicit trade, but also by providing for both armies in Flanders, and by the practice of stock-jobbing in England; consequently, it was not the interest, either of the States-general, or the English general, between whom there was a very good understanding, to bring that war to a speedy conclusion: nor, indeed, ought we to fix the imputation of partiality upon a whole nation, for the private conduct of individuals influenced by motives of self-interest, which co-operate with the same energy in both countries, and among the subjects of Great Britain. After the course of the former war, such a scandalous appetite for gain prevailed in different parts of the British dominions, that the French islands were actually supplied with provisions, slaves, and lumber, from Ireland and the British islands. In this manner, in particular, must have surrendered to the commander of the English squadron stationed in those seas, had it not been thus supported by English subjects. Certain it is, the British ministers, in the course of this last war, endeavored to break into this species of traffic by the article of a treaty, which, in their opinion, admitted of no limitation; and that the government of Great Britain, without any previous warning, or demand from the States-general, should now swept the sea at once of all their vessels employed in this commerce, and condemned them, without mitigation, to the entire ruin of many thousands families. Considering the nature of the States-general, and the states of the United Provinces, they seem to have had some right to an intimation of this nature, which, in all probability, would have induced them to forego all prospect of advantage from the prosecution of such traffic.

§ XLIX. Besides the universal clamour excited in Holland, and the famous memorial presented to the States-general, which we have already mentioned in another place, it was likewise the circumstance somewhat to which the queen of England was led to address a memorial, on the princess regent, to explain their grievances, and demand her concurrence in augmenting the navy for the preservation of their commerce. She promised to interpose with the court of Holland; and, at the same time, she promised to co-operate with representations made by the States-general, the English minister was empowered to open conferences at the Hague, in order to bring matters in dispute to an amicable accommodation. These endeavours, however, proved ineffectual. The British cruisers continued to take, and the British courts to condemn, all Dutch vessels containing the produce of the French sugar islands. The merchants of Holland and Zealand renewed their complaints with redoubled clamour, and all the trading part of the nation, reinforced by the whole party that opposed the house of Orange, cried aloud for an immediate augmentation of the marine, and reprisals upon the pirates of England. The minister, in order to avoid extremes, was obliged not only to employ all her personal influence with the States-general, but also to play off one faction against another, in the way of remonstrance and explanations. At the end of June, at the month of June, the princess regent, on the States-general, reminding them, that in the beginning of the war between France and England, she had advised an augmentation should be made in the navy: and that a war maintained by the confederates against Louis XIV. of France, the merchant ships of the Dutch carried on an uninterrupted trade to the French ports: and, notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of Holland and the other subject states of Great Britain, they were frustrated of their efforts to prohibit this commerce, which undoubtedly enabled France to protract the war. The truth is, they gave the British ministry to understand, that unless they connived at this traffic, their subjects could not possibly defray their present expenses, and that the national credit of the country was at stake. It is well known through all Europe, that the subjects of the United Provinces reaped considerable advantage, not only from this branch of illicit trade, but also by providing for both armies in Flanders, and by the practice of stock-jobbing in England; consequently, it was not the interest, either of the States-general, or the English general, between whom there was a very good understanding, to bring that war to a speedy conclusion: nor, indeed, ought we to fix the imputation of partiality upon a whole nation, for the private conduct of individuals influenced by motives of self-interest, which co-operate with the same energy in both countries, and among the subjects of Great Britain. After the course of the former war, such a scandalous appetite for gain prevailed in different parts of the British dominions, that the French islands were actually supplied with provisions, slaves, and lumber, from Ireland and the British islands. In this manner, in particular, must have surrendered to the commander of the English squadron stationed in those seas, had it not been thus supported by English subjects. Certain it is, the British ministers, in the course of this last war, endeavored to break into this species of traffic by the article of a treaty, which, in their opinion, admitted of no limitation; and that the government of Great Britain, without any previous warning, or demand from the States-general, should now swept the sea at once of all their vessels employed in this commerce, and condemned them, without mitigation, to the entire ruin of many thousands families. Considering the nature of the States-general, and the states of the United Provinces, they seem to have had some right to an intimation of this nature, which, in all probability, would have induced them to forego all prospect of advantage from the prosecution of such traffic.

§ L. In consequence of this interposition, the States-general that same day sent a letter to the states of Holland and West Friesland, communicating the sentiments of the princess-regent, and insisting upon the necessity of complying with her proposal of the double augmentation. They observed, that an augmentation of the land forces, for the defence of the frontiers, was unavoidable, as an equipment by sea for the security of commerce; that the states of the provinces of Guelders, Utrecht, Overysell, and Groningen, joined them in the same opinion; and accordingly had insisted, by divers letters and propositions, on those two points so essential to the public interest. They represented the danger of delay, and the fatal effects of discord: they proposed, that by a reciprocal indulgence one party should comply with the sentiments of the other, it was not exposed to any serious inconvenience, than the division among the confederates, the consequences of which would be very deplorable, while the republic in the meantime would remain in a dangerous condition, both by sea and land. They advanced, that they were already exposed to danger from their more distant neighbours. They conjured them, therefore, as they valued the safety of their country, and all that was dear to them, as they regarded the protection of the good inhabitants, the concord and harmony which at all times, but especially at the present critical juncture, was of the last necessity, that they would seriously reflect upon the exhortations of her royal highness, as well as on the repeated instances of the majority of the confederates, and take measures and exert every reasonable effort with regard to the proposed augmentation of the land forces, so that this addition, together with an equipment at sea, might, the sooner the better, be unanimously brought to a conclusion. It was understood, that the duty of all officers residing well within the country to moderate the heat and precipitation of those, who, provoked by their losses, and stimulated by resentment, adventurously at this period to involve their nation in war with Great Britain, was a matter of the greatest consequence, in a few months the republic would, in all probability, have been brought to the brink of ruin. The Dutch were distracted by internal divisions; they were altogether unprovided for hostilities; the ocean was covered with the trading vessels; and the naval armaments of Great Britain were so numerous and powerful as to render all resistance on that element equally vain and pernicious. The English could not only have scourged the seas, and made prize of their shipping, but were also in a condition to reduce or demolish all their towns in Zealand, where they would hardly have met with any opposition.

In the course of the year it appeared that the measures which had been adopted as a spy for the French ministry: to which, in consideration of a patry pension, he sent intelligence of every material occurrence in Great Britain. The correspondence was managed by his brother, a Jesuit, who acted as chaplain and secretary to the Spanish ambassador at the Hague. The British resident at that court having learned from the Spanish minister some secrets relating to England, even before they were communicated to him from the English ministry, was induced to set on foot an inquiry touching the source of this information, and soon received an assurance, that the secretary of the Spanish ambassador had a brother, a physician, in London. The suspicious naturally arising from this, and the circumstances in which a minister of the English secret service, Hansey was narrowly watched, and twenty-nine of his letters were intercepted. From the contents of these he was convicted of having given the French court the first notice of the expeditions to North America, the capture of the two ships, the Alcudia and Lys, the sailing and destination of every squadron and armament, and the difficulties that occurred in raising money for the service of the public. He had even informed them that the secret expedition of the foregoing year was intended against Rochefort, and advised a descent upon Great Britain, at a certain time and place, as the most effectual method of distressing the government, and affecting the nation's credit. After he was apprehended for guilt of treason, and received the sentence of death usually pronounced on such occasions: but whether he earned forgiveness by some material discovery, or the minister found it inexpedient to meddle with the matter, he was ashamed to take his life, he escaped execution, and was pardoned, on condition of going into perpetual exile. The severity of the government was much about the same period exercised on Dr. Shebbeare, a public writer, who, in a series of his articles, reflected on the kind and conduct of the ministry, incensed at the boldness, and still more enraged at the success, of this author, whose writings were bought with avidity by the public, determined to punish him. severely for his arrogance and abuse, and he was apprehended by a warrant from the secretary's office. His sixth letter to the people of England, was pitched upon as the last and most effectual plea of reflection that this court of king's bench, was found guilty of having written the sixth letter to the people of England adjoined a libellous pamphlet, sentenced to stand in the pillory, to pay a small fine and to be imprisoned three years, and give security for his future good behaviour: so that, in effect, this good man suffered more for having given vent to the unguarded effusions of mistaken zeal, couched in the language of passion, than he could sustain: that, whatever remorse they might feel, however they might detest their own vice, or long for an opportunity of amendment, they were entirely destitute of all means of reforming that corruption, which the pen of a friend could sustain: that, whatever remorse they might feel, however they might detest their own vice, or long for an opportunity of amendment, they were entirely destitute of all means of reforming that corruption, which the pen of a friend

§ III. Amidst a variety of crimes and disorders, arising from impetuousness of temper, unreined passion, luxury, extravagance, and an almost total want of police and subordination, the virtues of benevolence are always springing up to an extraordinary growth in the British soil; and here charities are often established by the humanity of individuals, which in any other country would be honoured as national institutions: witness the great number of hospitals and infirmaries in London and Westminster, erected and maintained by voluntary contribution, or raised by the subscriptions of gentlemen at the court of king's bench; in this country the public began to enjoy the benefit of several admirable institutions. Mr. Henry Raine, a private gentleman of Middlesex, had, in his life-time, built and endowed an asylum for the maintenance of forty poor maidens. By his will, he bequeathed a sum of money to accumulate at interest, under the management of trustees, until the yearly produce should amount to two hundred and ten pounds, to be paid in marriage-portions to two of the maidens educated in his hospital, at the age of twenty-two, who should be the best recommended for piety and industry by the masters or mistresses whom they had served. In the month of March, the sum destined for this purpose was discharged by the action of the trustees, by public advertisement, summoned the maiden educated in the hospital to appear on a certain day, with proper certificates of their behaviour and circumstances, that the most deserving might be selected to draw lots for the prize of one hundred pounds, to be paid as her marriage portion, provided she married a man of an unblemished character, a member of the church of England, residing within certain specified parishes, and approved by the trustees. Accordingly, on the first of May, the candidates appeared, and the prize being gained by one young woman, in presence of a numerous assembly of all ranks, attracted by curiosity, the other five maidens, with a full assurance of the same reward, were also summoned to appear, and were marked for a second chance on the same day of the following year, when a second prize of the same value would be presented: thus a new candidate will be added every May. The charity established by Mr. Raine has been conducted in this hospital, and preserved her character without reproach, may have a chance for the noble donation, which is also accompanied with the sum of five pounds to defray the expense of the wedding entertainment. One scarce knows whether most to admire the plan, or commend the humanity, of this excellent institution. Of equal and perhaps superior merit was another charitable establishment, which also took effect about this period. A small number of humane individuals, desirous of the happiness of their countrymen, were deeply affected with the situation of common prostitutes, who are certainly the most forlorn of all human creatures, formed a generous resolution in their favour, such as even the best men of the kingdom could not be persuaded to own. They considered that many of these unhappy creatures, so wracked in themselves, and so productive of mischief to society, had been seduced to vice in their tender years by the pernicious artifice of the other sex, or the violence of unruly parents, before they had acquired experience, or courage to resist the one, or foresight to perceive the fatal consequences of the other: that the jewel, reputation, being thus irretrievably lost, perhaps in one unguarded moment, they were covered over with that dark and desolate liesm that the world would not sustain, and the public consider as an accursed death. They, by the one, or foresight to perceive the fatal consequences of the other: that the jewel, reputation, being thus irretrievably lost, perhaps in one unguarded moment, they were covered over with that dark and desolate liesm that the world would not sustain, and the public consider as an accursed death. In a word, the society is so numerous, the contributions so copious, the benevolence so universal, and the spirit of the Duke of Marlborough, with such discretion and spirit, as to promise much more effectual and extensive advantage to the public than ever accrued from all the boasted academies of Christendom. This, however, left an academy for improvement in the art of drawing from living figures; but in order to extend this advantage, which was not attended without difficulty and expense, the Duke of Richmond, a young nobleman of the most amiable character, provided a large apartment at Whitehall, for the use of the academy, at the expense of the king, for the sake of his daughter, and engraved; and furnished it with a collection of original plaster casts from the best antique statues and busts at Rome and Florence. Here any learner had liberty to draw, or make models, under the eye and instructions of two eminent artists, Mr. Wren and Mr. Scheemakers, and under the founder bestowed premiers of silver medals on the four pupils who excelled the rest in drawing from a certain figure, and making up the model of it in basso-relievò.

"A member among transactions that distinguish the history of Great Britain, scarce a year goes by without proving some incident that strongly marks the spirit of the age, the nature of the times, the state of the kingdom, with the effects of those improvements on the morals and manners of the people, and pointing out the most proper means for their future advancement. In a word, the society is so numerous, the contributions so copious, the benevolence so universal, and the spirit of the Duke of Marlborough, with such discretion and spirit, as to promise much more effectual and extensive advantage to the public than ever accrued from all the boasted academies of Christendom. This, however, left an academy for improvement in the art of drawing from living figures; but in order to extend this advantage, which was not attended without difficulty and expense, the Duke of Richmond, a young nobleman of the most amiable character, provided a large apartment at Whitehall, for the use of the academy, at the expense of the king, for the sake of his daughter, and engraved; and furnished it with a collection of original plaster casts from the best antique statues and busts at Rome and Florence. This academy was, in 1758, at the Houses of parliament met at Westminster, when his majesty being indisposed, the session was opened by commission, and the lord keeper harangued them to this effect. He told them, his majesty had directed the lords of the commission to assure his parliament that he always received the highest satisfaction in being able to lay before them any event that might promote the honour and interest of his kingdom and his enemies. It was in the harbour of to the assistance which they unanimously gave, his majesty had exerted his endeavours to carry on the war in the most vigorous manner, in order to attain that desirable end, that the operations of the maritime enemy were unequally affected, and that it had pleased the Divine Providence to bless his measures and arms with success in several parts, and to make the enemies of the nation feel, that the strength of Great Britain was not to be provoked with impunity; that the conversion of the greatest part of the British fleet, with the islands of Cape Breton and St. John, the demolition of Frontenac, of the highest importance to his operations in America, and the reduction of Senegal, could not fail to bring great distress to the French commerce and colonies, and, in proportion, to procure great advantage to those of Great Britain. He observed, that France had also been made sensible, that whilst her forces are sent forth to invade and ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coasts are not inaccessible to his majesty’s fleets and armies: a truth which she had experienced in the demolition of the works at Cherbourg, erected at a great ex-pen$e, which were reduced to the loss of a great number of ships and vessels; but no treatment, however injurious to his majesty, could tempt him to make retaliation on the innocent subjects of that crown. He told them, that in Germany his majesty’s great advantage was the jealousy of Brunswick, which found full employment for the enemies of France and her confederates, from which the English operations, both by sea and in America, had derived the most advantageous: their successes, owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery of his majesty’s troops, and those of his allies, having been signal and glorious. The king, moreover, commanded them to deeliver up the persons of all those who, being, which was still making noble and glorious efforts against the natural union formed to oppress it: that the commerce of his subjects, the source of national riches, had, by the gentle protection received from his majesty’s fleet, flourished in a manner not to be paralleled during such troubles. In this state of things, he said, the king, in his wisdom, thought it unnecessary to use many words to persuade them to bear up against all difficulties, effectually, if necessary, in support of his arm, and elevating himself up to the height of his empire, he had support the King of Prussia, and the rest of his majesty’s allies, and to exert themselves to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He observed to the Hanseatic League, that the benefit of the war, which was to be otherwise expensive: that the king had ordered them to declare to the Commons, that he sincerely lamented, and deeply felt for the destruction of Louisburg, and had ordered the measures which were ordered to be laid before them; and that he desired only such supplies as should be requisite to push the war with advantage, and be adequate to the necessary services.
In the last place, he assured them, the king took so much satisfaction in that good harmony which subsisted among his faithful subjects, that it was more proper for him now to thank them for it, than to repeat his exhortation to it: that this union, necessary at all times, was more especially necessary, and his majesty, verily doubted not but the good effects the nation had found from it would be the strongest motives to them to pursue it.—The reader will, no doubt, be surprised to find this handsome letter in a civil war; but it seems the eloquence of expression he will wonder that, in particu-larizing the successes of the year in America, no mention is made of the reduction of Fort Du-Quene, on the river Ohio; a place of great importance, both from its strength and situation, the erection of which had been one great motive to the war between the two nations: but he will be still more surprised to hear it declared from the throne, that the operations, both by sea and in America, had detrived the most extraordinary advantage from the attacks of the privateers of England. An assertion the more extraordinary, as the British ministry, in their answer to the parallel, which we have already mentioned, had expressly affirmed, that "none but such as were as unaccountable, and not such as had been wrong that, without a diversion on the extent, to employ part of the enemy’s force, she is not in a condition to hope for success, and maintain her superiority at sea. That they must not, therefore, expect that the forces of England are not able to reseat those of France unless the latter be hundered from turning all her efforts to the sea." It is very remarkable that the British ministry should declare, that the war in Germany was favourable to the English operations by sea and in America, and almost in the same breath accuse the French king of having fomented that war. Let us suppose that France had no will to maintain in Europe; and ask in what manner she, in that case, would have opposed the progress of the British army by sea, and in America? Her navy was reduced to such a condition, that it durst not quit her harbours; her merchant-ships were all taken, her mariners confined in England, and the sea, with a might, of necessity, would, in these circumstances, what expedients she could she have contrived for sending supplies and reinforcements to America, or for opposing the naval armaments of Great Britain in any other part of the world!—None. Without ships and mariners, how was she to employ her armed forces, for this respect, as useless as money to a man shipwrecked on a desolate island. But granting that the war in Germany had, in some measure, diverted the attention of the French ministry from the prosecution of their operations in America, (and this is granting more than ought to be allowed,) the question is not, whether the hostilities upon the continent of Europe prevented France from sending a great number of troops to America; but whether the expedition of so many was either necessary or expedient for distressing the French more effectively in other parts of the world? Surely every intelligent man of candour must answer in the negative. The expense incurred by England for subsidies and armies in the empire, exceeded three millions sterling anually: and this enormous expense, without being able to protect Hanover, only served to keep the war alive in different parts of Germany. Had one half of this sum been employed in subduing and destroying the last monuments of Great Britain, and in reinforcing her troops in America and the West Indies, France would have been, at this day, deprived of all her sugar colonies, as well as of her settlements in the continent of America; and she would have likely been able to prevent those operations which would have brought the French nation the most important advantage. In the conclusion of the peace of Utrecht, France was to have gained, or lost, beyond the denominate in which the King of Prussia is engaged, lays him under the necessity of making fresh efforts to defeat himself against the multitude of enemies who attack his dominions, be is obliged to take new measures with the King of England, for their reciprocal defence and safety; and his Britannic majesty had at the same time signified his earnest desire to strengthen the friendship subsisting between the two courts, and in consequence of the above considerations, he submitted to his Prussian majesty speedy and powerful assistance, their majesties have nominated and authorized their ministers to concert and settle the following articles:—All former treaties between the two nations, particularly that signed at West- minister on the 16th day of January, in the year 1756, and the convention of the 11th of April in the year 1758, are thereby dissolved, and they were hereby inserted word for word. The King of Great Britain shall cause to be paid at London, to such person or persons as shall be authorized by the King of Prussia for that end, the sum of four millions of rials-dollars, making six hundred and seventy thousand pounds sterling, at one payment, immediately on the exchange of the ratification, if the King of Prussia shall so require. His Prussian majesty shall employ the said sum in supporting and augmenting his forces, which shall act in such manner as shall be of the greatest service to the common cause, and contribute most to the mutual defence and safety of their said majesties. The King of Great Britain, both as king and elector, and the King of Prussia, not to be bound themselves not to conclude any treaties with the powers that have part taken in the present war, any treaty of peace, truce, or other such like convention, but by common advice and consent, each expressly in- cluding the other. The ratification of the present convention shall be exchanged within six weeks, or sooner, if possible. In effect, this treaty was no other than a re- newal of the subsidy from year to year, because it was not thought proper to stipulate in the first subsidiary convention an annual supply of such importance, until the war should be terminated, lest the people of England should be alarmed at the prospect of such successive burdens, and the compliance of the Commons be in some future session exacted. Of course it was perhaps the most extraordinary treaty that ever was concluded; for it contains no specification of articles, except the payment of the subsidy; every other article was left to the interpre- tation of his Prussian majesty.

§ VII. The parliament, having performed the ceremony of addresses to the throne, immediately proceeded to the great work of the supply. The two committees in the House of Commons were immedi-ately convened; a new convention was made, and, with the consideration of the events of the ensuing month of May, by the twenty-third day of which all their resolutions were taken. They voted sixty thousand men, including fourteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five marines, on the service of the several provinces; and for the operations by land, a body of troops, amounting to fifty- two thousand five hundred and fifty-three effective men, besides the auxiliaries of Hanover, Hesse, Brunswick, Saxo-Gotha, and Buckeburg, to the number of fifty thou- sand, and five battalions on the Irish establishment in actual service in America and Africa. For the mainten- ance of the sixty thousand men employed in the sea service, they granted three millions one hundred and twenty thousand pounds; for the land forces, one million two hundred fifty-six thousand one hundred and thirty pounds, fifteen shillings, and two pence; for the charge of the additional five battalions, forty thousand eight hundred and forty-two pounds; for the general of the victorious army, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the sum of seven hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, for the pay of the general and staff officers, and hospitals of the land forces, fifty-two thousand four hundred and eighty-four pounds, one shilling, and eight pence; for maintaining the garrisons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, New... utmost importance, and be attended with the most peni-uous consequences, if proper means should not immediately be applied to prevent or defeat them, is desirable that this House will enable him to defy any extraordinary expenses of campaigns, number of several families of the people of the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine, and to take all such measures as may be necessary to disap-point or defeat any enterprises or designs of his enemies, and as usual, being in the main of the same kind of part, being, and as usual, being, a local, popular measure. A meeting was be read, a motion was made, and agreed to nem. con. that it should be referred to the committee, who forthwith formed upon it the resolution, whereby one million was granted, to be laid on the table in question-hall, to be referred on the sides, that should be given in the next session.
This produced a bill enabling his majesty to raise the sum of one million, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, comprehending a clause, allowing the Bank of England to advance, on the credit of the loan therein mentioned, any sum not exceeding a million, notwithstanding the act of the fifth and sixth years in the reign of William and Mary, by which the bank was established.

6 IX. The bills relating solely to supply being discussed and expedited, the House proceeded, as usual, to enact other laws for the advantage of the community. Petitions having been presented by the cities of Bristol and New-Sarum, praying the house to make provision of low wines and spirits from grain, meal, and flour, had been in force, the commonalty appeared more sober, healthy, and industrious; representing the ill consequences which they apprehended would attend the repeal of these laws, and the consequentuncan of the first part of the whole House resolved that the prohibition to export corn should be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-ine; subject nevertheless to such provisions for shortening the said term of its continuance as should therefore be made by act of that session, or by his majesty with the advice of his privy council during the recess of parliament; that no corn, or grain, or flour imported, or brought in at price, was not proper to be further continued; and that the prohibition to make low wines or spirits from any sort of grain, meal, or flour, should be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine.
Before the bill was formed on these resolutions, petitions arrived from Liverpool and Bath, to the same purpose as those of Bristol and Sarum: while, on the other hand, petitions from a great number of the malt distillers of the city and suburbs of London, alluding to that, it having been deemed expedient to prohibit the distilling of spirits from any sort of grain to the twenty-fourth day of December; many distillers having not, for that reason, import spirits from foreign ports, or being prejudicial to the health of individuals, were in many damp and marshy parts of the kingdom absolutely necessary for preserving the field-labourers from agues and other distempers produced by the cold and moisture of the climate; that if they were denuded of the use of malt spirits, they would have recourse to French brandy, with which, as they generally resided near the sea-coast, the smugglers would provide them almost as cheap as the small spirits could be afforded; and that the prohibition or suspension of French spirit would drain the nation of ready money to a considerable amount, and prejudice the king's revenue in the same proportion. They observed, that the small spirit was the foundation of the trade, and disposed of their materials; that all of them would probably take the same resolution should the bill pass into a law, as no man could foresee when the prohibition would cease, should it be continued at a time when all sorts of grain abounded in such plenty, that the very waste of materials by dissipation, over and above the lying out of the money, would be of great prejudice to the proprietor; that the business of distilling, by which so many families were supported, would be banished from the kingdom entirely: especially, as the expense of establishing a large distillery was so great, that no man would choose to employ his money for this purpose, judging from experience that some future accidental scarcity of corn might induce the legislature to interpose a ruinous delay in this branch of business. They affirmed, that from the excessive use of malt spirits no good argument could be drawn against this branch of traffic, no more than against any other commonplace of life; that the excessive use of common ale was prejudicial to the health and morals of the people, yet no person ever thought of putting an end to the practice of brewing, in order to prevent the abuse of the brewed liquors. They urged, that if necessary, some parcels of land that produce nothing to advantage but a coarse kind of barley, called big, which, though neither fit for brewing nor for baking, may nevertheless be used, were not to be disposed of; but purchased by those concerned in this branch at such an encouraging price, as enables many farmers to pay a higher quantities of meal, flour, bread, and biscuit, to the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, for the sole use of the inhabitants; and another to prohibit the making of low wines and spirits from bran. Much more attention was paid to a petition, arising out of the country of Southwark, a petition, that their farms consisted chiefly of arable land, which produced much greater quantities of corn than could be consumed within that county; that in the last harvest the most prodigious crop of all sorts of grain, the greatest part of which had, by unfavourable weather, been rendered unfit for sale at London, or other markets for home consumption; that large quantities of malt were sold at twenty shillings per quarter; and for the grass of barley growing in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven, the sale of which was stagnated: that the petitioners being informed the House had ordered in a bill to continue the prohibition of corn exported, they begged leave to observe, that, should it pass into a law, it would be extremely prejudicial to all, and ruin many farmers of that county, as they had offered their corn for sale at divers ports and markets of the said county; but the merchants refused to buy it at any price, alleging its being unfit for the London market, the great quantity of corn with which that market was already overstocked, and their not being allowed either to export it or make it into malt for exportation: that the removal of these obstructions might be removed, or they, the petitioners, indulged with some other kind of relief. Although this remonstrance was duly considered, the bill passed with the amendments, because of the proviso, by which his majesty in council was empowered to alter the shilling toll chargeable with respect to the exportation of corn during the recess of parlament; but the temporary restraint laid upon distillation was made absolute, without any such condition, to the no small disappointment and mortification of the distillers, who had spared no pains and expense, by private solicitation and strenuous dispute in the public papers, to rec-mand their cause to the favour of the community. They charged that malt and spirits were the only articles of being prejudicial to the health of individuals, were in
small spirits could be afforded; thus the increase of consumption of French spirit would drain the nation of ready
revenue in the same proportion. They observed, that the small spirit was the foundation of the trade, and disposed of their materials; that all of them would probably take the same resolution should the bill pass into a law, as no man could foresee when the prohibition
sorts of grain abounded in such plenty, that the very
waste of materials by dissipation, over and above the lying out of the money, would be of great prejudice to the proprietor; thus the business of distilling, by which so many families were supported, would be banished from the kingdom
of business. They affirmed, that from the excessive use of malt spirits no good argument could be drawn against this branch of traffic, no more than against any other com-
ale was prejudicial to the health and morals of the people, yet no person ever thought of putting an end to the practice of brewing, in order to prevent the abuse of the brewed liquors. They urged, that if necessary, some parcels of land that produce nothing to advantage but a coarse kind of barley, called big, which,
though neither fit for brewing nor for baking, may never-
rent to their landlords than they could otherwise afford: that there are every year some parcels of all sorts of grain so damaged by unsalubrious weather, or other accidents, as to be rendered altogether unfit for broad or brewery, and would prove a very great misfortune to the farmers, if there was no distillery, for the use of which he could sell his damaged commodity. They asserted, that malt spirits were absolutely necessary for prosecuting some branches of commerce, particularly that of the coast of Africa, for which traffic no abundant collection could be made up without a large quantity of geneva, of which the natural price is so fond, that they will not traffic with any merchant who will not discriminate against the sale of such spirits, for sale, but also for presents to their chiefs and rulers: that the merchants of Great Britain must either have this commodity of their own produce, or import it at a great national expense from Holland; that the charge of this importation, together with the duties payable upon it, some part of which is not to be drawn back on exportation, will render it impossible for the traders to sell it so cheap, on the coast of Africa, as it might be sold by the Dutch, who are the great rivals of Great Britain in this branch of commerce. To these arguments, all of which were plausible, and some of them unanswerable, it was replied, that malt spirits might be considered as a fatal and bewitching poison, for which they would be sufficient to observe, that the use of beer and ale had proved most fatal: among the effects which were the consequences of drinking geneva; and since the prohibition of the distillery of malt liquor had taken place, the common people were become apprised of its appearance, and had used that beverage with circumspection sufficient to prevent the legislature not only to interdict, but even totally to abolish, the practice of distillation, which has ever been productive of such intoxication; and yet there was not the lower classes of the people, as might be deemed the greatest evils incident to a well regulated commonwealth. Their assertion, with respect to the coarse kind of barley, called big, was equally made as a deviation from the natural price as it was used in making malt, as well as in making bread; and with respect to damaged corn, those who understood the nature of grain affirmed, that if it was spoiled to such a degree as to be altogether unfit for either of these purposes, the distillery would not purchase it at such a price, but would undeniably the farmer for the charge of thrashing and carriage; for the distillers are very sensible, that their greatest profit is derived from their distilling the malt made from damaged corn, for which the market is so low, that the increase in the price of malt, which is far exceeded in proportion the advance of the price. It was not, however, an easy matter, to prove that the distillation of malt spirits was not necessary to an advantageous prosecution of the commerce on the coast of Guinea, as well as among the Indians in some parts of North America. Certainly it is, that in these branches of traffic, the want of geneva may be supplied by spirits distilled from sugars and molasses. After all, it must be said that the good and salutary effects of the prohibition were visible in every part of the kingdom, and no evil consequences ensued, except a diminution of the revenue in this article; a consequence which, at all times, ought to be sacrificed to the health. If the proof of such a measure as insinuation be found of any great weight, when we reflect that the less the malt spirit is drank, the greater quantity of beer and ale will be consumed, and the produce of the duties and excise upon the beverage be augmented accordingly.

§ X. In the meantime, all sorts of grain continuing to fall in price, and great plenty appearing in every part of the kingdom, the justices of the peace and the grand juries, assembled several times, and petitioned the House of Commons, for leave to issue out of the common fund, held for the county of Norfolk, composed and presented to the House of Commons, in the beginning of February, a petition, representing, that the weather proving unfavourable, as a part of the barley raised in that county was much damaged, and rendered unfit for any other use than that of being made into malt for exportation; that unless it should be speedily manufactured for that purpose, it would be entirely spoiled, and perish in the hands of the growers; a loss that must be very sensibly felt by the landholders; they, therefore, entreated that leave might be given for the exportation of malt; and that they might be liable, for malt raised to the farmers, such further relief as to the House should seem just and reasonable. In consequence of this petition, the House resolved itself into a committee, to deliberate upon the subject; and as it appeared upon the examination of the petition, that there were Six Acts of Parliament passed, and great abundance diffused through the kingdom, they resolved, that the continuance of that part of the act prohibiting the exportation of malt, ought to be abridged and revoked, and the said Act of Parliament, as to that part thereof, was amended, under proper regulations, with respect to the time of such exportation, and the allowance of bounties thereupon. A bill being founded on these resolutions, was discussed, and underwent several amendments; at length it was sent with a new title to the Lords, who passed it without further alteration, and then it obtained the royal sanction.

§ XI. While this affair was under the deliberation of the committee, the Commons unanimously issued an order for leave to bring in a bill to continue, for a limited time, the act of last session, permitting the importation of salted beef from Ireland into Great Britain, with an instruction to receive a clause extending this permission to all sorts of salted provisions: it was resolved, that the greater part of salted provisions, which the Dutch had refused to admit hams from Ireland to an entry. The bill likewise received another considerable alteration, importing, That, instead of the duty of one shilling and three pence, charged by the former act to the importer of these drier salted provisions from Ireland, which was found not adequate to the duty payable for such a quantity of salt as is requisite to be used in curing and salting thereof; and to prevent as well the expense to the revenue, as the detriment and loss which would result to the salted provision importer, from opening the casks in which the provision is generally deposited, with the pickle or brine proper for preserving the same, in order to ascertain the net weight of the said provisions, an act was passed, authorizing the greater part of salted provisions, which was enacted, That from and after the twentieth day of last December, and during the continuance of this act, a duty of three shillings and four pence should be paid upon importation of all provisions from the said kingdom containing thirty-two gallons; and one shilling and three pence for every hundred weight of salted beef, called dried beef, dried neat's-tongues, or dried hog-meat, and so in proportion for any greater or less quantity.

§ XII. No bill was more eagerly desired by the government than one to be made to the government by neutral nations, especially the Dutch, that their ships had been plundered, and their crews maltreated, by some of the English privateers, the legislature resolved to provide a security against the recurrence of such anomalies in future: and with this view the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in for amending and explaining an act of the twenty-ninth year of his late Majesty's reign, intituled, "An act for the encouragement of seamen, and more speedy and effectual manning of his Majesty's navy." While the committee was employed in perusing commissions and papers relating to private ships of war, that they might be fully acquainted with the nature of the subject, a considerable number of merchants and others, inhabiting the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, presented a petition to the House, alleging, that the inhabitants of those islands, which lay in the British channel, within sight of the French coast, long considered the protection of the said islands as a matter of importance to the states of the commonwealth, embarking their fortunes in equipping small privateers, which used to run in close with the French ships, and being disguised like fishing boats, had not only taken a considerable number of prizes, to the great annoyance of the enemy, but also obtained material intelligence of their designs, on many important occasions; that these services could not be performed by large vessels, which durst not approach, because the cost of outfitting vessels of that description without giving the alarm, which was communicated from place to place by appointed signals. Being informed that a bill was depending, in order to prohibit privateers of small burdens, they declared that they were ready to present to the House, petition to prohibit vessels of the same description, and not only deprive the kingdom of the before-mentioned advantages, but expose Great Britain to infinite prejudice from the small-armed vessels of France, which the enemy, in that case, would pour abroad over the whole channel, to the great annoyance of navigation and commerce. They propose, therefore, that all privateers as belonging to the islands of Guernsey and Jersey might be wholly excepted from the penalties contained in the bill, or that they (the petitioners) might be heard by their counsel, and be indulged with the same security as vessels belonging to the French privateers.

This representation being referred to the consideration of the committee, produced divers amendments to the bill, which at length obtained the royal assent, and contained these provisions: that in all causes of prize, except those of the present year, no commission should be granted to a privateer in Europe under the burden of one hundred tons, the force of ten carriage guns, being three-pounders or above, with forty men at the least, unless the lords of the admiralty, or persons authorised by them, should think fit to grant the same to any ship of inferior force or burden, the owners thereof giving such bail or security as should be prescribed; that the lords of the admiralty might at any time revoke, by an order in writing under their hands, any commission granted to a privateer; this revocation being subject to an appeal to his majesty in council, whose determination should be final: that, previous to the grant of any commission, the persons proposing to be honoured and give security, should severally make oath of their being respectively worth more money than the sum for which they were then to be bound, over and above the payment of all their just debts: that persons applying for such commission should make oath of being low and dependent, and give certificate thereof gratis, to be deemed a necessary clearance, without which the commander should not depart: that, if, after the first day of June, any captain of a privateer should agree to the trade of any neutral vessel, or the cargo, or any part thereof, after it should have been taken as a prize, and in pursuance of such agreement should actually discharge such prize, he should be deemed guilty of piracy; but that, with respect to contraband merchandise, all such persons should be declared freed of the commission in the instant vessel, and for the sum of five hundred dollars, and be entitled to a commission of the same nature and kind as formerly. And it was resolved, further, that a commission should be granted to any privateer: that owners of vessels, not being under fifty or above one hundred tons, whose commissions are declared void, should be indemnified for their loss by the public: that a court of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, should be held twice a-year in the Old-Bailey at London, or in such other place within England as the board of admiralty should appoint: that the judge of any court of admiralty, after an appeal interposed, as well as before, should, at the request of the captor or claimant, issue an order for appraising the capture, when the parties do not agree upon the value thereof; and that the same must be appraised by two of the commissioners, with the entrance of the owner of the vessel, and not by the master, who is the present of the owner of the neutral vessel, and then set her at liberty; and that no person should purloin or embezzle the said merchandise before condemnation: that no person should be appointed to the said office, either by the minister or court, or in any other way, without the personal consideration and recommendation of the said admiralty; and that the colonies and provinces should be made directly responsible, according to the nature of the act, to their respective legislatures, or to the proper governor and council of each, for the full value, and cause the capture to be delivered to the person giving such security: but, that should objection be made to the taking such security, the judge should, at the request of either party, order such merchant vessels, when entered, landed, and sold at public auction, and the produce to be esespated at the bank, or in some public securities; and in case of security being given, the judge should grant a pass in favour of the capture. Finally, the force of this act was limited to the duration of the then war with France only. This regulation very clearly demonstrated, that whatever violences might have been committed on the ships of the neutral nations, they were not by no means countenanced by the legislature, or the body of the people.

§ XIII. Every circumstance relating to the reformation of the marine must be an important object to a nation, whose wealth and interest depends upon navigation and commerce: but a consideration of equal weight was the establishment of the militia, which, notwithstanding the repeated endeavours of the parliament, was found still in a state of confusion, and incapable of being made, with regard to the present state of the nation, necessary. His majesty having, by the chancellor of the exchequer, recommended to the House the making suitable provision for defraying the militia during the current year, the accounts of the expense already incurred by this establishment were referred to the committee of supply, who, after having duly perused them, resolved, that ninety thousand pounds should be granted on account, towards defraying the charges of pay and clothing for the militia, from the last day of the last year to the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, and for repaying a sum advanced by the king for this service.

Leave was given to bring in one bill pursuant to the advice of the council, for the further regulation of the laws relating to the militia, remove certain difficulties, and prevent the inconveniences by which it might be attended. So intent were the majority on both sides upon this national measure, that they not only carried both bills to the throne, where they received the royal assent, but proposed an address to the king, desiring his majesty would give directions to his lieutenants of the several counties, ridings, and places in England, to use their utmost diligence and attention for carrying into execution several acts of parliament relating to the militia. By this time all the individuals that constituted the representatives of the people, except such as actually served in the army, were become well acquainted with the said laws, and the most zealous of them, very early in the session, espoused by those who foresaw that the establishment of a national militia was calculated to send the greater number of regular troops to fight the battles of Germany. Yet how zealous soever the legislature might be in promoting this institution, and notwithstanding the success with which many patriots exerted their endeavours to the utmost of their ability in disciplining the militia, it was found not only difficult, but almost impracticable, to execute the intention of the parliament in some particular counties, where the gentlemen and the officers were averse, or upon principle, from looking upon their commander with contempt. Even Middlesex itself, where the king resides, was one of the last counties in which the militia could be arrayed. In allusion to this backwardness, the preamble, or first clause, in one of the present acts imported, that certain counties, ridings, and places in England had made some progress in establishing the militia, without completing the same, and that, in certain other counties, little progress had been made therein; his majesty's lieutenants and the deputy lieutenants, and all others within such counties or districts, were therefore strictly required speedily and diligently to put these acts in execution. The truth is, some of these counties had an invidious compliance with the act in question; others gave or offered commissions to such people as throw a ridicule and contempt upon the whole establishment of the militia, and consequently hindered many gentlemen of worth, spirit, and capacity, from engaging in the service. The mutiny bill, and that for the regulation of the marine forces while on shore, passed through the usual forms, as annual measures, without any dispute or alteration.

§ XIV. A committee having been appointed to inquire in possession of the doors. They, therefore, proposed a method for raising 500,000 pounds upon this occasion, and presented to the House a bill for raising and collecting these taxes within the respective counties, particular rids, and the borough officers, that the same might be brought into the public revenue, for the pay of the militia, or any part thereof. The five shillings tax was not only a bood to the king, but a great encouragement to the officers of the militia, as, in case they could not possibly pay the five shilling, unless the people were disposed to pay it of their own free will, as they could not construe the word was what laws were expired, or near expiring, and to report their opinion to the House touching the revival or continuance of these laws, they agreed to several resolutions; in consequence whereof, the following was drawn up, and enacted into laws; namely, an act for regulating the lastage and ballastage of the river Thames; an act for continuing the law relating to the punishment of persons going, or remaining, on the禧 as a place for executing several laws near expiring; an act concerning the admeasurement of coals; an act for the relief of debtors, with respect to the imprisonment of their persons. This last was almost totally metamorphosed by alterations and amendments, and at the last reading was, in fact, the most remarkable of those, that more creditors than one shall any prisoner in execution, and desire to have him detained in prison, shall only respectively pay him each such sum weekly, not exceeding one shilling and sixpence per week, as the court, at the time of his being remanded, shall direct: that if any prisoner, described by the act, shall remain in prison three months after being committed, any creditor may compel him to give into court, upon oath, an account of his real and personal estate, to be disposed of for the benefit of his creditors, they consenting to his being discharged. Why the humanity of this law was confined to those who were in execution, while those not charged in execution with any debt exceeding one hundred pounds, cannot easily be conceived. A man who, through unavailing misfortunes, hath sunk from affluence to misery and indigence, is generally a greater object of compassion than he who already knows the distress of life, nor ever enjoyed credit sufficient to contract debts to any considerable amount; yet the latter is by this law entitled to his discharge, or at least to his maintenance in prison, while the former is left to starve in gaol, or under perpetual imprisonment, amidst all the horrors of misery, if he owes above one hundred pounds to a revengeful and unrelenting creditor. Wherefore, in a country, the people of which justly pique themselves upon charity and benevolence, and used to be so fond of forsworn men, reduced to a state of bankruptcy by unforeseen losses in trade, should be subjected to a punishment, which, of all others, must be the most grievous to a free-born Briton, namely, the entire loss of liberty; a punishment which the most fragrant crime can hardly deserve, in a nation that disclaims the torture; for, doubtless, perpetual imprisonment must be a torture infinitely more severe than death, because protrayed through a series of years spent in misery and despair, without one glimmering ray of hope, without the most distant prospect of deliverance! Wherefore the legislature should extend its humanity to those only who are the least susceptible of the benefit, because they must at least be able to undertake a fortune, and wherefore many valuable individuals should, for no guilt of their own, be not only ruined themselves, but lost to the community? are questions which we cannot resolve to the satisfaction of the reader. Of all imprison- ed debtors, those who were confined for large sums may be deemed the most wretched and forlorn, because they have generally fallen from a sphere of life where they had little acquaintance with necessity, and were altogether ignorant of the arts by which the severities of indigence are alleviated. On the other hand, those of the lower class of mankind, whose debts are small in proportion to the narrowness of their former credit, have not the same delicate feelings of calamity. They are incurably hardened, and accustomed to the labour of their hands, by which, even in a prison, they can earn a subsistence. Their reverse of fortune is not so great, nor the transaction so affecting. Their sensations are not delicate; nor are they, like their betters in misfortune, cut off from hope, which is the wretch’s last comfort. It is the man of sentiment and sensibility, who, in this situation, is overwhelmed with a complication of misery and ineffable distress. The mortification, the humiliation, the additional misery, his family reduced, himself deprived of liberty, reduced from opulence to extreme want, from the elegances of life to the most squalid and frightful scenes of poverty and affliction; dis- vested of comfort, destitute of hope, and doomed to linger out a wretched life in the midst of most violent passions, and uproar: these are reflections so replete with horror, as to render him, in all respects, the most miserable object on the face of the earth. He, alas! though possessed of talents that might have been cultivated, and even of considerable, though unprovided, society, while thus restrained in prison, and affected in mind, can exert no faculty, nor stoop to any concession, by which the horrors of his fate might be assuaged. He scorns the mock bounty of the legislature, and his les- sons, particularly in attending those who are the objects of contempt or abhorrence: he is incapable of executing any mechanic art, which might afford a happy, though a scanty, independence. Shrunken within his dismal cell, surrounded by haggard poverty, and her gaunt attendants, hollow-eyed famine, shivering cold, and wan disease, he wildly casts his eyes around: he sees the tender partner of his heart weeping in silent woe, be hears his helpless babes clamorous for sustenance; he feels himself the unfortunate cravings of human nature, which he cannot satisfy; and groans with all the compounded pangs of internal anguish, horror, and despair. These are not the fictions of idle fancy, but realities, which, in a refined community, every prison in England will afford but too many originals.

§ XV. Among other new measures, a successful at- tempt was made in favour of Ireland for the free importation of cattle from that kingdom for a limited time. This, however, was not carried through both Houses without considerable opposition, arising from the particular interests of certain counties and districts in several parts of Great Britain, from whence petitions against the bill were transmitted to the Commons. Divers artifices were also used within doors to saddle the bill with such clauses as might overthrow the scheme, and render it nugatory. It was therefore, in order to give it a fair trial, if it were aware of the design, conducted it in such a manner, as to frustrate all their views, and convey it safely to the throne, where it was enacted into a law. The like suc- cess attended another effort in behalf of our fellow-subjects in Ireland. The bill for the importation of Irish cattle was no sooner ordered to be brought in, than the House proceeded to take into consideration the duties then payable on the importation of tallow from the same kingdom, and several witnesses being examined, the House freely agreed, by a resolution, that these duties should cease and determine for a limited time. A bill being formed accordingly, passed through both Houses without opposition; though in the preceding session a bill to the same purpose had miscarried among the Peers; a miscarriage probably owing to their being unacquainted with the sentiments of his majesty, as some of the duties upon tallow constituted part of one of the branches appropriated for the civil revenue. This omission, however, was remedied by the case of the present bill, by the king’s message to the House of Commons, signifying his majesty’s consent, as far as his interest was concerned in the affair. By this act the free importation of Irish tallow was permitted for the term of five years.

§ XVI. In the month of February the Commons pre- sented an address to his majesty, requesting that he would give directions for laying before the House an account of what had been done, since the beginning of last year, towards securing the harbour of Milford, in pursuance of any directions from his majesty. These accounts being perused, and the king having, by the chancellor of the ex- chequer, exhorted them to make provision for fortifying the said harbour, a bill was brought in to explain, amend, and render more effectual, the act of the last session relating to this subject; and, passing through both Houses, received the royal sanction. Among the amendments made, engineers were added to the commissioners formerly appointed; and it was ordained that fortifications should be erected at Peter-church-point, Westhynyn-point, and Neyland-point, as being the most proper and best situated places for fortifying the interior parts of the harbour. It was also enacted, that the commissioners should appoint proper secretaries, clerks, assistants, and other officers, for conducting the business. They were also empowered to extend the application of the money should be laid before parliament, within twenty days of the opening of every session.

What next attracted the attention of the House was an affair of great importance and magnitude, relative to the administration of the cloudless, without any law relating to the same, the new system of taxation which equally affected the interest of the nation, and the character of the natives. In the latter end of February, a complaint was made to the House, that since the commencement of the last session, some officers and employed in the woolen manufactories and factories of Great Britain, but also a relief to the enemy, in consequence of which they were enabled to maintain the war against these kingdoms.

The next object that employed the attention of the Commons, was to explain and amend a law made in the last session for granting to his majesty several rates and duties upon officers and pensions. The directions specified in the former act, leaving this imposition having been found inconvenient to many respects, new regulations were now established, importing, that those duties should be paid into the hands of receivers and treasurers, and at the king for that purpose; that all sums deducted under the act should be paid into the receivers, and the accounts audited and passed by them, and not by the auditors of the imposts, or of the exchequer; that all disputes relating to the collection of this duty should be finally decided in a summary way, determined by the laws of the exchequer of England and Scotland respectively; that the commissioners of the land tax should fix and ascertain the sum total or amount of the perquisites of every office and employment, and to which the crown or any person or persons, or to whose service they might be attached, to be dedicated under the said act, independently of any former valuation or assessment of the same to the land tax; and that no assessment or valuation of any kind whatsoever, whereof should be found to exceed the sum of one hundred pounds per annum, at one shilling for every twenty shillings thereof; that the receivers should transmit to the commissioners the returns of all the duties; and that the duty of employment is to be assessed, an account of such offices and employments, that upon being certified of the truth of their amount they might be rated and assessed accordingly; that in all future assessments of the land tax the said offices and employments should not be valued at higher rates than those at which they were assessed towards the land tax of the thirty-first year of the present reign; that the word perquisite should be understood to mean such profits of offices or employments as arise from fees established by custom or authority, and payable either by the crown or the subject, in consideration of business done in the course of exercising such offices and employments; and that if a commissioner or paid officer or servant employed might not interfere in the execution of the said act, except in what might relate to his own employment. By the last four clauses several salaries were exempted from the payment of a duty, as the pay of the officers and servants of the public service, and the doors to this new law were the ascension of pecuniary influence to the crown, by the creation of a new office and officers, whereas this duty might have been collected and received by the commissioners of the land tax already appointed; and the inconsistency that appeared between the fifth and seventh clauses; in the former of these, the commissioners of the land tax were vested with the power of assessing the perquisites of every office within their respective districts, independent of any former valuation or assessment of the same to the land tax; and in the latter, they are restrained from assessing any office at a higher rate than that of the thirty-first year of the reign of George II.

§ XVIII. In the beginning of March petitions were offered to the House, in the nature of a protest against the occupation of Warrenshire, and Sheffield, in Yorkshire, specifying that the toy trade of those and many other towns consisted generally of articles in which gold and silver might be said to be manufactured, though in small proportion, insomuch as the sale of them depended upon some ornaments of gold and silver; and that by a clause passed in the last session of parliament, obliging every person who should sell goods or wares in which any gold or silver was manufactured, to take out an annual licence of forty shillings, they the petitioners were laid under great difficulties and disadvantages; that not only the first seller, but every person through whose hands the goods or wares passed to the consumer, was required to take out the said licence; they, therefore, requested that the House would take these hardships and inequalities into consideration, and indite them with reasonable relief. The committee to whom this affair was referred reported the resolution passed in the former session, for repealing the duty granted by an act of the sixth year of the reign of his late majesty, on silver plate, and for granting a duty on licences to be taken out by all persons dealing in gold and silver plate, was enacted into a law by the royal assent. By this law duties were laid on such small quantities of gold and silver plate were allowed to be sold without licence. Instead of the duty before payable upon licences, another was granted, to be taken out by certain dealers in gold and silver plate, pawnbrokers, and for better fortifying the town of Portsmouth and edift of Plymouth, in pursuance of an act passed in the last session. We have already specified the sum granted for this purpose, in consequence of the resolution of the House of Commons, the same being founded, soon passed into a law without opposition.

§ XIX. In the month of April a bill was brought in for the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of French luxuries; and for that purpose, the importation of cambrics, and the like, by the merchants of London and other parts of England, were prohibited, and the importation of cambrics and the like, into the ports of the said city and restrictions as prohibited East India merchandise; and, on importation, pay only the half subsidy; that all cambrics or French luxuries in the custody of any person should be deposited, by the first of August, in the king's warehouses, the bonds therewith be delivered up, and the drawback on exportation paid; yet the goods should not be delivered out again but for exportation: that cambrics and French lawns exposed to sale, or found in the possession of private persons, after the said day, should be forfeited and liable to be searched for and seized, in the same manner as other prohibited and uncustomed goods are; and the offender should forfeit two hundred pounds over and above all other penalties and forfeitures inflicted by any former act: that if any doubt should arise concerning the species or quality of the goods, or the place where they were manufactured, the proof should lie on the owner: finally, that the penalty of five pounds, inflicted by a former act, and payable to the informer, should be increased, that as many cambrics or French lawns, should still remain in force, and be recoverable, on conviction, by oath of one witness, before one justice of the peace. The last successful bill of which this session produced, was that relating to the augmentation of the salaries of the judges, in his majesty's superior courts of justice. A motion having been made for an instruction to the committee of supply, to consider of the said augmentation, the chancellor of the exchequer acquainted the House, that this augmentation was recommended to them by his majesty. Nevertheless, the motion was opposed, and a warm debate ensued. At length, however, being carried in the affirmative, the committee recommended to certain resolutions, on which a bill was founded. While it remained under discussion, a motion was made for an instruction to the committee, that they should have power to receive a clause or clauses for the augmentation of the judges' salaries, and that the same should be inserted within the provisions of the bill, from receiving any fee, gift, present, or entertainment from any city, town, borough, or corporation, or from any sheriff, gaoler, or other officer, upon their several respective circuits, and from taking any gratuity from any officer or agent of any of the courts of law. Another motion was made, for a clause restraining such judges, barons, and justices, as were comprehended within the provisions of the bill, from interfering, otherwise than by giving their own votes, in any election of member to serve in parliament; but both these proposals being put to the vote, were carried in the negative. These two motions being overruled by the majority, the bill underwent some amendments; and, having passed through both Houses in the ordinary course, was enacted into a law by the royal sanction. With respect to the import of this act, it is no other than the establishment of the several stamp duties, applied to the augmentation; and the appropriate sums thereof, produce in such a manner, that the crown cannot alter the application of the sums thus granted in parliament. But on this occasion, no attempt was made in favour of the introduction of a tax by which the mercantile and commerce, were not invaded by a late interpretation of, or rather by a deviation from, the act of settlement; in which it is expressly ordained, that the commissions of the judges should continue in force quodnamque et bene gestionis; that their salaries should be fixed, and none of them removable but by an address of both Houses of parliament. It was then, without all doubt, the intention of the legislature that every judge should enjoy his office during life, unless convicted by legal trial of some misbehaviour, or unless both Houses of parliament should concur in his removal: but the doctrine now adopted imports, that no commission can continue in force longer than the life of the king by whom it is granted, and that the commission of the judges must be renewed by a new king at his accession, who should have it in his power to employ either those whom he should find acting as judges at his accession, or confer their places upon others, as he should judge possible, and to renew or alter the commission of the judges, when he should think it necessary. The condition of new commissions should be quodnamque et bene gestionis. Thus the office of judge is rendered more precarious, and the influence of the crown receives a considerable reinforcement.

§ XXI. Of the bills that miscarried in the course of this session, we may number a second attempt to carry into execution the scheme which was offered last year for the more effectual manning the navy, preventing desertion, and encouraging those who second the service; a bill. A bill was accordingly brought in, couched in nearly the same terms that had been rejected in the last session; and it was supported by a considerable number of members, animated with a true spirit of patriotism: but to the trading part of the nation it appeared one of those plausible projects, which, though agreeable in speculation, can never be reduced into practice, without a concurrence of events at once unexpected and unforeseen. As a law, the trade of the kingdom, which is the nursery and support of seamen at all times, and that spirit of equipping private ships of war, which had been of distinguished service to the nation, was to be subjected to the influence of a law, that should cause a great stagnation in the former, and a total suspension of the latter; the bill, therefore, would be highly prejudicial to the marine of the kingdom, and altogether ineffective for the purposes intended. A great number of books and papers relating to trading ships and vessels, as well as to seamen, and other persons protected or pressed into the navy, and to expenses occasioned by pressing men into the navy, were examined in a committee of the whole House, and the bill was improved with those amendments: it was, after it was printed and engrossed, several clauses were added by way of rider; yet still the experiment seemed dangerous. The motion for its being passed was violently opposed, and when the bill was journed, and resubmitted against the bill appeared at length in such a striking light, that, when the question was put, the majority declared for the negative. The resolution was carried; and the according the twenty-sixth, the twenty-eighth, and thirtieth years of the present reign for the preservation of the public roads, being attended with some inconveniences in certain parts of the kingdom, petitions were brought in from the inhabitants of Wales, as well as from the freeholders of Herefordshire, the farmers of Middlesex, and others, enumerating the difficulties attending the use of broad wheels in one case, and the limitation of horses used in drawing carriages with narrow wheels in the other. The matter of these remonstrances was considered in a committee of the whole House, which resolved, that the weight to be carried by all waggons and carts, travelling on the turnpike roads, should be limited. On this resolution a bill was framed, for amending and reducing into one act of parliament the three acts before mentioned for the preservation of the public highways; but some objections being started, and a petition interposed by the commissary of a public road in Northumberland, alleging that the bill, if passed into a law, would render it impossible to bring fresh provisions from those counties to London, as the supply depended absolutely upon the quickness of the conveyance; it was decided that the operation of it was postponed to a longer day, and never resumed in the sequel: so that the attempt miscarried.

§ XXI. Of all the subjects which, in the course of this session, fell under the cognizance of parliament, there was none that more interested the humanity, or challenged the redress, of the legislature, than did the case of the poor insolvent debtors, who languished under all the miseries of indigence and imprisonment. In the month of February a petition was offered to the Commons in behalf of bankrupts, who represented, that having scrupulously conformed to the laws made concerning bankruptcy, by surrendering their all upon oath, for the benefit of their creditors, and by the execution of the judgments against them without any probability of relief; that by this cruel refusal, many bankrupts have been obliged to abscond, while others were immured in prison, and these unhappy sufferers groaned and languished, knowing that the bankrupts were excluded from the benefit of laws occasionally made for the relief of insolvent debtors; that the power vested in creditors of refusing certificates to their bankrupts was, as the petitioners conceived, founded upon a presumption that such power was often ill, or rashly exercised, upon amour propre cases; but the great increase in the number of bankrupts within two years past, and the small proportion of those who had been able to obtain their certificates, seemed to demonstrate that this power had been too often exercised upon unjust purposes, contrary to the intention of the legislature: that as the greater part of the petitioners, and their fellow-sufferers, must inextricably and speedily perish, with their distressed families, unless seasonably relieved by the indigent and distressed member of the House, from which they hoped immediate favour and relief. This petition was accompanied with a printed case, explaining the nature of the laws relating to bankrupts, and pointing out their defects in point of policy as well as humanity; but little regard was then paid to either remonstrance. Other petitions, however, being presented by insolvent debtors, imprisoned in different goals within the kingdom, were given to bring in a bill for their relief, and a committee was at once appointed to examine the laws relating to bankruptcy.

§ XXII. Among other petitionary remonstrances on this subject, the members were separately presented with the printed case of Captain George Walker, a prisoner in the goal of the king's bench, who had been declared a bankrupt, and complained, that he had been subjected to some flagrant acts of injustice and oppression. The case contained such extraordinary allegations, and the captain's character was so remarkably fair and interesting, that the committee, which were empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, resorted to inquire into the particulars of his misfortune. A motion was made and agreed to, that a committee should sit before the committee; and the speaker's warrant was issued accordingly. The prisoner was produced, and examined at several sittings; and some of the members expressed a lively concern for his case, when no good reason for imprisonment was given. The committee were very powerful, and left no stone unturned to frustrate the purpose of the inquiry, which was dropped of course at the end of the session. Thus the unfortunate Captain Walker, who had, in the late war, remarkably distinguished himself in private service and conduct, and who so energetically signaled himself against the enemies of his country, was sent back, without redress, to the gloomy mansions of a gaol, where he had already pinned for several years, useless to his country, and of no service to himself, for he must have been profitably employed in retrieving his own fortune, and exerting his talents for the general advantage of the nation. While this affair was in agitation, the bill for the relief of insolvent debtors was prepared, printed, and read a second time; but, when the motion was made for its being committed, a debate arose, and this was adjourned from time to time till the end of the session. In the meantime, the committee continued to deliberate upon the laws relating to bankruptcy; and in the beginning of June reported their resolution to the House, that, in their opinion, some amendment might be made to the laws concerning bankruptcy, to the advantage of creditors, and relief of insolvent debtors. A bill was introduced, and in the course of many British subjects, deprived of liberty, and destitute of the common necessaries of life.

§ XXIII. It would engage us in a long digressive discourse to name all the remonstrances made on these laws in England, so famed for liberty, has been exasperated into such severity against insolvent debtors: and why, among a people so distinguished for generosity and compassion, the gaols should be more filled with prisoners than they are in any other part of Christendom. Perhaps both these deviations from a general character are violent effects of a wary legislature made in behalf of trade, which cannot be too much cherished in a nation that principally depends on foreign commerce. The question is, whether this laudable aim may not be more effectually accomplished without subjecting individuals to oppression, arising from the enormity and revenue of one another. As the laws are modelled at present, it cannot be denied that the debtor, in some cases, lies, in a peculiar manner, at the mercy of his creditor. By the original and common law of England, no man could be imprisoned for debt. The plaintiff in an action might have the benefit of a decree or judgment against either the body or lands of the defendant; even with respect to his goods and chattels, which were subject to execution, he was obliged to leave him such articles as were necessary for agriculture. But, in process of time, this indulgence being found prejudicial to commerce, a law was enacted, in the reign of Edward the First, allowing execution on the person of the debtor, provided his goods and chattels were not sufficient to pay the debt which he had contracted. This law was still attended with a very obvious inconvenience. The debtor, who possessed an estate in lands, was taken away, with all his movables, effects, and live in concealment on the produce of his lands, while the sheriff connived at his retirement. To remove this evil, a second statute was enacted in the same reign, granting immediate execution against the body, lands, and goods, of all debtors. But, if the creditor desired to sell the personal effects of the debtor, these could not be sold for the benefit of his creditors till the expiration of three months, during which he himself could dispose of them for ready money, in order to discharge his encumbrances. If the creditor was not satisfied in this manner, he continued in possession of the debtor's lands, and detained the debtor himself in prison, where he was obliged to supply him with bread and water for his support, until the debt was discharged. Other severe regulations were made in the sequel, particularly in the reign of Edward the Third, which gave rise to the writ of capias ed satisfacendum. This, indeed, rendered the preceding laws, called statute-merchant, and statute-sable, altogether unnecessary. Though the liberty of the subject, and the security of the laudholder, were thus, in some measure, sacrificed to the advantage of commerce, an imprisoned debtor was not left entirely at the mercy of an inexorable creditor. If he made all the satisfaction in his power, and could show that his insolvency was owing to real misfortunes, the court of chancery interposed on his petition, and actually ordered him to be discharged from prison, when the creditor had no means of enforcing his judgments. This interposition, which seems naturally to belong to a court of equity, constituted with a view to mitigate the rigour of the common law, ceased, in all probability, after the restoration of the Second Monarchy. Thus the course of the proceedings was filled with debtors. Then the bankrupts charged themselves with the extension of a power, which perhaps a chancellor no longer thought himself safe in exercising; and in the year one thousand six hundred and seventy, passed an act for the further relief of poor debtors, granting a release to all prisoners for debt, without distinction or inquiry. By this general indulgence, which has even in a great measure continued in all succeeding acts of the same kind, the liberty of the parliament may be sometimes misapplied, inasmuch as insolvency is often criminal, arising from profligacy and extravagance, which deserve to be severely punished. Yet, even for this species of insolvent, temporal imprisonment, aggravated by the miseries of extreme indigence, and the danger of perishing through famine, may be deemed a punishment too severe. How cruel must it be to leave the most innocent bankrupt exposed to this punishment, from the revenue of which a tenth part of the revenue of the country is derived, by whose fraud, perhaps, the prisoner became a bankrupt, and by whose craft he is detained in gaol, lest, by his discharge from prison, he should be enabled to seek that redress which is essential to his case! The seventeenth century, who lived in such an age of misgovernment, cannot charge the inhabitants of the seventeenth century, who lived in such an age of misgovernment, cannot inquiry and trial of all such cases would not properly fall within the province of chancery, a tribunal instituted for the mitigation of grievous law

The House of Commons seems to have determined on another measure, which, however, does not admit of explanation. An order was made in the month of February, that leave should be given to bring in a bill to be read, and read effectual so much of an act, passed in the thirteenth year of George II. against the excessive increase of horse-races, and deceptual asming, as reduced to that increase. The bill was accordingly presented, referred to a committee of the whole House; but the order was delayed from time to time to the end of the session. Some progress was likewise made in another affair of greater consequence to the country. A committee was appointed in the month of March, to take into consideration the state of the poor of England, as well as the laws enacted for their maintenance. The clerks of the peace belonging in all the counties, cities, and towns in England and Wales, were ordered to transmit, for the perusal of the House, an account of the annual expense of passing vagrants through their respective divisions and districts for four years; and the committee began to deliberate on this important subject. In the latter end of the session, the House was again acquainted with their resolutions, importing, that the present method of relieving the poor in the respective parishes, where no workhouses have been provided for their reception and employment, are, in general, very barren of advantage, often insubstantial, and tend to make miserable themselves, and useless to the community: that the present methods of giving money out of the parochial rates to persons capable of labour, in order to prevent them from claiming an establishme for themselves and their families, is contrary to the spirit and intention of the laws for the relief of the poor, is a dangerous power in the hands of parochial officers, a misapplication of the public money, and a great encouragement to worse intemperance: that the employment of the poor, under proper direction and management, in such works and manufactories as are suited to their respective capacities, would be of great utility to the public; that settling the poor in workhouses, to be provided in the several counties and ridings in England and Wales, under the direction and management of governors and trustees to be appointed for that purpose, would be the most effectual method of relieving such poor persons as by age, infirmities, or diseases, are rendered incapable of supporting themselves by their labour; of employing the able and industrious, reforming the idle and profligate, and of reducing the whole community of the poor in religion and industry; that the public workhouses would be better regulated and maintained, and managed with more advantage to the public, by guardians, governors, or trustees, to be specially appointed, or chosen for that purpose, and incorporated with such powers, and under such restrictions, as the legislature should deem proper, than by the annual parochial officers; that erecting workhouses upon waste lands, and appropriating a certain quantity of such lands to be cultivated, in order to produce provision for the poor in the said houses, would not only be the means of instructing and employing many of the said poor in agriculture, but lessen the expense of the public; that controversies and law-suits concerning the settlements of poor persons occasioned a vast, and, in general, a useless expense to the public, amounting to many thousands pounds per annum; and that often more money is expended in ascertaining such settlements of the poor persons occasioned than would be sufficient to maintain the poor, that should workhouses be established for the general reception of the poor, in the respective counties and ridings of England, the laws relating to the settlements of the poor, and the passing of poor laws, and under such restrictions, as the legislature should deem proper, than by the annual parochial officers to grant certificates to the poor would, in all probability, prevent the hardships they now suffer, in being deprived of their customary occupations, by which they can do most usefully to themselves and the public. From these sensible resolutions, the reader may conceive some idea of the misconduct that attends the management of the poor in England, as well as of the grievous burdens entailed upon the revenues of the nation by the present laws. The House of Commons was at first inclined to the present committee of the House, but they were not brought in with a very high opinion of the conduct of the committee. The committee's resolve being read at the table, an order was made that they should be taken into consideration on a certain day, when the order was again put off, and in the interim the parliament was prorogued. While the committee deliberated upon this affair, leave was given to prepare a bill for preventing tenants, under a certain yearly rent, from gaining settlements in rent, to be prepared on the same principles, as were the present bill of the land-tax assessment, and paying for the landlord the money so charged. This order was afterwards discharged; and another bill brought in to prevent any person from gaining a settlement by being rated by virtue of an act of parliament for granting an aid to his majesty by a land tax, and paying the same. The bill was accordingly presented, read, committed, and passed the lower House; but among the Lords it miscarried. It can never be expected that the poor will be managed with economy and integrity, while the execution of the laws relating to their maintenance is left in the hands of low traders, who derive private advantage from supplying them with necessaries, and who are at the same time the executioners of one another with the most scandalous misappiances. This is an evil which will never be remedied, until persons of independent fortune, and of unblemished integrity, are authorised by a spirit of true patriotism, such as that which gives force to the power of the people, to intercede for the poor, and to take the poor into their own management and protection. Instead of multiplying laws with respect to the settlement and management of the poor, which serve only to puzzle and perplex the parish and peace officers, it would become the sagacity of the legislature to take some effectual precautions to prevent the increase of paupers and vagrants, which is become an intolerable nuisance to the commonwealth, and which, instead of the wealth, peace, and prosperity, which it is possible to do more contribute than a reformation of the police, that would abolish those infamous places of entertainment, which swarm in every corner of metropolis, seducing people of all ranks to extravagance, prodigality, and ruin; and would restrict, within due bounds, the number of public houses, which are augmented to an enormous degree, affording so many asylums for riot and debauchery, and corrupting the morals of the common people to such a pitch of licentious indolency, that it will be a reproach to every civilized nation. Let it not be affirmed, to the disgrace of Great Britain, that such receptacles of vice and iniquity subsist under the constitution of the government, according to which: that the poor are, in proportion to those shallow politicians, who imagine that the revenue is increased in proportion to the quality of strong liquors consumed in such infamous recesses of intemperance. Were this in reality the case, that administration would deserve the contempt of every decent legislature, as a sacrifice, to such a base consideration, the health, the lives, and the morals of their fellow-creatures: but nothing can be more fallacious than the supposition that the revenue of any government can be increased by the augmented intemperance of the people: for intemperance is the bane of industry, as well as of population; and what the government gains in the articles of the duty on malt, and the excise upon liquors, will always be more than consumed by the loss on other articles, arising from the diminution of hands, and the neglect of labour.

§ XXV. Exclusive of the bills that were actually presented to the house, and those that were discussed in the preceding session, the Commons deliberated on other important subjects, which, however, were not finally discussed. In the beginning of the session, a committee being appointed to resume the inquiry touching the regulation of weights and measures, which was laid before them; and the measures agreed on during the preceding session, the box which contained a Troy pound weight, locked up by order of the House, was again produced by the clerk, in whose custody it had been deposited. After some time, during which the committee agreed to fourteen resolutions.1 In the means-

1 As the contents of the reader may be interested in these resolutions, we shall here insert them for his satisfaction. The committee resolved, time it was ordered, that all the weights, referred to in the report, should be delivered to the clerk of the House to be locked up and brought forth occasionally.

It is necessary to mention, among other articles of domestic economy, bestowed some attention on the hospital for foundlings, which was now, more than ever, become a matter of national consideration. The accounts relating to this charity having been demanded, and sub- mitted to the committee of supply, they had the satisfaction of finding it, upon going over the king's recommendation, referred to the committee of supply, where they produced the resolution which we have already specified among the other grants of the year. The resolution, which related to the said hospital, was deliberate on the state of the hospital, and examine its accounts. On the third day of May their resolutions were reported to the following effect: That the appointment, by the governors and guardians of the said hospital, to the several counties, ridings, or divisions in this kingdom, for the first reception of exposed and deserted young children, would be attended, with many evil consequences; and that the conveying of children from the country to the said hospital is attended with many evils, and ought to be prevented. A bill was ordered to be brought in, founded upon this last resolution, but never presented; therefore the inquiry produced no effect. Notwithstanding this, however, it is to be observed, that the bills of mortality, respecting new-born children, are decreased, nor the shocking crime of infanticide so frequent as it used to be. Nor may, therefore, not improperly stiled a heavy additional tax for the propagation of bastardy, and the encouragement of sleness, among the common people; besides the tendency it has to depress the birth-rate of the nation, and dissolve those family ties of blood, by which the chariters are connected.

§ XXVII. In the month of March, leave was given to bring in a bill for a more effectual preventing of the melting down and exporting of the coin of the kingdom, and the persons were nominated to prepare it; but the bill never appeared, and no further inquiry was made about the matter. Perhaps it was supposed that such a measure might be thought an encroachment on the prerogative of the crown, which hath always exercised the power of fixing the standard, and regulating the currency of the coin. Perhaps such a step was deferred on account of the war, during which a great quantity of bullion, if gold and silver was necessarily exported to the continent, for the support of the allies and armies in the pay of Great Britain. The legislature, however, would do well to consider the matter in his recollection, that when a greater quantity of bullion is exported, in waste, than can be replaced by commerce, the nation must be hastening to a state of insolvency. Over and above these proceedings in this session of parliament, it may not be unnece- ssary to allude to the debate on the subject of the king to the House of Commons. That relating to the vote of credit we have already specified in our account of the supply. On the twenty-sixth day of April, the chancellor of the exchequer presented to the House those two messages signed by his majesty to the representatives of the people in North America, and the other in behalf of the East India company: the former recommending to their consider- ation the zeal and vigour with which his faithful subjects in America have been engaged in the work of distinguishing their just rights and possessions; desiring he might be en- abled to give them a proper compensation for the expenses incurred by the respective provinces in levying, clothing, and paying the troops raised in that country, according as the active vigour and strenuous efforts of the several colo- nies should appear to merit: in the latter, he desired the House would empower him to assist the East India company in defraying the expenses of the military force in the following manner: that message relating to a projected invasion by the enemies of Great Britain we shall particularize in its proper place, when we come to record the circumstances and misgovernments of that design. In the meantime, it was observed, that the thanks of the House of Commons were voted and given to Admiral Boscawen and Major-General Amherst, for the services they had done their king and country. And some compli- ment was paid to Admiral Osborne, for the success of his cruise in the Mediterranean.

§ XXVIII. The session was closed on the second day of June with a speech to both Houses, from the commis- sioners appointed by the crown to regulate the coin of the kingdom, and to introduce a new standard of measure. That branch of the parliament was given to understand, that the king approved of their conduct, and returned them his thanks for their condensation; that he hoped he had conceived of their surrounding the difficulties which lay in the way were founded on the wisdom, zeal, and affection of so good a parliament, and that his expectations were fully answered; that they had considered the war in all its parts, and notwithstanding its long continuance, through the obstruction of the enemy, had made such provision for the many different operations, as ought to con- vince the adversaries of Great Britain, that it would be for their interest, as well as for their honour, to impose, to embrace equitable and honourable terms of ac- commodation, and now in the custody of the clerk of the House, and a model of the pattern of the same, together with a model of the pattern of the said coin, should be transmitted to the secretary of state for commerce, together with models or patterns of the parts of the said coin, now preserved in the House, and also of the multiples of the said coin, mentioned in this report, when the bills are addressed, should be kept in the said office, in order to the said persons to be addressed to the proper weighing and measuring weights and measures, under the seal of the chief banker of his ex- chestor for the time being, to be opened only by order of the said chief banker, in his presence, or the presence of one of the benches of the exchequer, on the application of the said person, for the purpose of surveying and adjusting, as is usual. Such models or patterns used at the said office, for strong measures of length and weight, delivered out in the said office, for their conformity. The next subject was, that model or pattern of the said standard yard and standard pound, mentioned last session, that model or pattern of the said coin, to be kept in the said office, to be substituted for any measure of length or weight, delivered out in the said office, and to be kept for comparison with any such measure or pattern of the said coin, as may be circulated in the country. It was resolved, that the model or pattern of the said standard yard and standard pound, should be lodged in the said office for the purpose of such measure of length or weight, as being parts, multiplied by the mean proportions of the said standards, should hereafter be required by any of the said persons, subject to the same regulations which the said office, should be marked in some convenient part thereof with the same marks as above mentioned. This resolution was proposed on the 2nd of May, and was agreed to. The means and weights used at the said office, and to discover any errors that might be committed; and that the said office be directed, on a certain day, and at the beginning of each quarter, to take a return of the current day, and all the measures of length and weight within a certain distance of London, should be corrected and reassembled, as occasion should require, at the said office. That, in order to secure the national weights and measures against all possibility of errors and mistakes, or losses that might be committed on such occasions, be lodged in the said office, and to discover any errors that might be committed; and that the said office be directed to take a general return of the current day, and all the measures of length and weight within a certain distance of London, should be corrected and reassembled, as occasion should require, at the said office.

commodation. They were told that, by their assistance, the combined army in Germany had been completed; provided as well as many forces, were employed in America, in order to maintain the British rights and possessions, and annoy the enemy in the most sensible manner in that country: that, as France kept up the coasts and harbours in her different ports, he had taken care to put his fleet at home in the best condition, both of strength and situation, to guard against and repel any attempts that might be meditated against his kingdoms: that all his measures had been directed to the most sensible ends. In the present state of the army, he was at liberty to preserve the essential interests of his faithful subjects; to support the cause of the Protestant religion, and public liberty: he, therefore, trusted that the uprightness of his intentions would draw down the blessing of Heaven upon his endeavours. He expressed his hope, that the precautions they had taken to prevent and correct the excesses of the privateers would produce the desired effect: a consideration which the king had much at heart; for, though sensible of the utility of that service, when under proper regulations, he was determined to do his utmost to prevent any injuries or hardships which might be sustained by the subjects of neutral powers, so far might be practicable and consistent with his majesty's just right to hound the trade of his enemies from being conclusively and fraudulently covered. He not only thanked the Commons, but applauded the firmness and vigour with which they had acted, and the prudence in placing the nation in a position of the strongest interests in this momentous question, the making ample provision for carrying on the war was the most probable means to bring it to an honourable and happy conclusion. He assured them that no attention should be wanting on his part, for the faithful application of what had been granted. They were informed he had nothing further to desire, but that they would carry down the same good dispositions, and propagate them in their several counties, which they had shown in their proceedings during the session. These declarations being pronounced, the parliament was prorogued.

§ XXIX. The people of England, provoked on one hand by the intrigues, the hostilities, and menaces of France, and animadverted upon the other by the pride of triumph and success, which never fails to reconcile them to difficulties, however great, and expense, however enormous, at this period breathed nothing but war, and discussed about nothing but new plans of conquest. We have seen how liberally the parliament bestowed the nation's money; and the acquiescence of the subjects in general under the additional taxes which had been imposed, and the remarkable eagerness with which they embarked in the subscription planned by the legislature; in the vigorous assistance they contributed towards manning the navy, recruiting the army, and levying additional forces; and the way in which the public interest had begun to engage the hearts of the Englishmen and ranks of the people. This was a spirit which the ministry carefully cherished and cultivated for the support of the war, which, it must be owned, was prosecuted with an ardour and efficacy peculiar to the present administration. True it is, the German war had been for some time adopted as an object of importance by the British councils, and a resolution was taken to maintain it without flinching; at the same time, it must be allowed, that this consideration had not hitherto weakened the attention of the ministry to the operations in America, where alone the war may be said to have been carried on and prosecuted on British principles, so as to distress the enemy in their most tender part, and at the same time acquire the most substantial advantages to the subjects of Britain. For these two purposes, every preparation was made that sagacity could suggest, or vigour execute. The navy was repaired and augmented, in order to man the different squadrons, to prevent the expedient of pressing, that disgrace to a British administration, was practised both by land and water with extraordinary vigour and vivacity. A proclamation was issued, offering a considerable bounty for every seaman and every kindman that should, by a certain day, enter voluntarily into the several bodies of naval forces, and to this class of people, the king promised his pardon to all seamen who had deserted from their respective ships to which they belonged, provided they should return to them of their own accord, and receive the same terms as if they had deserted with the intention of deserting. It must be declared, that those who should neglect this opportunity, at a time when their country so much required their services, would, upon being apprehended, incur the penalty of a court-martial, and if convicted of any of the acts of the royal mercy. All justices of the peace, mayors, and magistrates of corporations throughout Great Britain, were commanded to make particular search for stragglers fit for the service, and to send all that should be found to the nearest sea-port, that they might be sent on board by the sea-officer there commanding. Other methods, more gentle and effectual, were taken to levy and recruit the land forces. New regiments were raised, on his majesty's promise that every man should be entitled to his discharge at the end of three years, and the premiums for enlisting were increased. Over and above these indulgences, considerable bounties were offered and given by cities, towns, corporations, and even by individuals, so universally were the people possessed with a spirit of chivalry and adventure. The example was set by the metropolis, where the common-council resolved, that voluntary subscriptions should be received in the chamber of London, as a matter of course, and that those who should choose to make them as persons as should engage in his majesty's service. The city subscribed a considerable sum for that purpose; and a committee of aldermen and commoners was appointed to attend at Guildhall, to receive and apply the subscriptions. As a further encouragement to volunteers, they moreover resolved, that every person so entering should be entitled to the freedom of the city, at the expiration of three years, or sooner, if desirous of quitting the militia, that, before the close of the year, the greater part of these truly constitutional battalions rivalled the regular troops in the perfection of their exercise, and seemed to be in a condition to be useful, and to be brought to a conclusion. These resolutions being communicated to the king, he was pleased to signify his approbation, and return his thanks to the city, in a letter from the secretary of state to the lord mayor. Large sums were immediately subscribed by different companies, and some private persons; and, in imitation of the capital, bounties were offered by many different communities in every quarter of the united kingdom. At the same time, such care and diligence were used in the discipline of the militia, that, before the close of the year, the greater part of these truly constitutional battalions rivalled the regular troops in the perfection of their exercise, and seemed to be in a condition to be useful, and to be brought to a conclusion.

§ XXX. Before we proceed to record the transactions of the campaign that succeeded these preparations, we shall take notice of some domestic events, which, though not very important in themselves, may nevertheless claim a place in the history of this period. As the reign of the year, the court of London was overwhelmed with affliction at the death of the Princess Dowager of Orange and Nassau, governor of the United Provinces in the minority of her son, the present statholder. She was the eldest daughter of his Britannic majesty, possessed of many personal accomplishments and exemplary virtues; pious, moderate, sensible, and circumspect. She had exercised authority with equal respect and authority to the house of Orange, and died with great fortitude and resignation. In her will she appointed the king her father, and the Prince Dowager of Orange, her mother-in-law, honorary tutors, and Prince Louis of Brunswick acting tutor, to her children. In the morning after her decease, the States-general and the states of Holland were extraordinarily assembled, and having received notice of this event, proceeded to confirm the regulations which had been adopted for the minority of the stadtholder. Prince Louis of Brunswick was invited to assist in the assembly of Holland, where he took the oaths, as representing the captain-general of the union. Then he communicated to the assembly the act by which the princess had appointed him guardian of her children. He was afterwards invited to the assembly of the States-general, who agreed to the resolution of Holland with respect to his guardianship; and in the evening the different colleges of the government sent formal deputations to the young stadholder, and the Princess Caroline his sister, in whose name the princess was represented, and answered by their guardian and representative. A formal intimation of the death of the princess was communicated to the king her father, in a pathetic letter, by the States-general; who conveyed the news, and with the blood of her daughter wept. Though he felt the loss as well as they had sustained by this melancholy event, and assured him they would employ all their care and attention in securing and defending the rights and interest of the young stadholder and the princess his sister, whom they considered as the children of the republic. The royal family of England suffered another disaster in the course of this year, by the decease of the Princess Elizabeth Caroline, second daughter of his late royal highness Frederick Prince of Wales, a lady of the most amiable character, who died at Kew in the month of September, before she had attained the eighteenth year of her age.

§ XXI. Certain privates continuing their excesses at a particular spot in the character of the young person in authority, the government resolved to vindicate the honour of the nation, by making examples of those pirates, who, as fast as they could be detected and secured, were brought to trial, and punished by death. When these steps were taken to rescue the nation from the reproach of violence and robbery, which her neighbours had urged with such eagerness, equal spirit was exerted in convincing neutral powers that they should not, with unnecessary partiality, concern themselves in the enemies of Great Britain. A great number of causes were tried relating to disputed captures, and many Dutch vessels with their cargoes were condemned, after a fair hearing, among seven court of admiralty and great people, and the repeated remonstrances of the States-general.

§ XXXI. The reputation of the English was not so much affected by the irregularities of her privates, armed for rapine, as by the neglect of her police, and an ingredient of savage ferocity mingled in the national character; an ingredient that appeared but too conspicuous in the particulars of several shocking murders brought to light about this period.—One Halsey, who commanded a merchant ship which arrived from Jamaica to England, having conceived some personal dislike to a poor sailor, insulted him with such abuse, exposed him to such hardships, and punished him with such wantonness of barbarity as to deprive him of all chance of escape. His inhuman tyrant, envying him that death which would have rescued a miserable object from his brutality, plunged into the sea after him, and brought him on board, declaring he should not escape so while there were any torments left to inflict. Accordingly he executed his tyranny upon him with redoubled rigour, until the poor creature expired, in consequence of the inhuman treatment he had sustained. This savage ruffian was likewise indicted for the murder of another manner, but being convicted on the first trial, the second was found unnecessary, and the criminal suffered death according to the law, which is perhaps too mild to malefactors convicted of such aggravated cruelty. Another case occurred in the honourable city of England, near Birmincham, upon a sheriff's officer, by the sons of one Darby, whose effects the halfling had seized, on a distress for rent. The two young assassins, encouraged by the father, attacked the unhappy wretch with clubs, and mangled him in a terrible manner, so that he hardly retained any signs of life. Not contented with this cruel execution, they stripped him naked, and dragging him out of the house, conveyed him to a busy street, where the flesh was cut from his bones. In this miserable condition he was found weltering in his blood, and conveyed to a neighbouring house, where he immediately expired. The three barbarians were apprehended, after having made a desperate resistance. Both were tried, convicted, and executed; the sons were hung in chains, and the body of the father dissected.—The widow of a timber-merchant at Rotherhithe being cruelly murdered in her own house: Mary Edmonson, a young woman, her niece, ran out into the street with her arms cut across, and gave the alarm, declaring her sister and niece had been murdered, who forced their way into the house, and that the (the niece) had received those wounds, in attempting to defend her relation. According to the circumstances that appeared, this unnatural wretch had cut the throat of her aunt, and in consequence of her being a cook, they went from the washhouse to the parlour; that she had stolen a watch and some silver spoons, and concealed them together with the knife and her own apron, which was soaked with the blood of her parent. After having acted this horrid tragedy, the bare recital of which the humane reader will not persevere without horror, she put on another apron, and woaded her own flesh, the better to conceal her guilt. Notwithstanding these precautions she was suspected, and committed to prison. Being brought to trial she was convicted and condemned upon circumstantial evidence, and finally executed on Kennington-Common, though she deified the fact to the last moment of her life. At the place of execution she behaved with great composure, and after having spent some minutes in devotion, protested she was innocent of the crime laid to her charge. What seemed to corroborate this protestation, was the conduct and character of her, and her man, a very small man, who always stood above the vulgar, and maintained a reputation without reproach in the country, where she was actually betrothed to a clergyman. On the other hand, the circum- stances and manner of her condemnation excited all the certainty, though nothing weaker than proof positive ought to determine a jury in capital cases to give a verdict against the person accused. After all, this is one of those problematical events, which elude the force of all evidence, to an effect which the whole world must see, and which gives the most scandalous reason of the multitude of the enemies of Great Britain. A great number of causes were tried relating to disputed captures, and many Dutch vessels with their cargoes were condemned, after a fair hearing, among seven court of admiralty and great people, and the repeated remonstrances of the States-general. stance that favoured the execution of the horrid plan they had concerted. When one of them retired to rest with his fellows of the watch, consisting of the mate and two seamen, he waited till they were fast asleep, and then butchered them all with a knife. Having so far succeeded without discovery, he returned to the deck, and communicated the exploit to his associate; then they suddenly attacked the master, and dealt him a blow with a hatchet, which they likewise used in murdering the man that stood at the helm: a third was likewise despatched, and an Englishman remained alive but the master's son, a boy who lamented his father's death with moist tears and earnest supplications. At the expiration of the time a ship was likewise sacrificed, because the assassins were disturbed by his clamour. This barbarous scene was acted within sixty leagues of the rock of Lisbon; but the vessel was taken within the Cape of Good Hope, and Finisterre, by the captain of the French privateer, called La Favourite, who seeing the deck stained with blood, and finding all the papers of the ship destroyed, began to suspect that the master and crew had been murdered. He accordingly taxed them with the murder, and they confessed the particulars. The privateer touched at Vigo, where the captain imparted this detail to the English consul; but the privateer was burnt by the French, and the body of the Englishman was conveyed to Knaresborough forest and hung in chains, near the place where the murder was perpetrated. These are some of the most remarkable that appeared amongst many other instances of the great extent of this disagreeable and surprising, even in a nation renowned for compassion and placability. But this will generally be the case among people whose passions, naturally impetuous, are ill restrained by laws and the society; which the licentious do not fear, and the wicked hope to evade.

§ XXXIV. The Prince of Wales having, in the beginning of June, entered the two-and-twentieth year of his age, the anniversary of his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings at court, and the king received compliments of congratulation on the majority of a prince, who seemed to desire the hope, and consented to the degree of liberty, who, confiding in the Divine Providence, and his majesty's experienced wisdom and vigorous councils, were resolved to exert their utmost efforts towards enabling their subject to repent the insults, and defeat the attempts made by the ancient enemies of his crown and people. To gratulate the same kind were offered by other cities, towns, corporations, and communities, who vied with each other in professions of attachment; and, indeed, there was not the least indication perceivable at this juncture in any part of the island.

§ XXXV. So little were the citizens of London distressed by the expense, or remodeled by the operations, of the war, that they found leisure to plan, and funds to execute, magnificent works of art, for the ornament of the metropolis, and the convenience of commerce. They had obtained an act of parliament, empowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Blackfriars to the opposite shore, about midway between those of London and Westminster. Commissioners were appointed to put this act in execution; and, at a court of common-council, it was resolved that the price supposed for building the forty-four thousand pounds should be forthwith raised, within the space of eight years, by instalments, not exceeding forty thousand pounds in one year, to be paid into the chamber of London; that the persons advancing the money should have the right of choosing their offices, and a place called the Stone Cave, where they would find it with the head turned to a certain corner. He was immediately apprehended, examined, admitted as evidence for the crown, and discovered the particulars of the murder. The skeleton of Clarke being found exactly in the place and manner he had described, Eugene Aram, who now acted as usher to a grammar-school in the county of Norfolk, was secured, and brought to trial at the York assizes. There, his own corroborating the testimony of Houseman, he was found guilty, and received sentence of death; notwithstanding a very artful and learned defence, in which he proved, from argument and example, the danger of convicting a man upon circumstantial evidence. Finding all his remonstrances ineffectual, he recommended himself in pathetic terms to the king's mercy: and if ever murder was entitled to indulgence, perhaps it might be said that he was not entitled to it. His genius, in itself prodigious, might have exerted itself in works of general utility. He had, in spite of all the disadvantages attending low birth and station, acquired a part of his own capacity and inclination, made considerable progress in mathematics, and the languages; acquired all the languages, ancient and modern, and executed part of a Celtic dictionary, which, had he lived to finish it, might have thrown some essential light upon the origin and obscurities of the European history. Condensed, at last, that he had nothing to hope from the clemency of the government, he wrote a short poem in defence of suicide; and, on the day fixed for his execution, opened the veins of his left arm with a razor, which he had concealed for that purpose. Though he was much weakened by the effusion of blood, before this attempt was discovered, yet, as the instrument had missed the artery, he did not expire immediately, but sat for a short time, and underwent the sentence of the law. His body was consigned to Knaresborough forest and hung in chains, near the place where the murder was perpetrated. These are some of the most remarkable that appeared amongst many other instances of the great extent of this disagreeable and surprising, even in a nation renowned for compassion and placability. But this will generally be the case among people whose passions, naturally impetuous, are ill restrained by laws and the society; which the licentious do not fear, and the wicked hope to evade.

§ XXXVI. The spirit that now animated the citizens of London was such as small difficulties did not retard, and seven considerable costs could not discourage. In the month of November the city was exposed to a dangerous conflagration, kindled in the night by accident in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange, which, burning with great fury, advanced towards the Bank, and the buildings and engines employed under the personal direction of the magistracy, consumed a great number of houses, and damaged many more. The whole quarter of the town was filled with consternation; some individuals were beggared: one or two houses were consumed, which were preserved in the ruins of the houses that sunk under the disaster.

jecture, produced at this period some flowers of improvement, in different arts and sciences, that seemed to promise fruit of public utility. Several persons invented methods for discovering the longitude at sea, that great desideratum in navigation, for the ascertainment of which so many nations have offered a public recompence, and in the investigation of which so many mathematical heads have been disordered. Some of those who now appeared candidates for this prize were: John Robison, from Dunkirk, by a surprising augmentation of commerce, enjoyed all the security of peace, and all the pleasures of taste and affluence. The university of Oxford having conferred the order of Doctor of Civil Law upon the ship Master of Arran, upon another noblemen of equal honour and integrity, namely, the Earl of Westmoreland, he made a public entrance into that celebrated seat of learning with great magnificence, and was installed amidst the encircling, which were celebrated with such classical elegance of pomp, as might have rivalled the chief Roman festival of the Augustan age. The chancellor elect was attended by a splendid train of the nobility and persons of distinction. The orations and public speeches, breathed the spirit of old Rome; and the ceremony was closed by Dr. King, that venerable sage of St. Mary Hall, who pronounced an oration in praise of the new chancellor with all the flow of Tullian, animated by the fire of Demosthenes.

§ XXXVIII. The people of England, happy in their situation, felt none of the storms of war and desolation which swept over the rest of Europe. From Dunkirk, France succeeded by a surprising augmentation of commerce, enjoyed all the security of peace, and all the pleasures of taste and affluence. The university of Oxford having conferred the order of Doctor of Civil Law upon the ship Master of Arran, upon another noblemen of equal honour and integrity, namely, the Earl of Westmoreland, he made a public entrance into that celebrated seat of learning with great magnificence, and was installed amidst the encircling, which were celebrated with such classical elegance of pomp, as might have rivalled the chief Roman festival of the Augustan age. The chancellor elect was attended by a splendid train of the nobility and persons of distinction. The orations and public speeches, breathed the spirit of old Rome; and the ceremony was closed by Dr. King, that venerable sage of St. Mary Hall, who pronounced an oration in praise of the new chancellor with all the flow of Tullian, animated by the fire of Demosthenes.

§ XXXIX. We shall conclude the remarkable incidents of this year, that are detached from the prosecution of the war, with the detail of an event equally surprising and desirable to the good and useful, but both of which were the result of the war. A small fleet of Canaries to New York, met with such an unfavourable weather, that she was detained one hundred and sixty-five days in the passage, and the provisions of the ship was altogether expended before the first fifty days were elapsed. The whole crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all their shoes on board; at length, being reduced to the utmost extremity, they agreed to cast lots for their lives, that the body of him upon whom the lot should fall, might serve for some time to support the survivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Galagia, a Spanish gentleman and pilot. Him they shot with a musket; and having cut of his head, threw it overboard; but the entrails, and the rest of the carcass, they greatly devoured. This horrid banquet having as it were fleshed the famished crew, they began to talk of another sacrifice, from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonstrances of three priests, who prevailed upon them to; but, excepting a miserable allowance to each per diem, cut from a pair of leather breeches found in the cabin. Upon this calamitous pittance, reinforced with the griss which grew plentifully upon the shore, they spent their time in a constant hunt to subsist for twenty days, at the expiration of which they were relieved

In the spring of the year the liberal arts sustained a lamentable loss in the death of George Frederic Handel, the most celebrated master in music with his last work at the beginning of the year, he left for Italy, and afterwards settled in England, where he met with the most signal favours. In consequence of his death, the three harps were not played on for his stumpeous genius in the noblest parts of musical composition.

One would be apt to imagine, that there was something in the constitution of these persons, who lived in the age of Charles the Second, in the compass of a few months, the following persons, and not only of their own nation, but of the countries which they visited, who were remarkable for their longevity, died in the kingdom of Scotland: William Barrow, who had been above seventy years a servant in the family of Bruce, died at the age of one hundred. He was born in Strathmore, in the parish of one hundred and eighteen. James Blair, who was killed at the battle of Stirling, in the year of the death of Bruce, was the age of one hundred and seventeen. Alexander Stephen, in Edinburgh, at the age of one hundred and fifty eight. James Brewin, who was born in 1617, died in 1714, and was the age of one hundred and thirty seven. Daniel Cameron, in Banock, married when he was twenty one, and survived his marriage thirty years.

tains Gilchrist and Hotham, being at sea to the northward on a cruise, fell in with the Danae, a French ship of forty cannon and three hundred and thirty men, which was engaged by Captain Hotham in a ship of half the force, who maintained the battle a considerable time with admirable gallantry, before his consort could come to his assistance. As they fought in the dark, Captain Gilchrist was obliged to turn his ship, and his men did not distinguish him from the one from the other: but no sooner did the day appear, than he bore down upon the Danae with his usual impetuosity, and soon compelled her to surrender: she did not sustain much damage, and half the men were taken and the gallant Captain Gilchrist received a grape-shot in his shoulder, which, though it did not deprive him of life, yet rendered him incapable of future service: a misfortune the more to be lamented, as it happened to a brave officer in the vigour of his age, and in the midst of a sanguine war, which might have afforded him many other opportunities of signifying his courage for the honour and advantage of his country. Another remarkable exploit was achieved about the same juncture, by Captain Barrington, commander of the ship Achilles, mounted with sixty cannon, who, to the westward of Cape Finisterre, encountered a French ship of equal force, called the Count de St. Florentin, bearing from Cape Francois on the island of Hispaniola to Rochefort, under the command of the Sieur de Montay, who was obliged to strike, after a close and obstinate engagement, in which he himself was mortally wounded, a great number of men killed, and his ship so damaged, that she was with difficulty brought into Falmouth. Captain Barrington obtained the victory at the expense of about five-and-twenty men killed and wounded, and all his rigging, which the enemy's shot rendered useless. Two small pristors from this ship were taken by the Marquis de Bareil, by the brilliant, which carried her into Kisale in Ireland; the other called the Carillon, which struck to the Grace cutter, assisted by the boats of the ship commanded by Captain Duff, who sent her into the Downs.

§ XLIII. About the latter end of March, Captain Samuel Falkner, in the ship Windsor, of sixty guns, cruised to the northward, and encountered four large ships to leeward, which, when he approached them, formed the line of battle a-head, in order to give him a warm reception. He accordingly closed with the sternmost ship, which sustained his fire about an hour; then the other three bearing away with all the sail they could carry, she struck her colours, and was conducted to Lisbon. She proved to be the Duc de Chartres, pierced for sixty cannon, though at that time carrying no more than four-and-twenty. The command was given to a nobleman, of thirty of whom were killed in the action. She belonged, with the other three that escaped, to the French East India company, was laden with gun-powder and naval stores. Two frigates, called La Chasseur and Le Concordé, the one from Dunkirk, and the other from Cherbourg, were taken and carried into Plymouth by Captain Hughes, of his majesty's frigate the Tamer. A third, called the Despacho, from Moraix, was brought into Penance by the Diligence sloop, under the command of Captain Eastward. A fourth, called the Basque, from Bayonne, furnished with two-and-twenty guns, and about two hundred men, fell into the hands of Captain Parker, of the brilliant, who conveyed her into Plymouth. Captain Antrimus, of the Surprise, took the Vieux, a privateer of Bourdeaux; and a fifth, a ship from Dunkirk, struck to Captain Knight, of the Liverpool, off Yarmouth. In the month of May, a French frigate called the Arethusa, mounted with two-and-thirty cannon, manned with a large complement of hands, under the command of the late Marquis de Vanseul, surrendered to two British frigates, the Venus and the Thames, commanded by the Captains Harrison and Colby, after a warm engagement, in which sixty men were killed and wounded on the side of the enemy. In the month of June, an armed schooner belonging to Dunkirk was brought into the Downs, by Captain Angle, of the Stag; and a privateer of force, called the Countess de la Serre, was subdued and taken, after an obstinate action, by Captain Moore, of his majesty's ship the Adventure.

§ XLIV. Several armed ships of the enemy, and rich prizes, were taken in the West Indies, particularly two French frigates, and two Dutch ships with French commodities, all lately laden, by some of the ships of the squadron which Vice-Admiral Coote commanded on the Jamaica station. A fifth, called the Velour, from St. Domingo, with a valuable cargo on board, being fortified with four-and-twenty guns, was brought into the Jamaica, with the Favourite sloop of war, under the command of Captain Edwards, who, after an obstinate dispute, carried her into the West Indies. Captain Collingwood, commander of the Favourite sloop, in a French frigates, the Amethyst and Berkeley: the former of which escaped, after a warm engagement, in which the Crescent's rigging was so much damaged, that she could not pursue: but the other was taken, and conveyed into the harbour of Bassetterre. Notwithstanding the force and courage of the English cruisers in those seas, the French privateers swarmed to such a degree, that, in the course of this year, they took above two hundred sail of British ships, valued at six hundred thousand pounds sterling. This their success is the more remarkable, as by this time the island of Guadaloupe was in possession of the English, and Commodore Moore commanded a numerous squadron in those very waters.
must be owned, however, that his first attempt savoured of temerity. Having in vain displayed the British flag in sight of Toulon, by way of defiance to the French fleet then lying off, and not during the actions of the preceding day, attacked the Temeraire, of seventy-four guns, and brought her off with little damage. Vice-Admiral Broderick, the second in command, advancing with his division, burned the Re- doubtable of seventy-four guns, which was bulged, and abandoned by her commander, and the batteries of the Monde, carrying sixty-four guns, which had not been much injured in the engagement. This victory was obtained by the English admiral at a very small expense of men; the whole number of the French killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred and fifty on board of the British squadron, though the carnage among the enemy must have been much more considerable, as M. de la Clue, in his letter to the French ambassador at Lisbon, owned, that on board of his own ship, the Ocean, one hundred men were killed on the spot, and seventy dangerously wounded: but the most severe circumstance of this disaster was the loss of four capital ships, two of which were destroyed, and the other two brought to trinmph to England, to be numbered among the best bottoms of the British navy. What augmented the good fortune of the victors, was, that not one officer lost his life in the engagement. Captain Inigo, whom the English admiral had sent to England with the tidings of his success, met with a gracious reception from the king, who knighted him for his gallantry.

§ XLVIII. As we propose to throw together all the naval transactions of the year, especially those that happened in the European seas, that they may be comprehended, as it were, in one view, we must now, without regarding the order of time, relate many previous events of importance, and record the last action by sea, that in the course of this year distinguished the flag of Great Britain. The court of Versailles, in order to embarrass the British ministry, and divert their attention from all external enterprises, the French war minister, for invading some part of the British dominions: and in the beginning of the year had actually begun to make preparations on different parts of their coast for carrying this design into execution. Even as far back as the latter end of May, messages from the king to both Houses of parliament were delivered by the Earl of Holderness and Mr. Pitt, the two secretaries of state, signifying that his majesty had received advices of preparations making by the French court, with a design to invade Great Britain: that though persuaded, by the universal zeal and affection of his people, any such attempt must, under the blessing of God, end in the destruction of those who engaged in it; yet he apprehended that the allies would not act in concert, without a mutual and paternal care and concern which he had always shown for the safety and preservation of his subjects, if he omitted any means in his power which might be necessary for their defence: he, therefore, acquainted the parliament with his having received repeated intelligence of the enemy's preparations, to the end that his majesty might, if he should think proper, in pursuance of the late act of parliament, cause the militia, or such part thereof as should be necessary, to be drawn out and embodied, in order to march as occasion should require. These messages were no sooner read, than each House separately resolved to present an address, thanking his majesty for having communicated this intelligence, assuring him that they would, with their lives and fortunes, support him against all attempts whatever: that, warmed with affection and zeal for his person and government, and animated by indignation at the daring designs of an enemy whose fleet had hitherto shunned the terror of the British navy, they would cheerfully exert their utmost efforts to repel all insults, and effectually enable their sovereign not only to disappoint the attempts of France, but, by the victory of God, and by the power of his own mission. The Commons at the same time resolved upon another address, desiring his majesty would give directions to his lieutenants of the several counties, ridings, and places within the kingdom, to be more particular in their knowledge and attention in executing the several acts of parliament made for the better ordering the militia.
cordingly taken; but the administration wisely placed their chief dependence upon the strength of the navy, part of which was so divided and stationed as to block up all the harbours of France which the enemy were known to make any naval armament of consequence. We have seen in what manner Rear-Admiral Rodney visited the town and harbour of Havre-de-Grace, and scoured that part of the navy service he commanded: we have also recorded the expedition and victory of Admiral Boscowan over the squadron of La Clue, which was equipped at Toulon, with a design to assist in the projected invasion. Nevertheless, the British ministry, sustained in their design; towards the execution of which they had prepared another considerable fleet, in the harbours of Rochefort, Brest, and Port-Louis, to be commanded by M. De Conflans, and reinforced by a considerable body of troops, which were actually assembled under the Duc d'Agoulin, at Vannes, in Lower Bretagne. Flat-bottomed boats and transports to be used in this expedition were prepared in different ports on the coast of France; and a small squadron was equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of an enterprising adventurer, called Thurot, who had, in the course of the preceding year, signalled his courage and conduct in a large privateer called the Galilee, which had secured the North seas, taken a number of ships, and at one time maintained an obstinate battle against two English frigates, which were obliged to desist, after having received considerable damage. This made him a terror to the merchants of Great Britain; for his valour was not more remarkable in battle than his conduct in eluding the pursuit of the British cruisers, who were successively detached in quest of him, through every part of the German ocean and North sea, as far as the coast of Ireland, and that of Norway, owned, for the honour of human nature, that bold mariner, though destitute of the advantages of birth and education, was remarkably distinguished by his generosity and humanity to those who had the misfortune to fall into his power; and that his deportment in every respect entitled him to a much more honourable rank in the service of his country. The court of Versailles were not insensible to his merit. He obtained a commission from the French king, and was vested with the command of the small armament now fitting out in the harbour of Dunkirk. The British government, being apprized of all these proceedings, a small squadron was detached to prevent the proposed invasion as must have conveyed a very high idea of the power of Great Britain to those who considered, that, exclusive of the force opposed to this design, they at the same time carried on the most vigorous and important operations in the North sea, in Germany, America, and West Indies. Thurot's armament at Dunkirk was watched by an English squadron in the Downs, commanded by Commodore Boy (the port of Havre was guarded by Boy) Sir Edward Hawke, of Boscawen, off Toulon, and the coast of Vannes was scourced by a small squadron detached from Sir Edward Hawke, who, during the summer, blocked up the harbour of Brest, where Conflans lay with his fleet, in order to be joined by the other divisions of the armament. These different squadrons of the British navy were connected by a chain of separate cruisers; so that the whole coast of France, from Dunkirk to the extremity of Bretagne, was distrest by an actual blockade.

§ 2. The French ministry being thus hampered, forebore their attempt upon Britain; and the projected invasion seemed to hang in suspense till the month of August, in the beginning of which their army in Germany was defeated at Minden. Their designs in that country being baffled by this disaster, they seemed to convert their chief attention to their sea armament: the preparations were resumed with redoubled vigour; and even after the defeat of La Clue, they resolved to try their fortune in a descent. They now proposed to disembark a body of troops in Ireland. Thurot received orders to sail from Dunkirk with the Queen's squadron, and share his command in the western parts of Scotland, that he might alarm the coast of Ireland, and make a diversion from that part where Conflans intended to effectuate the disembarkation of his forces. The transports and ships of war were assembled at Brest and Rochefort, having on board a train of artillery, with sallies, and other accouterments for cavalry, to be mounted in Ireland; and a body of French troops, including part of the Irish brigade, was kept in readiness to embark. The execution of this scheme was, however, prevented by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke, who blocked up the harbour of Brest, with a fleet of twenty-three ships and frigates, under the command of Captain Duff, continued to cruise along the French coast, from Port L'orient, in Bretagne, to the point of St. Gilles in Ponton. At last the British squadron, commanded by Sir Edward Hawke, Sir Charles Hardy, and Rear-Admiral Gery, were driven from the coast of France by stress of weather, and on the ninth day of the month anchored in Torbay. The French admiral, Conflans, snatched this opportunity of sailing from Brest, with one-and-twenty sail of the line and four frigates, in hopes of being able to destroy the English squadron commanded by Captain Duff, before the large fleet could return from the coast of England. Sir Edward Hawke having received intelligence that the French fleet had sailed from Brest, immediately stood to sea, in order to pursue them; and in the meantime the government issued an order, to the effect that the English ships were thought the most exposed to a descent. The land forces were put in motion, and quartered along the shores of Kent and Sussex: all the ships of war in the different harbours of the coast were ordered to put to sea, and every step was taken to disconcert the designs of the enemy.

§ 3. While these measures were taken with equal vigour and deliberation, Sir Edward Hawke ordered an armament on the coast of Bretagne, which he supposed would be the rendezvous of the French squadron: but notwithstanding his utmost efforts, he was driven by a hard gale considerably to the westward, where he was joined by two frigates, the Euryalus and the dryc. Those he directed to keep a head of the squadron. The weather growing more moderate, the former made the signal for seeing a fleet, on the twentieth day of November, at half an hour past eight o'clock in the morning, and in an hour afterwards discovered them to be the enemy's squadron. They were at that time in chase of Captain Duff's squadron, which now joined the large fleet, after having been detached to the eastward. The British admiral, who, when the Maidstone gave the first notice, had formed the line a-breast, now perceiving that the French admiral endeavoured to escape with all the sail he could carry, threw out a signal for seven of his ships that were nearest the enemy, and joined the East and West Indies squadrons, until they could be reinforced by the rest of the squadron, which were ordered to form into a line of battle a-head, as they chased, that no time might be lost in the pursuit. Considering the weather had been so long tempestuous; the nature of the coast, which is in this place rendered very hazardous by a great number of shoals, sandbanks, sholds, rocks, and islands, as entirely unknown to the British sailors as they were familiar to the French navigators; the dangers of a short day, dark night, and lee-shore; it required extraordinary resolution in the English admiral to attempt hostilities on this occasion: but Sir Edward Hawke, steeling with the integrity and fortitude of his own heart, animated for the dear preservation of his country, and well acquainted with the importance of the stake on which the safety of that country in a great measure depended, was resolved to run extraordinary risks in his endeavours to frustrate at once a boasted scheme projected for the annoyance of his fellow-subjects. With respect to his ships of the line, he had but the advantage of one in point of number, and no superiority in men or metal: consequently, M. de Conflans might have had a fair battle on the open sea, without any imputation of temerity; but he thought proper to play a more artful game, though it did not succeed according to his expectation. The British squadron, with a view to draw the English squadron amongst the shoals and islands, on which he hoped they would pay dear for their rashness and impetuosity, while he and his officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the navi-

but in returning the first broadside foundered, in consequence of the high sea which defied their hard Tickée ports, and filled her with water. Notwithstanding the boisterous weather, a great number of ships on both sides fought with equal fury and doughty success, till about four in the afternoon, when the French, for want of wind, retired to the westward of the Scæa in going to the bottom. The Hero bauld down her colours in token of submission, and dropped anchor; but the wind was so high, that no boat could be sent to take possession. By this time day-light began to leave the scene on the east, leaving the signal for anchoring to the westward of the small island Dumett; and here the fleet remained all night in a very dangerous state, alarmed by the fury of the storm, and the apprehension of loss of distress without the knowledge whether it proceeded from friend or enemy. The Soleil Royal had, under favour of the night, anchored also in the midst of the British squadron; but at day-break M. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and the ship ashore to the westward of Croyée. The English admiral immediately made signal to the Essex to ship cable, and pursue her; and, obeying this order, she ran unoffensively on a sand-hill called Lefour, where the Resolution, another of their ships, had already grounded. Here they were both irrecoverably lost, in spite of all the assistance that could be given; but all their men and part of their stores were saved, and their crews set free, on the land of the Port-Fontain, the Dutch, the Portsmouth, the Chatham, and Vengeance to destroy the Soleil Royal, which was burned by her own people, before the English ships could approach; but they arrived time enough to reduce the Hero to ashes on the Lefour, which she had been also stranded; and the Juste, another of their great ships, perished in the mouth of the Loire. The admiral, perceiving seven large ships of the enemy rigging at anchor between Pointe Frean and the mouth of the river Vilaine, made the signal to weigh, in order to attack them; but the fury of the storm increased to such a degree, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and even order the top-castant mast to be struck. In the meantime, the French ships, being lightened of their anchors, and her, they took advantage of the flood, and a more moderate gale under the land, to enter the Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, protected by some occasional batteries, erected on the shore, and by two large frigates posted across the mouth of the harbour. Thus they were effectually secured from any attempts of small vessels; and as for large ships, there was not water sufficient to float them within fighting distance of the enemy. On the whole, this battle, in which a very considerable number of lives was lost, may be considered as one of the most perilous and important actions that ever happened in war between the two nations; for it not only defeated the projected invasion, which had been menacing so long over the apprehensions of Great Britain; but it gave the finishing blow to the naval power of France, which was totally disabled and driven into the very depth of the basin; a fatal blow to the French fleet.

during the war the English had already taken and destroyed two-hundred and forty frigates, besides four frigates taken at Malo, and four frigates captured, so that their whole loss, in this particular, amounted to sixty-four; whereas the loss of Great Britain did not exceed seven sail of the line and five frigates. It may be easily conceived how the French navy, already reduced to one hundred and sixty ships, and four frigates possessed, so that their whole loss, in this particular, amounted to sixty-four, whereas the loss of Great Britain did not exceed seven sail of the line and five frigates. be under the direction and command of so known an asserter of liberty, such an important and distinguished governor, as had been for a long time required and expected. The king's majesty, therefore, in pursuance of his majesty's arms might be crowned with such a continuation of success, as should enable him to defeat the devices of all his enemies, and obtain a speedy and honorable peace with his enemies. If the commands of his majesty were committed to the Earl of Shannon, and by him presented to the Duke of Bedford, must have been very agreeable to the government at such a critical conjuncture.
§ LIV. Althougb no traces of disaffection in his majestv's family appeared on this trying occasion, it must nevertheless be acknowledged, that a spirit of dissatisfaction broke out with extraordinary violence among the populace of Dublin. The present lord-leutenant was not remarkably popular in his administration. He had bestowed one place of considerable importance upon a gentleman whose person was obnoxious to many people in that kingdom, and perhaps failed in that affinity and condescension which a free and ferocious nation expects to find in the character of him to whose rule they are subjected. Whether the offence taken at his departure had created enemies to his person, or the nation in general began to entertain doubt about jealousies of the government's designs, certainly it is, great and strange, to gathmerge a belief among the lower sort of people, that a union would soon be effected between Great Britain and Ireland; in which case this last kingdom would be deprived of a spirit with which it was hitherto favored, and be subjected to the same taxes that are levied upon the people of England. This notion inflamed the populace to such a degree, that they assembled in a prodigious multitude, broke into the House of Lords, insulted the peers, seized the woman on the throne, and searched for the journals, which, had they been found, they would have committed to the flames. Not content with this outrage, they compelled the members of both Houses, whom they met in the streets, to take an oath that they would never consent to such a union, or give any vote contrary to the true interest of Ireland. Divers coaches belonging to obnoxious persons were destroyed, and their horses killed; and a gibbet was erected for one gentleman in particular, who narrowly escaped the ungodly rage of those riotous insurgents.
A body of horse and infantry were drawn out on this occasion, in order to overawe the multitude, which at night dispersed of itself. Next day addresses to the lord-lieutenant were agreed to by both Houses of parliament, and a committee of inquiry appointed, that the ringleaders of the tumult might be discovered, and brought to condign punishment.
§ LIV. When the ministry of England received the first advice, that M. Thurot had escaped from Dunkirk, with a small squadron of armed ships, having on board a body of land troops, designed for a private expedition on the coast of Scotland or Ireland, expresss were immediately despatched to the commanding officers of the forces in North Britain, with orders to put the forts along the coast of that kingdom in the best posture of defence; and to hold every thing in readiness to repel the enemy, in who they should attempt a descent. In consequence of these instructions, beacons were erected for the immediate communication of intelligence; places of rendezvous appointed for the troops in militia; and strict orders issued that no officer should absent himself from his duty, on any pretence whatever. The greatest encomium that can be given to the character of this partisan, is an account of the alarm which the sailing of his puny armament spread through the whole extent of such a powerful kingdom, whose fleets covered the ocean. Perhaps Thurot's career would have sooner stopped, had Commodore Boys been victualled for a longer cruise: but this commander was obliged to put into Leith for a supply of provisions, at the very time when Thurot was seen hovering on the coast near Aberdeen; and before the English squadron was provided for a prosecution of the cruise, the other had taken shelter at Gottenburgh, in Sweden.

§ 1. State of the island of Martinique. § 2. Expedition against that island. § 3. Establishments made on this coast. § 4. Settlement of Guadeloupe. § 5. Separation with the islanders. § 6. Fort Louis

§ 2. Such was the progress of the French, and the inhabitants every day expected a visit from the British armed force, whose progress we shall now relate. On the twelfth day of November, in the preceding year, Captain Hughes sailed from St. Helens with eight sail of the line, one frigate, four bomb-ketches, and a fleet of transports, lying on board six regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, besides eight hundred marines distributed among the ships of war; this whole force being under the command of Major-General Hillson, an old experienced officer, assisted by Major-General Barrington, the Colonels Armiger and Halldane, the Lieutenant-Colonels Travers and Clavering, acting in the capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of seven weeks and three days, they arrived at Barbadoes, where they remained in port, and detached up the river. § 3. Council of war called. § 4. The troops land at the Heights of Abraham. § 5. Entry into Quebec. § 6. Reoccupation of England. § 7. Having finished the detail of the actions achieved in the European seas, by the naval force of Great Britain, within the compass of the present year, we shall now proceed to record the exploits of the British arms within the tropics, and particularly the expedition to Martinique and Guadeloupe, which it is said to have succeeded even beyond the expectation of the ministry. A plan had been formed for improving the success of the preceding year in North America, by carrying the British arms up the river St. Lawrence, and besieging Quebec, the capital of Canada. The armament employed against the French islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe constituted part of this design, as much as the troops embarked to reinforce the forces sent to Martinique, attempted to reinforce the British army in North America, which was just considered as the chief seat of the war. What hope of success the administration conceived from an attempt upon Martinique, may be guessed from the state of that island, as it appeared in a memorial presented by the French king's lieutenants of its several districts, to the general of the French island, concerning two hundred thousand dollars' ransom of negroes, and the augmentation of the forces sent to Martinique, intended to reinforce the British army in North America, which was just considered as the chief seat of the war. § I. Having finished the detail of the actions achieved in the European seas, by the naval force of Great Britain, within the compass of the present year, we shall now proceed to record the exploits of the British arms within the tropics, and particularly the expedition to Martinique and Guadeloupe, which it is said to have succeeded even beyond the expectation of the ministry. sailors; who, being landed in flat-bottomed boats, clambered up the rock, and entered through the embrasures with their bayonets fixed. Here, however, they met with no resistance; the enemy had abandoned the fort with proper capitulation. The British colours were immediately hoisted, and sentinels of marines posted upon the parapet. The next care was to spike and disable the cannon, break the carriage of the ordnance which they found in the magazine: nevertheless, the detachment was ordered to keep possession of the battery. This service being successfully performed, three ships were sent to reduce the other batteries on Martinique, which consisted only of four guns, and these were likewise disabled. Four other ships, reinforced with militia which had been detached from the town to oppose the disembarkation, perceiving the whole British squadron, and all the transports, already within in the bay, and Fort Negro occupied, determined to lay siege to Port-Royal, leaving the beach open; so that the English troops were landed without opposition; and, being formed, advanced into the country towards Fort Negro, in the neighbourhood of which they lay all night upon their arms; while the fleet, which had been galled by bomb-shells from the citadel, shifted their station, and stood further up the bay. By ten next day the English officers had been enabled to form an entrenched camp, and scour the woods; from whence the troops had been greatly annoyed by the small shot of the enemy during the best part of the night, and all that morning. At noon the Britishvillages in order to prevent the hill that overlooked the town and citadel of Port-Royal, and sustained a troublesome fire from enemies they could not see; for the French militia were entirely covered by the woods and bushes. This demonstration, called the Morne Torrence, though the bay was as much as two miles in length, of the whole island, was neglected by the general of Martinique, who had resolved to blow up the fortifications of the citadel; but, luckily for the islanders, he had not prepared the materials for this operation, which must have been attended with the immediate destruction of the capital, and indeed of the whole country. Some of the inferior officers, knowing the importance of the Morne Torrence, resolved to defend that post with a body of the militia which was reinforced by the garrisons of Fort Negro and Casenoves, as well as by some soldiers detached from the Florissant: but, notwithstanding all their endeavours, as they were entirely unaccustomed with cannon, extremely defective in point of discipline, dispirited by the pusillanimity of their governor, and in a great measure discouraged by the general con- servation that prevailed among the inhabitants, in all probability they could not have withstood a spirited and well-conducted attack by regular troops. At about three o'clock General Hopson thought proper to desist from his attempt. He gave the commander to understand, that he could not maintain his ground, unless the squadron would support him by cannon, landing near the town. Port-Royal, at a savannah, where the boats must have been greatly exposed to the fire of the enemy; or assist him in attacking the citadel by sea, while he should make his approaches by land. Both these expedients being deemed impracticable by a council of war, the troops were recalled from their advanced posts, and re-embarked in the evening, without any considerable molestation from the enemy. Their attempt on the Morne Torrence had cost them several men, including two officers, killed in the action; and, in revenge for this loss, they burned the sugar-canes, and desolated the country, in their retreat. The inhabitants of Martinique could hardly credit the testimony of their own senses, when they saw themselves thus delivered from all their fears, at a time when they were overwhelmed with terror and confusion; when the principal individuals among them had resigned all thought of further resistance, and were assembled in the public hall in Port-Royal, to send deputes to the English general, with proposals of capitulation and surrender.

a The commodore offered to land the nanos on the other side of Point de l'Enfer, but the general of the fleet ordered them to land the road from the English army at Port- Royal, and even caused them to go far on this side, without the order of the commodore, but this order was not accepted. General Hopson afterwards declared, that this course was highly improper, and Mr. Moore's despatch, of the 7th, is a plain but severe reproof on this head.

b The commodore did not attend at this council, it was convened to deliberate upon the opinion of the chief engineer, who thought they should make another landing on the southward of the carriage. In this case, the latter declared it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, for the French to proceed to that point, without the hope of reaching Port-Royal; but this council was not held.

c Only as being the seal of government; for Guadaloupe makes a much more effectual impression, than either of the greater islands, or Martinique. During the civil disturbance, with the assistance of the Dutch of St. Eustatius, situated in its neighbourhood.
it was defended. A disposition being made for this purpose, the large ships took their respective stations next morning, which was the twenty-third day of January. At nine, the Lion, commanded by Captain Trewheney, began the engagement against a battery of nine guns; and the rest of the fleet continued to place themselves abreast of the other batteries and the citadel, which mounted forty-six cannon, besides two mortars. The action in a little time became general and very severe. In both ships for several hours with great vivacity; while the commodore, who had shifted his pennant into the Woolwich frigate, kept aloof without gun-shot, that he might observe the scene of the battle, and give his orders to the greater deliberation. This expedient of an admiral's removing his flag and retiring from the action while his own ship is engaged, however consonant to reason, we do not remember to have seen practised upon any occasion, except in one instance, at Carthagena, where Sir Chaloner Ogle quitted his own ship, when he was ordered to stand in, and cannonade the fort of Bocca-Chira. In this present attack, all the sea commanders beheld with extraordinary spirit and resolution, particularly the Captains Leslie, Burnett, Garton, Jekyll, Trewheney, and Shuldham; who, in the hottest tumult of the action, distinguished themselves equally by their courage, impetuosity, and deliberation. About five in the afternoon the fire of the citadel slackened. The Burford and Berwick were driven out to sea; so that Captain Shuldham, in the Panther, was unsustained; and Captain Jekyll, in the Rippon, Captain Jekyll, who by two in the afternoon had silenced the guns of one, called the Morne-rogue; but at the same time could not prevent his ship from running aground. The enemy receiving her disaster, assembled in great numbers on the hill, and spied the terrors, from whence they poured in a severe fire of musketry. The militia afterwards brought up a cannon of eighteen pound ball, and for two hours raked her fore and aft with considerable effects. The action, in order to make the account as equal as possible, and to preserve that equal courage and perseverance, though his people dropped on every side, until all his grape-shot and wadding were expended, and all his rigging cut to pieces; to crown his misfortune, a box, containing nine hundred cartridges, blew up on the poop, and set the ship on fire; which, however, was soon extinguished. In the meantime, the captain threw out a signal of distress; to which no regard was paid, till Captain Leslie, of the Bristol, coming from sea, and observing the burning ship, ran in between the Rippon and the battery; and engaged with such impetuosity, as made an immediate diversion in favour of Captain Jekyll, whose ship remained anchored, and, not being obliged to be given, till midnight, when she floated, and escaped from the very jaws of destruction. At seven in the evening, all the other large ships, having silenced the guns to which they had been respectively opposed, joined the rest of the fleet. The four bombs being anchored near the shore, began to ply the town with shells and carcasses; so that in a little time the houses were in flames, the magazines of gunpowder blew up with the most terrible explosion; and about ten o'clock the whole place blazed out in one general conflagration. Next day at two in the afternoon, the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Basseterre, where they left their ships which the enemy had set on fire at their approach: several ships turned out and endeavoured to escape, but were intercepted and taken by the English squadron. At five, the troops landed without opposition, and took possession of the town and citadel.

which they found entirely abandoned. They learnt from a Genoese deserter, that the regular troops of the island consisted of five companies only, the number of the whole not exceeding one hundred men; and that they had lain up the powder magazine in the citadel: but had been obliged to retreat with such precipitation, as did not permit them to execute this design. The train was immediately cut off, and the magazine secured. The rails with which they had spiked up their cannon were drilled out by the musketeers; and in the meantime, the British colours were hoisted on the parapet. Part of the troops took possession of an advantageous post on an eminence, and part entered the town, which still continued burning with great fury.

To their Excellent Wives, Harriot and Emma, General Officers of his Majesty, **

[Note in margin: "To their Excellent Wives, Harriot and Emma, General Officers of his Majesty."

[Note in margin: "I have sent the letter which your excellencies have done me the honour to write of the twentieth March. You make the proposals which could not have been expected from the character and situation of the little town and citadel of Basseterre; for otherwise you ought to do me the justice to believe that I could not be prevailed on. You have strongly sufficed to resist a considerable body of the enemy, and at the same time to exclude the inhabitants of the island from the necessity of giving up the town."

sword in hand, and burned the houses and plantations. Some of the enemy were killed, and a great number taken. Of the English detachment twelve soldiers were slain, and thirty wounded, including three subaltern officers, one of whom lost his limb. The greatest body of the enemy always appeared at the governor's head-quarters, where they had raised a redoubt, and thrown up intrenchments. From these a considerable detachment advanced on the 6th day of February to the admission of the citadel, and fell in with an English party, whom they engaged with great vivacity; but, after a short though warm dispute, they were obliged to retire with some loss. Without all doubt, the misconduct of some officers pursued the most sensible part of the English, and that could possibly have been projected for their own safety. Instead of hazarding a general engagement against regular troops, in which they could have no prospect of success, they resolved to weary them out, by maintaining a kind of petty war in separate parties, to alarm and harass the English with hard duty in a sultry climate, where they were but insufficiently supplied with provision and refreshment. Nor were their hopes in this particular disappointed. Both the army and the navy were invaded with fevers, and other diseases, epidemic in those hot countries: and the regimental hospitals were so crowded, that it was judged convenient to send five hundred sick men to the sea, where they might more easily attack the enemy, and form a strong base of supplies for the island, which, as we have already observed, was defended by a strong battery, called Fort-Louis. In pursuance of this determination, the great ships were sent round to Grand-morne, in order to reinforce this fortification, which they accordingly attacked on the thirteenth day of February. After a severe cannonading, which lasted six hours, a body of marines being landed with the hightanders, they drove the enemy from their intrenchments, and forthwith hoisted the English colours. In a few days after this exploit, General Hopson dying at Basseterre, the chief command devolved on General Barrington, who resolved to prosecute the final reduction of the island with vigour and dispatch. As one step towards this conquest, the commodore ordered two ships of war to cruise off the island of St. Eustatia, and prevent the Dutch traders from aiding the natives of Guadaloupe, whom they had hitherto constantly supplied with provisions, since they retired to the mountains. General Barrington, on the very first day of his command, ordered the troops who were then at anchor, to take their departure, in order that the enemy might imagine he intended to remain in that quarter; but in a few days the batteries in and about Basse- terre were blown up and destroyed, the detachments recalled from the advanced posts, and the whole army re-embarked except one regiment, with a detachment of artillery, left in garrison at the citadel, the command of which was bestowed on Colonel Debray, an accomplish- ed officer of great experience. The enemy no sooner perceived the coast clear than they desentred from the hills, and endeavoured to take possession of the town, from which however they were driven by the fire of the citadel. They afterwards erected a battery, from whence they commanded this fortification both with shot and shells, and even threatened a regular attack; but as often as they approached the place, they were repulsed by sallies from the castle. In the midst of these hostilities, the gallant Dutch were attacked by one lieutenant, two bombardiers, and several common soldiers, were blown up, and perished, by the explosion of a powder magazine at the flanked angle of the south-east bastion.

The confusion necessarily produced by such an unfortunate incident, encouraged the enemy to come pouring down from the hills, in order to make their advantage of the disaster; but they were soon repulsed by the fire of the garrison. The general, being much acquainted with the fate of Colonel Debray, conferred the government of the fort upon Major Melville, and sent thither the chief engi- neer to repair and improve the fortifications.

§ VII. In the mean time, Mr. Moore having received certain intelligence that Mons. de Bompard had arrived at Martinique, with a squadron consisting of eight sail of the line and three frigates, having on board a whole regiment of land troops, and more than a thousand garrisoned in the batteries of the island, he called in his cruisers, and sailed immediately to the bay of Dominique, an island to wind-ward, at the distance of nine leagues from Guadaloupe, where he could always sail to oppose any design which the French commander might form against the operations of the British armaments. For what reason Mr. Moore did not sail immediately to the bay of Port Royal in Martinique, where he knew the French squadron lay at anchor, we shall not pretend to determine. He had taken that step, M. Bompard must either have given him battle, or retired into the carenage, behind the citadel; in which case, the English commander might have anchored between the French and the island, and more fortunately answered his expec-tation. By retreating to Dominique, he left the sea open to French privateers, who roved along the coasts of these islands, and in a very little time carried into Guadaloupe and Martinique more than eighty vessels, and the subjects of Great Britain. These continual depredations committed under the nose of the English commodore, irritated the planters of the English islands, some of whom were said to have circulated unfavourable reports of that gentleman's character.

§ VIII. General Barrington being left with no more than one ship of forty guns for the protection of the transports, formed a plan of prosecuting the war in Guadaloupe by determining on the possession of the fort, and instantly answered his expec-tation. He determined to make a descent on the division of the island called Grandeterre, and for that purpose allotted six hundred men: who, under the command of Colonel Crump, landed between the towns of St. Ann and St. François: and destroyed some batteries of the enemy, from whom he sustained very little opposition. While he was thus employed, a detachment of three hun- dred men attacked the town of Gros-Islet, who, notwithstanding a severe fire, they took by storm, drove the garrison into the woods, set fire to the place, and demolished the battery and intrenchment raised for its defence. This success was accompanied with two, or three flats-hulled boats, that belonged to the enemy, might have been expected to join in this attack; but proper watch was made, and they were ordered to force their way to Fort-Louis, while the garrison of that castle was directed to make two sallies, in order to favour their irruption. They accordingly gene- rated, with some loss sustained in forcing a strong pass, and took possession of a battery which the enemy had raised against the English camp, in the neighbourhood of Fort-Louis. The general, having hitherto succeeded in his designs, formed the scheme of surprising at one time the three towns of Petit-Bourg, Cognost, and St. Mary, situated on the Baseterre side of the little Cule-de-Sac, and commanded the execution of it to the Colonels Crump and Clavering: but the night appointed for the service proved excessively stormy and tempestuous, which made the directors were so frightened, that they ran several of the flat-bottomed boats on the shoals that skirt this part of the island. Colonel Clavering landed with about eighty men; but for the want of a boat, and that he was obliged to take the mud so impossibly deep, that he was obliged to re- embark, though not before the enemy had discovered his design. This project having miscarried, the general detached the same commanders, whose gallantry and conduct cannot be sufficiently applauded, with a detachment of fifteen hundred men, including one hundred and fifty vase of artillery, and had proceeded from the town of Aronville, at the bottom of the little Cul-de-Sac, under the protection of his majesty's ship Woolwich. The enemy made no opposition to their landing; but retreated, as the English advanced, to a strong intrenchment they had made two miles from the river. This intrenchment was of great importance, as it covered the whole country as far as the bay of Mahaut, where provisions and supplies of all sorts were landed from St. Eustatia. The river was rendered inaccessible by a morass covered with mangles, except at two narrow passes, which they had fortified with a redoubt and intrenchments well pallissaded, mounted with cannon, and defended by a numerous militia: besides, the narrow roads, through which only they could be attacked, were intersected with deep and wide ditches. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the English commanders determined to hazard an assault. While four field-pieces and two howitzers maintained a constant fire upon the top of the intrenchments, the regiment of Duroure and the highlanders advanced under this cover, firing by platoons with the utmost regularity. The enemy, intimidated by their cool and resolute behaviour, began to advance; but they were driven back by the fire of the highlanders, drawing their swords, and sustained by part of the regiment, threw themselves in with their usual impetuosity, and followed the fugitives pell-mell into the redoubt, where they had maintained their ground within the intrenchments on the right, from whence they annoyed the assailants both with musketry and cannon. In half an hour, an occasional bridge being made, the English troops passed the river, in a post, which they fortified with precipitation; notwithstanding all their haste, however, about seventy were taken prisoners, and among those some of the most considerable inhabitants of the island. The French lost one hundred and fifteen officers and thirteen men killed, and above fifty wounded.

§ IX. The roads being mended for the passage of the artillery, the troops advanced towards Pétitbourg, harassed in their march by flying bodies of the enemy, and arrived late at night on the banks of the river Lizard, the only ford of which the French had fortified with strong intrenchments, protected by a battery of four cannon, erected on a rising ground in their rear. Colonel Clavering, in the night, with all his force, and determined to clear a constant fire into their lines, transported in two canoes, which he launched about a mile and a half further down the river, a sufficient number of troops by day-break, to assault the place to clear it. But, though the troops were commanded in front of the head of his little army; but they did not think proper to sustain the assault. On the contrary, they no sooner perceived his intention, than they forsook the post, and fled without order. Colonel Clavering, having crossed the river, pursued them to Pétitbourg, which they had also fortified; and here he found Captain Uvedale, of the Grenada bomb-ketch, throwing shells into the redoubt. He forthwith sent detachments to occupy the neighbouring heights: a circumstance which the enemy no sooner observed, than they deserted the place, and retired with great expedition. On the fifteenth day of April, Captain Steel destroyed a battery at Gouyave, a strong post, which had been long left at his place by the enemy, the French abandoned at his approach, after having made a hasty discharge of their artillery. At the same time Colonel Crump was detached with seven hundred men to the bay of Malsaut, where he burned the town and batteries, which he found abandoned, together with a vast quantity of provisions, which had been brought from the island of St. Eustatia. Colonel Clavering, having left a body of troops to watch the head of the bay, took possession of the twentieth day of the month towards St. Mary's, where he understood the enemy had collected their whole force, thrown up intrenchments, and raised barricades; but they had left their rear unguarded. The English commander immediately detached Colonel Darlow, with a body of troops, to attack them from that quarter, while he himself advanced against the front of their intrenchment.

They stood but one cannon-shot, and then fled to their lines and batteries at St. Mary's, the flanks of which were covered with woods and precipices. When they perceived the troops advancing to the attack, the officers and men charged their ground, and fled in the utmost confusion, leaving the field and all their artillery to the victors, who took up their quarters for that night at St. Mary's. Next day they entered the charming country of Capesterre, where eight hundred and seventy negroes belonging to the plantation of the company of the Marigalante, and some of the inhabitants of the island, who had been runaway, met with a reception of the greatest degree of respect and attention. Here Colonel Clavering was met by Messieurs de Clavilliers and Duquenser, deputed by the principal inhabitants of the island to know what capitulation would be granted. These he conducted to Pétitbourg, where they were presented to General Barrington; who, considering the absence of the fleet, the small number of his forces, daily diminishing, the difficulty of the country, and the impossibility of the enemy's being reinforced from Martinique, wisely took the advantage of the present panic, and settled terms of capitulation without delay. The sanction of this resolution soon appeared. The inhabitants had just signed the agreement, when a messenger arrived to announce the arrival of the French fleet, with the arrival of the harmonie, the general of the French islands, had landed at St. Anne's, to the windward, with a reinforcement from Martinique, consisting of six hundred regulars from Europe, about fifteen hundred volunteers, and a considerable number of the militia, drafted from the companies of Martinique, with a great supply of arms and ammunition, mortars and artillery, under convoy of the squadron commanded by M. de Bonpart, who no sooner learned that the capitulation was signed, than he re-embarked the troops and stores with all possible expedition, and returned to Martinique. Thus we see the conquest of this important island, which is said to produce a greater quantity of sugar than the island of Martinique, and that the English had not planted, was as much owing to accident as to the value of the troops and the conduct of the general: for, had the reinforcement arrived an hour sooner than it actually landed, in all probability the English would have found it impracticable to finish the reduction of Guadeloupe. Be that as it may, the natives certainly deserved great commendation, not only for persevering so gallantly in defence of their country, but also for their fortitude in bearing every species of distress. They now quit the Dos d'An, and all their other posts, and returned to their respective habitations. The town of Bassesterre, being reduced to a heap of ashes, the inhabitants became afraid of the return of the English, and went away, where they resumed their several occupations with that good humour so peculiar to the French nation; and General Barrington humbly indulged them with all the assistance in his power.

§ X. The small islands of Deseda, Los Santos, and Pétitbourg, were comprised in the capitulation of Guadeloupe. The inhabitants of Marigalante, which lies about three leagues to the south-east of Grande-terre, extending twenty miles in length, fifteen in breadth, flat and fertile, but poorly watered and ill-fortified, having refused to submit when summoned by the squadron to surrender, General Barrington resolved to reduce them by force. He embarked a body of troops on board of transports, which sailed thither under convoy of three ships of war and two bomb vessels from Prince Rupert's bay, and at their appearance the islands submitting, received an English garrison. Before this period, Commodore Moore having received intelligence that M. de Bonpart had sailed from Martinique, with design to land a reinforcement on Guadeloupe, and that his squadron was seen seven leagues to windward on the twenty-second day of the month towards St. Mary's, where he understood the enemy had collected their whole force, thrown up intrenchments, and raised barricades; but they had left their rear unguarded. The English commander immediately detached Colonel Darlow, with a body of troops, to attack them from that quarter, while he himself advanced against the front of their intrenchment. dron sailed on one side of the island, and the French upon the other, that they might be sure of not meeting; but this, without doubt, was an impudent calumny.1

§ XI. General Harrington, having partly completed the conquest of Guadaloupe, gave notice to the commodore, that he intended to send back part of the troops, with the transports, to England, about the beginning of July. In consequence, the commodore accordingly embarked his squadron at Basseterre road, where he was next day joined by two ships of the line from England, which rendered him greatly superior in strength to the commander of the French fleet, who had retired with the island of Grenada, lying about eight leagues from Guadaloupe. Here he was discovered by the ship Rippon, whose captain returned immediately to Basseterre, to make the commodore acquainted with this circumstance: but, before he could weigh anchor, a frigate arrived, with information that the part had quit Grenada, and was supposed to have directed his course to Hispaniola. The commodore immediately despatched the Ludlow-castle with the intelligence to Admiral Coats, who commanded the squadron at Jamaica. General Harrington having made a tour of the island, in order to visit and repair those fortifications as he thought necessary to be maintained, and the affairs relating to the war of six years already settled, he sent the Jamaica, with a body of drafts, to North America, under convoy: be garrisoned the principal strength of the island, and left the chief command to Colonel Crimp, who had formed the preceding expedition; Colonel Crimp having been sent home to England with the account of the capitulation. Colonel Melville, who had signalized himself to a remarkable manner ever since their first landing, continued governor of the island at Basseterre; and the fleet of Grandetere was stationed on Cape Delgano. Three complete regiments were allotted as a sufficient guard for the whole island, and the other three were embarked for England. General Harrington himself was on board the Rainbow in the latter part of June, and took his departure for England. About a month after, the transports, under convoy of Captain Hughes, with a small squadron, sail for Great Britain; while Commodore More, with his fleet, directed his course to Antigua.

§ XII. While this armament had been employed in the conquest of Guadaloupe, North America exhibited still more sanguinary scenes of war and devastation; which, in order properly to introduce, it will be necessary to explain the steps that were taken on this concern, previous to that campaign. In October of the preceding year, a grand assembly was held at Easton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia; and there peace was established, by a formal treaty, between Great Britain and the Indians dwelling in that country, consisting of several nations inhabiting the country between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The T Ignite, however, being divided, and the lakes, did not assist at this conference. The two steps, thus taken, induced the British ministry to confer with those nations, and to enter into an alliance with that people. The conferences were managed by the governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, accompanied by Sir William Johnston's deputy for Indian affairs, four members of the council of New Jersey, five members of the council of Pennsylvania, six members of the assembly, two agents for the province of New Jersey, a great number of planters and citizens of Philadelphia, chiefly Quakers. They were met by the deputies and chiefs of the Mohawks, Onondagas, Onondagagers, Cayugas, Senecas, Tuscaroras, Tontiagues, and Comow; the Tuscaroras, Chaguanus, Delawares, and Unamies, the Minnsens, Mohicans, and Wappingers; the whole number, including their women and children, amounting to five hundred. Some of the Six Nations, thinking themselves aggrieved by the British colonists, who had imprisoned certain individuals of their nation, and had killed a few, and treated others with contempt, did not fail to express their resentment, which had been partly fomented by the French emissaries, even into an open rupture. The Delawares and Minnsens, in particular, complained that the English had encroached upon their lands, and on that account were provoked to hostilities: but their chief, Teedyuscung, had made overtures of peace; and the character of amiableform from all the ten nations had been very instrumental in forming this assembly. The chiefs of the Six Nations, though very well disposed to peace, took umbrage at the importance assumed by one of the Delaware tribes; over whom, as their descendants, they exercise a sort of guardianship, and which they now had made no scruple to disclose their dissatisfaction. The business, therefore, of the English governors at this congress, was to ascertain the limits of the lands in dispute, and reconcile the errors which had occasioned the difficulties. The Delawares, remove every cause of misunderstanding between the English and the Indians, detach these savages entirely from the French interest, establish a firm peace, and induce them to exert their influence in persuading the Tiguistes to accede to this treaty. Those Indians, though possessed of few ideas, circumscribed in their mental faculties, stupid, brutal, and ferocious, conduct themselves, nevertheless, in matters of importance, to the community, by the general maxims of reason and justice: and their treaties are always founded upon good sense, conveyed in a very ridiculous manner. Their language is guttural, harsh, and polysyllabic; and their speech consists of hyperbolical metaphors, and equally crude expressions, which is great credit to their language. Every proposition is offered, every answer made, every promise corroborated, every declaration attested, and every treaty confirmed, by producing and interchanging these belts of wampum. The treaty was signed from the 6th to the 26th of October, and delivered on the 29th of November. The whole treaty, with the articles, was made at this treaty, on the 26th of August, and on the 26th of October, 2690, when every article was settled to the mutual satisfaction of all parties. The Indian deputies were gratified with a valuable present, consisting of looking-glasses, knives, tobacco, from one to two dollars worth, of corn, beans, comfits, shirts, shoes, stockings, hats, caps, handkerchiefs, thread, clothes, blankets, garterine, serges, wash-cots, and a few suits of leaved clothes for their chiefs. To crown their happiness, the stores of rum were opened: they drank themselves into a state of brutal intoxication, and next day returned in peace to their respective places of habitation.

§ XIII. This treaty with the Indians, who had been debauched from the interest of Great Britain, then only paved the way for those operations, which had been projected against the French settlements in Canada. Instead of employing the whole strength of the British arms in North America against one object, the ministry resolved to divide it into severalinations, directing several parties to different parts at once, that the enemy might be divided, distracted, and weakened, and the conquest of Canada completed in one campaign. That the success might be the more easy, a general plan, that, by joining in the same manner as to co-operate with each other, and even join occasionally, so practicable was it thought for them to maintain such a correspondence as would admit of a junction of this nature. The project of this campaign appeared nothing but that General Wolfe, who had distinguished himself so eminently in the siege of Louisbourg, should proceed up the river St. Lawrence, as soon as the navigation should be clear of ice, with a body of eight thousand men, to command a squadron of ships from England, to undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of Canada, acting with General Amherst, who commanded in chief, should, with another army of regular troops, and provincials, amounting to twelve thousand men, to reduce Ticonderoga and Crown Point, cross the lake Champlain, and, proceeding along the river Richelieu to the banks of the river St. Lawrence, join General Wolfe in the siege of Quebec; that Bogalou, General Prideaux, with a third body, reinforced with a considerable number of friendly Indians, assembled by the influence and under the command of Sir William Johnston, should invest the French fort erected by the fall or castle... of Niagara, which was certainly the most important post of all French America, as it in a manner commanded all the interior parts of that vast continent. It oversaw the whole course of the St. Lawrence, the navigation of the great lakes, the communication between Canada and Louisiana, and opened a passage for invasions into the colonies of Great Britain. On the 14th of March, the British forces, having reduced Niagara, should be embarked on the lake Ontario, fall down the river St. Lawrence, besiege and take Montreal, and then join or co-operate with Amherst’s army. Before the latter decided upon this plan, he commanded a smaller detachment for reducing smaller forts, and securing the banks of the lake Ontario. How far this project was founded on reason and military knowledge, may be judged by the following particulars, of which the projectors were not ignorant. The navigation of the river St. Lawrence is dangerous and uncertain. The city of Quebec was remarkably strong from situation and fortifications, from the bravery of the inhabitants, and the number of the garrison. Monsieur de Montcalm, an officer of great courage and activity, kept the field between Montreal and Quebec, with a body of eight or ten thousand men, consisting of regular troops and disciplined militia, and his name was well known and respected, and another body of reserve hovered in the neighbourhood of Montreal, which was the residence of Monsieur de Vaudreuil, governor-general of Canada. The garrison of Quebec was actually much superior to that of Montreal, not so much from the number of men as from the fact that it was tedious and embarrassed; and Monsieur de Vaudreuil secured the country with a flying detachment, well acquainted with all the woods and passes. With respect to General Amherst’s state of the plan, the town of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point stood in his way. The enemy were masters of the lake Champlain, and possessed the strong fort of Chambly, by the fall of the river Richelieu, that defended the route to the river St. Lawrence. Even had these objects been removed, it might have been doubted whether he and Mr. Wolfe should move at Quebec in the same instant of time. The first that reached it, far from being in a condition to undertake the siege of Quebec, would have run the risk of being engaged and defeated by the covering army; in which case, the other body must have been exposed to the imminent hazard of destruction in the midst of an enemy’s country, far distant from any place of safety to which it could retreat. Had the disasters happened, (and, according to the experience of war, they were the natural consequences of the scheme,) the troops at Niagara would, in all probability, have fallen an easy prey to the other, with the whole of the United States; and as they receive intelligence time enough to accomplish their retreat before they could be intercepted. The design would, we apprehend, have been more justifiable, or at least not so liable to objection, had Mr. Amherst left two or three regiments to protect the frontiers of New York and, joining Mr. Wolfe with the rest, sailed up the river St. Lawrence to besiege Quebec. Even in that case the whole number of his troops would not have been sufficient, according to the practice of war, to invest the place, and cope with the covering army. Nevertheless, had the enterprise succeeded, Montcalm must either have hazarded an engagement against great odds, or retired further into the country; that which would have been open by land and water to Montreal, which could have made little resistance. The two principal towns being taken, and the navigation of the river St. Lawrence blocked up, all the defeated forces were surrendered, at discretion, except Niagara, which there was a bare possibility of supplying, at an incredible trouble and expense, from the distant Mississippi; but, even then, it might have been beset in form, and easily reduced. Whatever defects there might have been in this plan, it was considered as the only practicable one, in some essential points, was attended with surprising success. The same good fortune that prospered the British arms so remarkably in the conquest of Guadeloupe, seemed to attend the British arms in their siege of Quebec, the siege of which we shall record in its proper place. At present, we must attend the operations of General Amherst, whose separate army was first in motion, though such impediments were thrown in his way as greatly retarded the progress of his operations; impediments said to have arisen from the pride, insolence, and obstinacy of certain individuals, who pressed forward without command in that part of the world, and employed it all to thwart the service of their country.

§ XIV. The summer was already far advanced before General Amherst prepared for the siege of Quebec. The French forces, although they met with no opposition, and received the assistance of Governor de Léry, who commanded a small detachment for reducing smaller forts, and securing the banks of the lake Ontario. How far this project was founded on reason and military knowledge, may be judged by the following particulars, of which the projectors were not ignorant. The navigation of the river St. Lawrence is dangerous and uncertain. The city of Quebec was remarkably strong from situation and fortifications, from the bravery of the inhabitants, and the number of the garrison. Monsieur de Montcalm, an officer of great courage and activity, kept the field between Montreal and Quebec, with a body of eight or ten thousand men, consisting of regular troops and disciplined militia, and his name was well known and respected, and another body of reserve hovered in the neighbourhood of Montreal, which was the residence of Monsieur de Vaudreuil, governor-general of Canada. With respect to General Amherst’s state of the plan, the town of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point stood in his way. The enemy were masters of the lake Champlain, and possessed the strong fort of Chambly, by the fall of the river Richelieu, that defended the route to the river St. Lawrence. Even had these objects been removed, it might have been doubted whether he and Mr. Wolfe should move at Quebec in the same instant of time. The first that reached it, far from being in a condition to undertake the siege of Quebec, would have run the risk of being engaged and defeated by the covering army; in which case, the other body must have been exposed to the imminent hazard of destruction in the midst of an enemy’s country, far distant from any place of safety to which it could retreat. Had the disasters happened, (and, according to the experience of war, they were the natural consequences of the scheme,) the troops at Niagara would, in all probability, have fallen an easy prey to the other, with the whole of the United States; and as they receive intelligence time enough to accomplish their retreat before they could be intercepted. The design would, we apprehend, have been more justifiable, or at least not so liable to objection, had Mr. Amherst left two or three regiments to protect the frontiers of New York and, joining Mr. Wolfe with the rest, sailed up the river St. Lawrence to besiege Quebec. Even in that case the whole number of his troops would not have been sufficient, according to the practice of war, to invest the place, and cope with the covering army. Nevertheless, had the enterprise succeeded, Montcalm must either have hazarded an engagement against great odds, or retired further into the country; that which would have been open by land and water to Montreal, which could have made little resistance. The two principal towns being taken, and the navigation of the river St. Lawrence blocked up, all the defeated forces were surrendered, at discretion, except Niagara, which there was a bare possibility of supplying, at an incredible trouble and expense, from the distant Mississippi; but, even then, it might have been beset in form, and easily reduced. Whatever defects there might have been in this plan, it was considered as the only practicable one, in some essential points, was attended with surprising success. The same good fortune that prospered the British arms so remarkably in the conquest of Guadeloupe, seemed to attend the British arms in their siege of Quebec, the siege of which we shall record in its proper place. At present, we must attend the operations of General Amherst, whose separate army was first in motion, though such impediments were thrown in his way as greatly retarded the progress of his operations; impediments said to have arisen from the pride, insolence, and obstinacy of certain individuals, who pressed forward without command in that part of the world, and employed it all to thwart the service of their country.

§ XV. While the general superintended the repairs of Ticonderoga, and the men were employed in preparing batteaux and other vessels, his scouting parties lowered in the neighbourhood of Crown-Point, in order to watch the motions of the enemy. From one of these detachments he received intelligence, on the first day of August, that the enemy had reembarked on the Crown-Point, and detached a body of riflemen before him to take possession of the place: then he embarked with the rest of the army; and on the fourth day of the month landed at the fort, where the troops were immediately encamped. His next care was to lay the foundation of a new fort, to be maintained for the further security of the British dominions in that part of the country; and particularly for preventing the inroads of scuttling parties, by whom the plantations had been dreadfully infested. Here information was received that the enemy had retreated to the Isle aux Noix, at the other end of the lake Champlain, five leagues on the right side of the lake, that their garrison at Crown-Point had been reembarked in the fort that was left by the command of M. de Burlemagne, consisted of three battalions and five piquets of regular troops, with Canadians and marines, amounting in the whole to three thousand five hundred effective men, provided with a considerable artillery; and that the lake was occupied by four large vessels, mounted with cannon, and manned with piquets of different regiments under the command and direction of M. Le Ber, a captain in the French navy, assisted by M. de Rigal, and other sea officers. In consequence of this information, General Amherst, who had for some time employed Captain Loring to superintend the building of vessels at Ticonderoga, being resolved to have the superiority on the lake, directed the captain to build with all possible expedition a sloop of sixteen guns and a radeau eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying six large cannon. These, together with a brigantine, being finished, victualled, and manned by the eleven day of October, the general embarked with the whole of the troops in batteaux, in order to attack the enemy; but next day, the weather growing tempestuous, was obliged to take shelter in a bay on the western shore, where the men were quartered for the night. It was during this time, Captain Loring, with his small squadron, sailing down the lake, gave chase to a French schooner, and drove three of their ships into a bay, where two of them were sunk, and only one escaped. The vessel which escaped: one, however, was repaired and brought away by Captain Loring, so that now the French had but one schooner remaining. General Amherst, after having been some days wind-bound, re-embarked his forces, and proceeded down the lake; but the storm, which had also been high, with renewed fury, so agitated the swell the waves mountain high, the season for action being elapsed, and winter setting in with the most rigorous severity, he saw the impossibility of accomplishing his design, and resolved to withdraw to the sheltered bay where he had been sheltered, he landed the troops, and began his march for Crown-Point, where he arrived on the twenty-first day of October. Having secured a superiority on the lake, he now employed all his attempts in supporting the garrison of Crown-Point, together with three small outposts for its better defence; in opening roads of communication with Ticonderoga, and the governments of Massachusetts's and New Hampshire; and in making dispositions for the winter-quarters of his troops, so as to protect the country from the inroads of the enemy.

§ XVI. During this whole summer he received not the least intelligence of Mr. Wolfe's operations, except a few hints in some letters relating to the exchange of prisoners, that came from the French general, Montcalm, who gave him to understand that Mr. Wolfe had landed in the neighborhood of Quebec, and seemed determined to undertake the siege of that city; that he had honoured him (the French general) with several notes, sometimes couched in a soothing strain, sometimes filled with threats; that the French army intended to give him battle, and a few days were not to be considered as the last of the campaign. As Amherst was ignorant of the proceedings of the Quebec squadron, his communication continued open with the forces which undertook the siege of Niagara; and he received an account of their success before he had quitted the lines of Ticonderoga. General Prideaux, with his body of troops, reinforced by the Indian auxiliaries under Sir William Johnston, advanced to the cataract of Niagara, without being stopped by the least opposition on the march; and investing the French fortress about the middle of July, carried on his approaches with great vigour till the twentieth day of that month, when, visiting the trenches, he was unfortunately slain by the bursting of a cannon. Mr. Amherst was no sooner informed of his disaster, than he detached Brigadier-General Gage from Ticonderoga, to assume the command of that army. In the meantime, it devolved on Sir William Johnston, who happily prosecuted the plan of his predecessor with all the success that could have been desired. The enemy, alarmed with the apprehension of losing a place of such importance, resolved to exert their endeavours for its relief. They assembled a body of considerable force, amounting to eight hundred men, drawn from Detroit, Varenno, and Presque Isle; and these, with a number of Indian auxiliaries, were detached under the command of Monstre D'Aubry, on an attempt to reinforce the garrison of Niagara. Sir William Johnston; whose personal bravery and intelligence, made him the most proper man to intercept them in their march. In the even- ing he ordered the light infantry and pikets to post themselves to the left, on the road leading from Niagara falls to the fortress; these were reinforced in the morning with the grenadiers, and part of the forty-sixth regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Massey; and another regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Farquhar, was posted at the left of the works, in order to support the guard of the trenches. About eight in the morning, the enemy being in sight, the Indians in the English army advanced to speak with their countrymen who served under the French banners; but this conference was declined by the enemy. Then the French Indians having uttered the horrid scream called the war whoop, which, by this time, had lost effect among the British forces, the enemy began the action with impetuously; but they met with such a hot reception in front, while the Indian auxiliaries fell upon their flanks, that in a little more than half an hour their whole army was routed, their general, with all his officers, taken, and the pursuit continued through the woods for several miles, with considerable slaughter. This battle, which was fought on the twenty-fourth day of July, was seen in sight of the French garrison at Niagara. Sir William Johnston sent Major Hervyewith a trump- et to the commanding officer, to present him with a list of seventeen officers taken in the engagement, and to ex- hort him to surrender before more blood was shed, while the French commander had not yet made his demand, having certified himself of the truth, by sending an officer to visit the prisoners, agreed to treat, and in a few hours the capitulation was ratified. The garrison, consisting of about two thousand men, surrendered to the order of battle, and the French general, having done honor to the honor of his country, and capacity of the Indians. All the women were con- ducted, at their own request, to Montreal; and the sick and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling, were treated with humanity. This was the second com- plete victory obtained on the continent of North America, in the course of the same war, by Sir William Johnston, who, without the help of a military education, succeeded so signal in the field by dint of innate courage and nat- ural sagacity. What remarkably characterizes these bat- tles, is the circumstance of his having taken in both the commanders of the enemy. Indeed, the war in general may be distinguished by the sagacity of this gent- leman and the celebrated Lord Clive, two self-made generals: who, by a series of shining actions, have de- monstrated that unpurchased genius can, by its own in- ternal light and efficacy, rival, if not eclipse, the acquired art of European generals. It was not more serviceable to his country by his valour and conduct in the field, than by the influence and authority which his justice, benevolence, and integrity had acquired among the Indian tribes of the Six Nations, who, not only assembled at Niagara to the number of eleven hun- dred, but also restrained within the bounds of good order and moderation.

A few days after the evacuation of the garrison of Niagara, the possession of Crown-Point, was expelled without much more ease than the conquest of Quebec, the great object to which all these operations were subordinate. Of that we now come to give the detail, fraught with singular adventures and surprising events, in the course of which a noble spirit of enterprise was displayed, and the scenes of war were exhibited to all the variety of desolation. It was about the middle of February, that a considerable squadron sailed from England for Cape Breton, under the command of Admirals Saunders and Holmes, two gentlemen of worth and probity, who had, on several occasions, signa- lized their courage and conduct in the service of their country. The squadron, under the command of Captain Grey, was formed of sixty ships of war, and was in sight of Louisbourg; but the harbour was blocked up with ice in such a manner, that they were obliged to bear away for Halifax in Nova Scotia. From hence Rear-Admiral Durell was detached, with a small squadron, to sail up the river St. John, and to design, under the protection of the enemy, to intercept any supplies from France intended for Quebec; he accordingly took two storeships; but he was anticipated by seventeen sail, laden with provision, stores, and some recruits, under convoy of three frigates, which had already reached the capital of Canada. Meanwhile, Admiral Saunder- s arrived at Louisbourg; and the troops being embarked, to the number of eight thousand, proceeded up the river without delay. The operations by land were in- tended to the conduct of Major-General James Wolfe, whose talents had shone with such superior lustre at the siege of Louisbourg; and his subordinates in command were the Brigadiers Monckton, Townsend, and Murry; all in the flower of the third age, who had studied the military art with equal eagerness and proficiency, and, though young in years, were old in experience. The first was a soldier by descent, the son of Major-General Wolfe, a veteran officer of acknowledged capacity; the other two resembled each other, not only in years, qualifications, and station, but also in family rank, all three being the sons of noblemen. The situation of Brigadier Townsend was singular: he had served several years in the last war with reputa- tion, and was regarded as more capable of distinguishing himself in service than any other officer in the army. There was no disdain at some hard usage he had sustained from his superiors. That his military talents, however, might not be lost to his country, he exercised them with equal spirit.
and perseverance in projecting and promoting the plan of a national militia. When the command and direction of the army devolved to a new leader, so predominant in his breast was the spirit of patriotism and sense of glory, that he was keenly sensitive to a British peerage, postured to the people of a very affable fortune, remarkably dear to his acquaintance, and solicited to a life of quiet by every allurement of domestic felicity, he arrived at these considerations: he burst from all entanglements: proffered his services to his sovereign; exposed himself to the perils of a disagreeable voyage, the rigours of a severe climate, and the hazard of a campaign peculiarly fraught with toil, danger, and difficulty.

§ V. He then proceeded for Quebec sailed up the river St. Lawrence, without having met with any interruption, or having perceived any of those difficulties and perils with which it had been reported that the navigation of it was attended. Their good fortune in this particular, indeed, was owing to some excellent charts of the river, which had been found in vessels taken from the enemy. About the latter end of June, the land forces were disembarked in two divisions upon the isle of Orleans, which lies below Quebec, a large fertile island, well cultivated, producing plenty of grain, abounding with people, villages, and plantations. General Wolfe, no sooner landed on the island of Orleans, than he distributed a message, full of dignity with few words, in which he and the inhabitants completely all the Canadien of the locality capable of bearing arms, and several tribes of savages. With this army he had taken the field to redress a very advantageous treatment left to America. He declared it was not against the industrious peasants, their wives and children, nor against the ministers of religion, that he intended to make war; on the contrary, he declared his main aim was to keep these and all their depredations; and promised to maintain them in their temporal possessions, as well as in the free exercise of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the contrary part, and that he would preserve the English that the English were masters of the river St. Lawrence, so as to intercept all succours from Europe; and had, besides, a powerful army on the continent, under the command of General Amherst. He affirmed that the solution they ought to take was neither difficult nor horrible; and that the utmost exertion of their valour would be useless, and serve only to deprive them of the advantages which they might enjoy in the relations between the two nations. He declared in this manner to the inhabitants of the Indies of Great Britain in America, would excuse the most severe reprisals; but Britons were too generous to follow such barbarous examples. He again offered to the Canadians the terms of surrender to Mr. Carleton, with a view of war, and left it to themselves to determine their fate by their own conduct. He expressed his hope that the world would do him justice, should they oblige him, by rejecting these advantageous terms, to adopt violent measures. He expatiated upon the strength and power, as well as upon the generosity, of Great Britain, in thus stretching out the hand of humanity; a hand ready to assist them on all occasions, even when France was, by her weakness, compelled to abandon them in the most critical conjuncture. This declaration produced no immediate effect; nor indeed did the Canadians depend upon the sincerity and promissed fidelity of the English. He had innocently represented as the most savage and cruel enemy on earth. Possessed of these notions, which prevailed even among the better sort, they chose to abandon their habitations, and expose themselves and families to certain ruin, in provoking the English by the most cruel hostilities, rather than be quiet, and confide in the general's promise of protection. Instead of pursuing this prudent plan of conduct, they joined the scalping parties of Indians which the most of them had induced or insti-

1 The operation of scalping, which, to the shame of both nations, was once aécuadcly common, and sometimes the result of well-merited revenge, is now, happily, in as little practice as a punishment. The scalp is cut off, not the head; the bandage is tied round the upper part of the head, and torn off with the scalp in the act of being cut. The operation is performed with a knife that has been blunted and sharpened by use, and receives a premium for each from the nation under whose banner it has been achieved.
divers large ships lost their anchors. The enemy resolving to take advantage of the confusion which they imagined must have arisen among the prepared transports, produced fire-ships; and at midnight sent them down from Quebec among the transports, which lay so thick as to cover the whole surface of the river. The scheme, though well conceived, and seasonably executed, was entirely defeated by the discipline of the British admiral, and the dexterity of his mariners, who roundly botched the fire-ships, and tossed them fast aground, where they burning to the water's edge, without having done the least prejudice to the enemy's operations. On the succeeding day, they burnt the contents. this, and sent down a raft of fire-ships, or radeaux, which were likewise consumed without producing any effect.

§ XXI The works for the security of the hospital and the stores, on the island of Orleans, being finished, the British forces crossed the north channel in boats; and, landing under cover of two slopes, encamped on the side of the river of Montmorency, which divided them from the left of the enemy. Next morning a company of rangers, posted in a wood to cover some workmen, were attacked by the French Indians, and totally defeated; however, the nearest troops advancing, repelled the Indians in their turn, with a considerable loss. In this battle General Wolfe to choose this situation by the falls of Montmorency, in which he was divided from Quebec by this, and another river called St Charles, he explained in a well selected situation of state ground which he had chosen was high, and in some measure commanded the opposite side on which the enemy was posted; that there was a ford below the falls, passable in every tide for some hours at the latter part of the ebb and beginning of the flood; and he hoped that means might be found of passing the river higher up, so as to fight the Marquis de Montcalm upon less disadvantageous terms than those of directly attacking his intrenchments. Accordingly, his rangers and the river Montmorency, a ford was discovered about three miles above; but the opposite banks, which were naturally steep and covered with woods, the enemy had intrenched in such a manner, as to render it almost inaccessible. The escort was twice attacked by the Indians, who were as often repulsed; but these encounters cost the English about forty men killed and wounded, including some officers. Some shrived objectations might be started to the general's choice of ground on this occasion. He could not act at all without passing the river Montmorency at a very great disadvantage, and attacking an enemy superior to himself in number, secured by redoubts and intrenchments. Had he even, by dint of extensive fire, driven them from the strong positions he might have sought, the success must have cost him a great number of officers and men; and the enemy might have retreated behind the river St Charles, which he also must have passed under the same considerations, before the redoubts, where his previous operations against the city of Quebec. Had his good fortune enabled him to surmount all these difficulties, and after all to defeat the enemy in a pitched battle, the garrison of Quebec might have been reinforced by the shock of their army; and he could not, with any probability of success, have undertaken the siege of an extensive fortified place, which he had not troops sufficient to invest, and whose garrison would have been nearly equal in number to the sum total of the troops he commanded. At the rate, the chance of a fair engagement in the open field was what he had little reason to expect in that situation, from the known experience, and the apparent conduct, of the French general. These objections appeared so obvious and important, that General Wolfe would not determine to risk an attack until he had surveyed the upper part of the river St. Lawrence, in hopes of finding some place more favourable for a descent.

§ XXII. On the eighteenth day of July, the admiral, at his request, sent two ships of war, two armed sloops, and some transports with troops on board, up the river; and they passed the city of Quebec, without having sustained any injury. The general, being aware of this little armament, carefully observed the banks on the side of the enemy, which were extremely difficult from the nature of the ground; and these difficulties were redoubled by the beacon fire which would be sent upon the redoubts, to intimate to the enemy the place to which he was informed a great number of the inhabitants of Quebec had retired with their most valuable effects. This service was performed with little loss; and some two hundred and eighty of the French were discovered. The general, thus disappointed in his expectation, returned to Montmorency, where the Brigadier Townsend had, by maintaining a superior fire across that river, prevented the enemy from creasing a battery, which would have commanded the English camp; and now he resolved to attack them, though posted to gain advantage, and every where prepared to give him a warm reception. His design was, first to reduce a detached redoubt, close to the water's edge, seemingly situated without getting shot of the intrenchment on the hill. Should this fortification be supported by the enemy, he foresaw that he should be able to bring on a general engagement; on the contrary, should they retire from it, he thought this would induce them to afterwards examine their situation at leisure, and determine the place at which they could be most easily attacked. Preparations were accordingly made for storming the redoubt next morning. The left of the Charles was driven away; a detachment of the part of Brigadier Montcalon's brigade was embarked in the boats of the fleet, to be transported from the point of Levi. The two brigades, commanded by the Brigadiers Townsend and Murray, were drawn out, in order to pass the ford when it should be necessary. To facilitate their passage, the admiral had stationed the Centurion ship of war in the channel, to check the fire of the lower battery, by which the ford was commanded: a numerous train of artillery was placed in the river Montmorency, to flake the left of the enemy's intrenchment; and two flat-bottomed armed vessels, prepared for the purpose, were run aground near the redoubt, to favour the descent of the forces. The manifest confusion produced among the French by these previous measures, and by the fire of the Centurion, which was well directed and sustained, determined Mr. Wolfe to storm this intrenchment without further delay. Orders were issued that the three brigadiers should put their troops in motion at a certain signal, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide. Many of the boats from Point Levi ran aground upon a ledge that runs off a considerable distance from the shore; and their passengers, being disembarked, were met by a severe fire of shot and shell; and the general person sounding the shore, pointed out the place where the troops must disembark with the least difficulty. Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred men of the second American battalion, were the first who landed. They had received orders to form in four distinct bodies, and begin the attack, supported by the corps of Brigadier Monckton, as soon as the other troops should have passed the ford, and be near enough to contribute to the success of the disembarkation. These instructions, however, were entirely neglected. Before M. Monckton had landed, and while Brigadier Townsend was on his march to a considerable distance, the grenadiers, without waiting to be drawn up in a regular form, impetuously rushed towards the enemy's intrenchments in the utmost disorder. Their courage served only to increase their misfortune. The first fire they received did such execution among them, that they were obliged to shelter themselves behind the redoubt and the battery, which had abandoned at their approach. In this uncomfortable situation they remained some time, unable to form under so hot a fire, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of many gallant officers, who laboured in vain even that they might be in the honourable discharge of their duty.
The third effort was more fortunate. He made a sudden descent at Chambud, and burned a considerable magazine, filled with arms, clothing, provision, and ammunition. The enemy's ships being secured in such a manner as not to be approached, and nothing else occurring that required the brigadier's decision, the attack was continued with intelligence and determination. The dismay which the fort of Nagara was taken, Crown-Point abandoned; and General Amherst employed in making preparations to attack the corps at the fort was a source of great mortification to the Montmorency.

The disaster of the allies at Montmorency made a deep impression on the mind of General Wolfe, whose spirit was too great to brook the most distressing prospect of censure or disgrace. He kept the consummation of his plans secret, and the English people—rash, impatient, and capricious; elevated to exaltation by the least gleam of success, objected even to despondency by the most incomprehensible frown of adverse fortune; sangrii, even to childish hyperbole, in applauding those servants of the public who have prospered in their undertakings; clamorous to a degree of persecution, against those who have miscarried in their undertakings, without any investigation of merit, without any consideration of circumstances, judging of others by the sample of their own failures with the shame of disappointment, and the eager desire to retrieve the laurel that he might by some be supposed to have lost at the falls of Montmorency, and the disaster of the allies there; and the whole excitement of an internal agitation, which visibly affected his external frame, and disordered his whole constitution, which was naturally delicate and tender. Among those who shared his confidence, he was supposed to be nearly dead. The final defeat at the river St. Charles still remained to be passed, before the town could be invested.

§ XXIII. Immediately after this mortifying check, in which the arms of the expedition were lost, and an important number of the officers, were lost, the general detached Brigadier Murray; with twelve hundred men, in transports, above the town, to cooperate with Rear-Admiral Holmes, whom the admiral had up with some force against the French shipping, which he hoped to destroy. The brigadier was likewise instructed to seize every opportunity of fighting the enemy's detachments, and even provoking them to battle. In pursuance of these directions, he attempted to land on the north shore; but these attempts were unsuccessful.

them, if possible, to an engagement. This measure, however, was not adopted, until the general and admiral had reconnoitred the town of Quebec, with a view to a general assault; and concluded, from their own observations, reinforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, who was present, that the operations of all was disposed of in such a manner that such an attack could not be hazarded with any pros-spect of success. The ships of war, indeed, might have silenced the batteries of the lower town, but they could not have repulsed the enemy, if they had to maintain a prolonged action; for they must have sustained considerable damage. When we consider the situation of this place, and the fortifications with which it was secured; the natural strength of the country; the great number of French officers and men; and the preparedness of the defence of the river; the skill, valour, superior force, and uncommon vigilance of the enemy; their numerous bodies of savages continually hovering about the posts of the English, to surprise parties and harry detachments; we must own that there was such a combination of difficulties as might have discouraged and perplexed the most resolute and intelligent commander.

§ XXV. In consequence of the resolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci, the troops and artillery were re-embarked and landed at Point Levi; they afterwards passed up the river in transports; while Admiral Holmes made a movement with his ships, to amuse the enemy posted on the passage. The river was crowded with vessels; and the men being landed, the general ordered one half of them to be landed for refreshment on the other side of the river. As no possibility appeared of annoying the enemy above the town, the order was revoked; and this was fortunately so. A plan was conceived for conveying the troops further down in boats, and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond, in hopes of ascending the heights of Abraham, which was a steep ascent from the bank and that of the river, that they might take possession of the ground at the back of the city, where it was but indifferently fortified. The dangers and difficulties attending the execution of this plan were so peculiarly alarming, that we might imagine it could not have been embraced, but by a spirit of enterprise that braved on desperation. The stream was rapid; the shore shelving; the bank of the river lined with sentinels; the landing place so narrow; to be easily missed in the dark; and the ground so difficult as hardly to be summited in the day-time, had no opposition been expected. If the enemy had received the least intimation from spy or deserter, or even suspected the scheme; had the embarkation been discovered in the course of the darkness of the night, the rapidity of the river, or the shelving nature of the north shore, near which they were ordered to row; had one sentinel been alarmed, or had a thousand wild and suspicious minds; the heights of Abraham must have been instantly secured by such a force as would have rendered the undertaking abortive; confusion would necessarily have ensued in the dark; and this would have naturally produced a panic, which might have proved fatal to the greater part of the detachment. These objections could not escape the penetration of the gallant Wolfe, who nevertheless adopted the plan without hesitation, and even executed it in person; though at that time labouring under a severe dysentery and fever, which had exhausted his constitution, and reduced him almost to an extremity of weakness. The previous steps being taken, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, Admiral

Holmes moved with his squadron further up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the disembarkation, that he might deceive the amance, and amuse M. de Boisginville, whom Montcalm had detached with a body of horsemen to watch the motions of that squadron; but the English admiral had fixed the enemy a little higher up the river in the night, so as to protect the landing of the forces; and these orders be punctually fulfilled. On the twelfth day of September, an hour after midnight, the first embarkation of the troops was made, with Major-General Wolfe, who commanded the French forces, the two regiments of grenadiers, commanded by Colonel Howe, a detachment of highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the officers of the English troops. The boats were crowded to such an extent that they must have been difficultly got off. The grenadiers accompanied them in person, and was among the first who landed; and they began to fall down with the tide, to the intended place of disembarkation; rowing close to the Horn shore, in order to find it the more easily. Without any disorder the boats glideed gently along; but by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkness of the night, the boats overshot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place at which the disembarkation was intended.

As the troops landed, the boats were sent back for the second embarkation, which was superintended by Brigadier Towendsh. In the meantime, Colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the highlanders, ascended the woody pro-pinquity and attacked the French, and made two attacks on a line of the enemy, one of which was defended by a sergeant's guard, which defended a small entrenched narrow path, by which alone the rest of the forces could reach the summit. Then they mounted without further resistance the ascent of Abraham, which was defended by a body of about a hundred and a battery; and began his march without delay, after having collected his whole force from the side of Beauport.

§ XXVI. General Wolfe, perceiving the enemy crossing the river, and the plan of marching, that he conceived would imagine it could not have been embraced, but by a spirit of enterprise that braved on desperation. The stream was rapid; the shore shelving; the bank of the river lined with sentinels; the landing place so narrow; to be easily missed in the dark; and the ground so diffi-

Then they mounted without further resistance the ascent of Abraham, which was defended by a body of about a hundred and a battery; and began his march without delay, after having collected his whole force from the side of Beauport.

§ XXVI. General Wolfe, perceiving the enemy crossing the river, and the plan of marching, that he conceived single gun which the English seamen made shift to draw up from the landing place. This was very well served, and galled their column severely. At length, about nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great orders, consisting of five hundred and fifteen men of effectual. On the contrary, the British forces reserved their shot until the French had approached within forty yards of their line; then they poured in a terrible discharge; and cut down in a few minutes as many of the French as as could not fail to produce a very considerable effect.

General Wolfe was stationed on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment and the Louisbourg grenadiers, where the enemy appeared in the greatest force. At the front of the line, he had been aimed at by the enemy's marksman, and received a shot in the wrist, which however did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped a handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the least emotion; and advanced at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed; when another ball unfortunately pierced the breast of this young hero, who fell in the arms of victory, just as the enemy gave way.

At this very instant, every separate regiment of the British army seemed to exert itself for the honour of its own peculiar caracter. While the right pressed on with their bayonets, Brigadier Murray briskly advanced with the troops of the third regiment, and was immediately in the enemy; then the highlanders, drawing their broad swords, fell in among them with irresistible impetuosity, and drove them with great slaughter into the town, and the works they had raised at the bridge, of the river St. Charles.
On the left, the day of action now came to a violent. Some of the light infantry had thrown themselves into houses; where, being attacked, they defended themselves with great courage and resolution. Colonel Howe having taken post with two companies behind a small copse, sallied out frequently on the flanks of the enemy, during this attack, and often drove them into heaps; while Brigadier Townshend advanced placidly against their front, with the bayonet, and kept the enemy prevented from executing their first intention. The brigadier himself remained with Amherst's regiment, to support this disposition, and to overawe a body of savages posted opposite to the light infantry, waiting for an opportunity to fall upon the British army. General Wolfe being slain, and at the same time Mr. Monkton dangerously wounded at the head of Lascelles' regiment, where he distinguished himself with remarkable gallantry, the command devolved on Mr. Holme, who stood behind Cape Rouge, and finding the troops disordered in the pursuit, formed them again with all possible expedition. This necessary task was scarcity performed, when M. de Bougainville, with a body of two hundred and fifty men, threw himself with the English. He had begun his march from Cape Rouge, as soon as he received intelligence that the British troops had gained the heights of Abraham, but did not come up in time to have any share in the battle. Mr. Townshend immediately ordered two batallions, with two pieces of artillery, to advance against this officer; who retired, at their approach, among woods and swamps, where General Townshend very wisely declined hazarding a precarious attack. He had already obtained a complete victory, taken a great number of French officers, and was possessed of a very advantageous situation, which it would have been imprudent to forgo. The French general, M. de Montcalm, was mortally wounded in the battle, and conveyed unto Quebec; from whence, before he died, he wrote a letter to General Townshend, recommending the prisoners to that generous humanity by which the British nation is distinguished. His second in command was left wounded on the field; and next day expeired on board an English ship, to which he had been conveyed. About one thousand of the enemy were made prisoners, including a great number of officers; and about five hundred were slain on the field of battle. The wreck of the French troops, they had reinforced the garrison of Quebec, retired to Point-a-Trebumble; from whence they proceeded to Jacques Quettres, where they remained entrenched until they were compelled by the severity of the weather to make the best of their way to Troyes Rivieres and Montreal. This important victory was obtained at the expense of fifty men killed, including nine officers; and of one hundred and fifty prisoners.

The death of General Wolfe was a national loss, universally lamented. He inherited from nature an animating fervour of sentiment, an intuitive perception, an extensive capacity, and a passion for glory, which stimulated him to acquire every species of military knowledge that study could comprehend, that actual service could illustrate and confirm.
This noble warmath of disposition seldom fails to call forth the generous emotions, and unfold the sentiments of the heart. In his estimation of danger, he was also generous, gentle, complacent, and humane; the pattern of the officer, the darling of the soldier: there was a sublimity in his genius which soared above the pitch of ordinary minds; and had his faculties been exercised to their full extent by opportunity and action, had his judgment been fully matured by age and experience, he would without doubt have rivaled in reputation the most celebrated captains of antiquity.

§ XVII. Immediately after the battle of Quebec, Admiral Saunders, who, together with his subordinate durell and Holmes, had all along co-operated heartily with the land forces for the advantage of the service, sent up all their fleet and artillery, and with artillery and forces, was present at the capitulation, which took place on the seventeenth day of the month sailed up, with all the ships of war, in a disposition to attack the lower town, while the upper part should be assaulted by General Townshend. This gentleman had employed the time from the left action, in forming a military road for the cannon, in drawing up the artillery, preparing batteries, and cutting off the enemy's communication with the country. On the seventeenth, before the first battery could be finished, a flag of truce was sent from the town with proposals of capitulation; which, being maturely considered by the general and admiral, were accepted, and signed at eight next morning. They granted the more favourable terms, as the enemy continued to humble in the rear of the British army; as the season was become wet, stormy, and cold, threatening the troops with sickness, and the fleet with accident, and as a considerable advantage would result from taking possession of the place and the town were in a state of defence. What rendered the capitulation still more fortunate for the British was, the informations he afterwards received from deserters that the enemy had rallied, and were reinforced in force by two other battalions; and that M. de Bourgo-aville, at the head of eight hundred men, with a convoy of provisions, was actually on the march through the province, in order to join the town.\footnote{When the troops took Quebec, the French had as many men as they ran; they ran.} Who ran? cross the gallant Wolfe, with great
 history of the neighbourhood, with which their communication continued open; the season was so far advanced, that the British forces in a little time must have been forced to desist by the severity of the weather, and even reture with their fleet before the approach of winter, which never fails to freeze up the river St. Lawrence.

§ XXVIII. Immediately after the action at the falls of Montmorenci, General Wolfe had despatched an officer to England, to acquaint the Secretary of War with the disaster of the day, and with the necessity which that disaster rendered of an immediate and energetic effort to relieve the garrison. Lord Sandwich assisted in the campaign, and concerted with the generals of the fleet an attempt to strike all other stroke of importance for the accomplishment of their hope, which had aspired at the absolute conquest of Canada. The first transports of their chagrin were not yet subsided, when Colonel Halkett arrived in the ship Alcide, with an account of the victory and surrender of Quebec; which was immediately communicated to the people in an extraordinary gazette. The joy which this excitement amongst the populace, rose in proportion to the despondence which the former had produced: all was rapture and not; all was triumph and exultation, mingled with the praise of the all-accomplished Wolfe, which they exalted even to a ridiculous degree of splendor and adoration. The King expressed his satisfaction by conferring the honour of knighthood upon Captain Douglas, whose ship brought the first tidings of this success; and gratified him and Colonel Halkett with considerable presents. A day or two after this event was a public procession through all the dominions of Great Britain. The city of London, the universities, and many other corporations of the kingdom, presented congratulatory addresses to his majesty. The parliament was called together to the same effect of state, and the House of Commons, expatiated upon the successes of the campaign, the transcendent merit of the deceased general, the conduct and courage of the admirals and officers who assisted in the exploit, and the consequences of this war. This day, the motion and the manner in which it was succeeded, the House unanimously resolved to present an address, deeming his majesty would ordain a monument to be erected in Westminster abbey to the memory of Major-General Wolfe: at the same time they passed another resolution, that the thanks of the House should be given to the surviving generals and admirals employed in the glorious and successful expedition in Quebec. Testimonies of this kind, while they reflect honour upon the character of the nation, never fail to animate individuals to a spirited exertion of their talents in the service of the public. The people of England were so elevated by the astonishing success of the expedition, and the consideration of the great event that had taken place, and the continent of Europe, that, far from expressing the least sense of the enormous burdens which they bore, they, with a spirit peculiar to the British nation, voluntarily raised large contributions in purchase warm jackets, stockings, shoes, coats, and blankets for the soldiers, who were exposed to the rigours of an inclement sky in Germany and America. But they displayed a more noble proof of unrestrained benevolence, extended even to foes. The French ministry, strained in their finances, which were found scarcely sufficient to maintain the war, had sacrificed their duty to their king, and every sentiment of compassion for his unhappy subjects, to a thirst of vengeance, and avaricious views of ambition. They had withdrawn the usual allowance from their subjects who were detained prisoners in England; and those wretched creatures, amounting in number to near twenty thousand, were left to the mercy of those enemies whom their sovereign had taken such pains to exasperate. The allowance with which they were indulged by the British government effectually secured them from the horrors of famine; but still they remained hopeless of hope, of substenance, and particularly exposed to the miseries of cold and nakedness. The generous English beheld these forlorn cages with sentiments of sympathy and compassion: they considered them as the representatives of the wretched and helpless in human society, and in a few weeks they were completely clothed by the charity of their British benefactors. This beneficent exertion was certainly one of the noblest triumphs of the human mind, which even the most inveterate enemies of Great Britain cannot consistently have considered, much less have experienced; the city of Quebec being reduced, together with great part of the circumjacent country, Brigadier Townsend, who had accepted his commission with the express proviso that he should return to England at the end of the campaign, left a garrison of three thousand five hundred effective men, victualled from the fleet, under the command of Brigadier Murray; and, enlisting with Admiral Saunders, arrived in Great Britain about the beginning of winter. As for Brigadier Halkett, he repaired to New York, where he happily recovered from his wound.
English detachments entrenched around the garrison; and with in the hour a grand sally was made, under the command of Colonel Draper, a gallant officer, who signalled himself and contractors, the officers and men of the regiment of Lorrain with great impetuosity; and in all probability would have beaten them off, had they not been sustained by the arrival of a fresh brigade. After a very wager, the attempt was repulsed: nineteen pieces of cannon, with one hundred and forty-two men, were killed on one side, Colonel Draper was obliged to retreat, not altogether satisfied with the conduct of his grenadiers. As the garrison of Madras was not very numerous, nothing further was attempted on their side without a long preparation being made, in which their diligence in erecting batteries against the fort and town; which being opened on the sixth day of January, they maintained a continual discharge of shot and shells for twenty days, advancing their trenches all the time under cover of this fire, until they reached the breast of the glacis. There they erected a battery of four pieces of canon, and opened it on the last day of the month; but for five days successively they were obliged to close their embrasures by the superior fire of the fort, and at length to abandon it entirely: nevertheless, they still maintained a severe fire from the first grand battery, which was placed at the distance of four hundred and fifty yards from the defensive walls, and was composed of twenty-six pieces of cannon, three mortars, and effect an inconsiderable breach. Perhaps they might have had more success, had they battered in breach from the begining of the attack. After this, Colonel Preston, who was ordered to attack by the grand battery, had cruel bombardments of the town; and he dissolved the houses: he was, however, happily disappointed in his expectation by the wise and resolute precautions of Governor Pegu; by the vigilance, conduct, and bravery of the Colonel Laurence and Draper, accompanied by the valour and activity of Major Bretenot, and the spirit of the inferior officers. The artillery of the garrison was so well managed, that from the fifth day of February, the fire of the enemy gradually became weaker, and a large part of the eastern defence; nevertheless, they advanced their sap along the seaside, so as to embrace entirely the north-east angle of the covered way, from whence their musketry drove the besieged. They likewise endeavoured to open a passage into the ditch by a mine; but sprang it so injudiciously, that they could make no advantage of it, as it lay exposed to the fire of several cannon. While these preparations were carried on before the town, Major Cahill and Captain Pascal were employed behind the fort, with some of the English contractors, and a few Europeans drawn from the English garrisons of Trichennapally and Chingalaupur, hasted at the distance of a few miles, blocking up the roads in such a manner that they could not be used by the detachments against them, in order to open the communication: thus the progress of the siege was in a great measure retarded. On the sixteenth day of February, in the evening, the Queenborough ship of war, commanded by Captain Kempenfeld, and the company's ship the Revenge, arrived in the road of Madras, with a reinforcement of six hundred men belonging to Colonel Draper's regiment, and part of them was immediately disembarked. From the beguins of the siege the enemy had discovered a backwardness in the service, very unsuitable to their national character. They were ill supplied by their commissaries with provisions, even for the garrison and contractors, and had recourse to the plunder of the country for the defence of the garrison, and all their hope of success vaished at the arrival of this reinforcement. After a brisk fire, they raised the siege that very night, abandoning forty cannon and 150 pieces of ordnance, and burning several powder mills at Onopore, retreated to the territory of Arcoot.

§ 11. M. Lally having weakened his forces that were at Masulipatam, under the conduct of the Marquis de Con-fians, in order to strengthen the army with which he un-took the siege of Madras, the Rajah of Vizagapatam drove the French garrison from Vizagapatam, and hoisted English colours in the place. The marquis having put his troops in motion to revenge this insult, the rajah solicited support from Colonel Olville at Calcutta; and, with the consent of the council, a body of troops was sent under the command of Colonel Forde to his assistance. They consisted of five hundred Europeans, including a company of artillery, and sixteen hundred sepoys; with about fifteen pieces of cannon, one howitzer, and three mortars. The forces of Conflans were much more considerable. On the twentieth day of October Colonel Forde arrived at Vizagapatam, and made an agreement with the rajah, who, being obliged to pay for the expense of the march, either he should be put in possession of Rajamundry, a large and town and fort possessed by the French. It was stipulated that he should have all the inland country belonging to the English powers, and the French armies were to be in arms; and that the English company should retain all the conquered sea-coast from Vizagapatam to Masulipa-tam. On the first of November Colonel Forde proceeded on his march; and on the third joined the rajah's army, consisting of between three and four thousand men. On the third of December they came in sight of the enemy, near the village of Tallapool; but the French declining battle, the colonel determined to draw them from their defensive position, and ordered his men to attack them and Rajamundry. On the seventh, before daybreak, he began his march, leaving the rajah's forces on their ground; but the enemy beginning to cannonade the Indian forces, he, at the request of the rajah, returned, and took them under his protection. Then they marched together to the village of Golspool, and halted on a small plain about three miles from their encampment. About nine he formed the line of battle. About ten the enemy were drawn up, with the whole of their division, and them, on both sides having continued about forty minutes, the enemy's line advanced to the charge with great resolution; and were so warmly received, that, after several spirited attacks, at eleven the French gave way, and marched with great expedition towards Rajamundry. During this conflict, the rajah's forces stood as idle spectators, nor could their horse be prevailed upon to pursue the fugitives. The victory cost the English forty-four Europeans killed and wounded, including two captains and three lieutenants. The French lost above three times the number, together with their whole camp, baggage, thirty-two pieces of cannon, all their ammunition. A great number of black forces fell on both sides. The Marquis de Conflans did not remain at Rajamundry, but proceeded to Masulipatam; while Captain Knox, with a detachment from the English army, took possession of the French factory at Narsinglore and the key to the country of Vizagapatam. This was delivered to the rajah on his paying the expense of the expedition; and Captain Knox, being detached with a battalion of sepoys, took possession of the French factory at Narsinglore, and the right of the sepoys to hunt, which surrendered to Captain Macken, after having made an obstinate defence.

In the meantime, however, the French army of observation made shift to retake Rajamundry, and in the course of two days the French forces returned within the place, which on the seventh day of March was invested. By the seventh day of April the ammunition of the besiegers being almost expended, Colonel Forde determined to give the assault, as two breaches were already made, and made his dispositions accordingly.

The attack began in the night, and the assailants arrived at the ditch before they were discovered. But here they encountered a terrible discharge of grape-shot and musketry; notwithstanding which they entered the breach and the enemys from being able to hold out a defence. At length, the Marquis de Conflans sent an officer to demand quarter for the garrison, which was granted as soon as he ordered his men to cease firing. Thus, with about three thousand five hundred European, and two thousand seamen, and seven hundred sepoys, Colonel Forde took by assault the strong town of Masulipatam, garnisoned by five hundred and twenty Europeans, two thousand and thirty-nine Caafires, Topasses, and sepoys; and here he found above one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, with a great quantity of ammunition. Salabatizing, the Subash of Deccan, perceiving the success of the English here, as well as at Madras, being sick of his French alliance, removed to his own country, and, at the head of seven hundred sepoys, Colonel Forde took the town without opposition, and made advances to the company, with which he forthwith concluded a treaty to the following effect:—The whole of the environs of Masulipatam shall be given sectors exposed to numberless dangers, and every species of oppression, by the sepoys who commanded the castle on the ban, by the governors of the city on the other hand, and the Mahattas, who had a claim to a certain share of the still declined, and at last they disappeared. He then directed the commodore, on the supposition that they were bound to that place, to send any force that could be brought to send some of his troops for refreshment: a favour that was granted, on condition that they should not advance. Notwithstanding the subah's order, and his own engagement to this effect, the Dutch, after the former ships arrived, than he proceeded up the river to the neighbourhood of Tannah-fort, where his forces were disembarked, began their march to Chinchura. In the meantime, by means of several small vessels on the river belonging to the English company; and the Calcutta Indiaman, commanded by Captain M'Cullough, homeward bound, sailing down the river, the Dutchman gave him to understand, that if he presumed to pass he would sink him without further ceremony. The English captain seeing them run out their guns as if really resolved to put their threats in execution, returned to Calcutta, where two other Indian ships lay at anchor; and reported his adventure to Colonel Clive, who forthwith ordered the three ships to prepare for battle, and attack the Dutch. The ships being properly manned, and their quarters lined with slatete, they fell down the river, and found the Dutch squadron drawn up in line of battle, in order to give them a warm reception, for which indeed they seemed well prepared; for during the night they were loaded with thirty-six guns each, three of these with twenty-six, and the latter carried sixteen. The Duke of Dorset, commanded by Colonel Forrester, being the first that approached them, dropped anchor close to their line, and began the engagement with a broadside, which was immediately returned. A dead calm unfortunately intervening, this single ship was for a considerable time exposed to the whole fire of the enemy; but a small breeze springing up, the Calcutta and the Hardwicke advanced her own fire, and a three-decked ship was maintained on both sides, till two of the Dutch ships, shipping their cables, bore away, and a third was driven ashore. Their commodore, thus weakened, after a few broadsides, took his flag on board, and the other three followed his example. The victory being thus obtained without the loss of one man on the side of the English, Captain Wilson took possession of the prizes, the decks of which were strewn with carcasses; and sent the prisoners to Colonel Clive at Calcutta. The detachment of troops which they had landed, to the number of seven hundred men, was not more fortunate in their progress. Colonel Clive no sooner received intelligence that they were in full march to Chinchura, than he ordered a Dutch party sent out from Chinchura to join and conduct the expected reinforcement. These being routed and dispersed, after a short action, Colonel Forde in the morning proceeded to a plain in the neighbourhood of Chinchura, where he found the enemy prepared to give him battle on the twenty-fifth day of November. They even advanced to the charge with great resolution and activity; but found the fire of the English artillery and battalion so intolerably hot, that they soon gave way, and were totally defeated. A considerable number were killed, and the greater part of those who survived the action were taken prisoners. During this contest, the nabobs, at the head of a considerable army, observed a suspicious neutrality; an eventuality the likelihood would have declared for the Dutch had they proved victorious, as he had reason to believe they would, from their great superiority in number. But fortune no sooner determined in favour of the English, than he made a tender of his services to them for his vicissitudes, which he proposed to reduce Chinchura with his own army. In the meantime, proposals of accommodation being sent to him by the directors and council of the Dutch factory at Chinchura, a negociation ensued, and a treaty was concluded to the entire satisfaction of all parties. Above three hundred of the prisoners entered into the service of Great Britain; the rest embarked on board their ships, which were restored as soon as the peace was ratified, and set out on their return for Batara. After all, perhaps, the Dutch company meant nothing more than to put their factory of Chunchura on a more respectable footing; and, by acquiring greater weight and consequence among the people of the country than they formerly possessed, the more easily extend their commercial relations to the rest of the world. At any rate it is of no disadvantage to us that they only received a tribute at the admission of a dispute among those who profess the law of nature and nations, whether the Dutch company could be justly debarring the privilege of sending a reinforcement to their own garrisons. Be that as it will, the ships were not restored until the factory at Chunchura had given security to indemnify the English for the damage they had sustained on this occasion.

§ VIII. The success of the English company was still more advantageously employed in the case of Colonels Coote. The governor and council of Madras having received information that the French general, Lally, had sent a detachment of his army to the southward, taken Surinam, and threatened Trinidad with a siege, it was determined that Colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England, should take the field, and endeavour to make a diversion to the southward. He accordingly began his march at the head of seventeen hundred Europeans, including cavalry, and seven thousand and fifteen hundred sepoys, including two hundred and one howitzers. On the twenty-seventh day of November, he invested the fort of Wandelwash: having made a practicable breach, the garrison, consisting of nine hundred men, retired in the face of eight hundred English and and one hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, with great quantity of ammunition. Then he undertook the siege of Carangoly, a fortress commanded by Coote, under the command of Colonels O'Kenny, at the head of two thousand Europeans, and five hundred sepoys. In a few days he dismounted the greater part of their guns; and they submitted, on condition that the Europeans should be allowed to march out with the honours of war; but the sepoys were disarmed and dismissed.

§ IX. General Lally, alarmed at the progress of this brave, vigilant, and enterprising officer, assembled all his forces at Arcot, to the number of two thousand two hundred Europeans, including horse; three hundred Caffees, and ten thousand black troops, or sepoys: with five hundred and twenty pieces of cannon. Of these, he assumed the command in person; and on the tenth day of January began his march in order to recover Wandelwash. Colonel Coote, having received intelligence on the twelfth, that he had taken possession of Conjeeveram, endeavoured, by a forced march, to save the place; which they accordingly abandoned at his approach, and pursuing their march to Wandelwash, having on the first day of this month, the English division joined, crossed the river Palla, in order to follow the same route; and on the twenty-first day of the month, understanding that a breach was already made, resolved to give the place during the further delay. The cavalry being formed, and supported by the fire of cannon, the sepoys, who advanced against the enemy's horse, which being at the same time galled by two pieces of cannon, retired with precipitation. Then Colonel Coote, having taken possession of a tank which they had occupied, returned to the road, which was, by this time, formed in order of battle, and seeing the men in high spirits, and eager to engage, he ordered the whole army to advance: and by nine in the morning they were within two miles of the enemy's camp, where they halted about half an hour. During this interval, the colonel reconnoitred the situation of the French forces, who were very advantageously posted; and made a movement in the right, which obliged them to alter their disposition. The left division, consisting of a mile of the English line, and the cannonading began with great fury on both sides. About noon their European cavalry coming up with a resolute air to charge the left of the enemy, the former division brought up their sepoys, and two pieces of cannon, to sustain the horse, which were ordered to oppose them; and these advancing in their flank, disturbed them so much that they broke, and the whole French army had gained the side of the road, left upon the rear of their own army. Meanwhile, both lines continued advancing to each other; and about one o'clock the firing with small arms began with great vivacity. One of the French tamburs being blown up by an accidental shot, the English commander took immediate advantage of their confusion. He ordered Major Bretenot to wheel Draper's regiment to the left, and fall upon the enemy's flank. This service was performed with such resolution and success, that the left wing of the French was completely disordered. The right division was engaged with the left of the English. About two to the afternoon their whole line gave way, and fled towards their own camp; which, receiving themselves closely pursued, they precipitately abandoned, together with the two hundred pieces of cannon. In this engagement they lost about eight hundred men killed and wounded, besides about fifty prisoners, including Brigadier-General de Bussy, the Chevalier Godferey quarter-master-general, Lieutenant-Colonel Murphy, a captain, and thirty officers. On the side of the English, two hundred and sixty-two were killed or wounded; and among the former, the gallant and accomplished Major Bretenot, whose death was a real loss to his country.

§ X. General Lally having retreated with his broken troops to Poudcherry, the Baron de Vasseron was detached towards the same place, with a thousand horse and three hundred sepoys, to ravage and lay waste the French territories. Coote undertook the siege of Chilliapan, which in two days was surrendered by the Chevalier de Tilly; himself and his garrison remaining prisoners of war. Such also was the skill and vigour with which the French general prosecuted his march to Arcot, the capital of the province, against the fort of which he opened his batteries on the fifth day of February. When he had carried on his approaches within sixty yards of the walls of the fort, the garrison consisting of two hundred and fifty Europeans, and near three hundred sepoys, surrendered as prisoners of war; and here the English commander found two hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a great quantity of ammunition, all which the English officers, while the campaign was gloriously finished with the conquest of Arcot; after the French army had been routed and routed by the diligence of Colonel Coote, whose courage, conduct, and activity, cannot be sufficiently admired. The reader will perceive that, rather than interrupt the thread of such an interesting narration, we have ventured to encroach upon the annals of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty.

§ XI. Having thus followed the British banners through the glorious tracks they pursued in different parts of Asia and America, we must own our attention to the continent of Europe, where the English armies, in the course of this year, triumphed with equal lustre and advantage. The French, on the contrary, in the year 1759, held the field which the harrassed powers were found at the close of winter. The vicissitudes of fortune with which the preceding campaign had been chequered, were sufficient to convince every present state that a military superiority, that does not extend itself to the point of such a strength in the conduct, as was requisite to impose terms upon the other. Battles had been fought with various success; and surprising efforts of military skill had been exhibited, without producing one event which tended to promote a general peace, or even engender the least design of accommodation: on the contrary, the first and most violent transports of animosity had by this time subsided into a confirmed habit of deliberation and hatred; and every contending power was more than ever determined to protect the dispute; while the neutral states kept aloof, without expressing the least desire of interposing their mediation. Some of them were restrained by considerations of convenience; and others were left to the discretion of the powers of the Spanish monarch, as an event which they imagined would be attended with very important consequences in the southern part of Europe. With respect to the maintenance of the war, whatever differences there were, both crowned the campaign by supporting the expense, and finding men to recruit the different armies, certain it is, all these difficulties were surrounded before the opening of the campaign. The court of Vienna, notwithstanding the noble resolution, made little progress. The French, besides the expenditures made in the finances, still found resources in the fertility of its provinces, in the number and attachment of its subjects, who, more than any other people in Europe, assequence in the dispositions of their sovereign; and when pay cannot be afforded, willingly contribute free quarters for the subsistence of the army. The czarina, though she complained that the Spaniards were ill paid, nevertheless persisted in pursuing those favourite aims which had for some time influenced her conduct; namely, her personal animosity to the King of Prussia, and his desire of obtaining a permanent interest in the German empire. Sweden still strongly encamped about the village of Berga, between Frankfort and Hanau. Their general, the Duke de Broglie, counted one of the best officers in France with respect to conduct and intrepidity, having received intelligence of the prince's design occurring on October 17th, deterred by the right of his army being at Berga, and his centre and flanks secured in such a manner, that the allies could not make their attack any other way but by the village. Notwithstanding the advantage of their situation, Prince Ferdinand resolved to give them battle, and made his dispositions accordingly. About ten in the morning the grenadiers of the advanced guard began the attack on the village of Bergen with great vigour; and sustained a most terrible fire from eight German battalions, supported by several brigades of French infantry. The grenadiers of the allied army, though reinforced by several battalions under the command of the Prince of Yeonbourg, far from dissuading the enemy from the village, were, after a very severe battle, repulsed and from the consequences of which the allies ran again behind a body of Hessian cavalry. The allies being opposed in three different attacks, their general made a new disposition; and brought up his artillery, thus clearing the way, and driving back the Hessian cavalry, which was severely cannonaded. They were not slow in retorting an equal fire, which continued till night; when the allies retreated to Wunsbeck, with the loss of five pieces of cannon, and about two thousand men, including the Prince of Yeonbourg, who fell in the action. The French, by the nature of their situation, could not suffer much; but they were so effectually assisted by the artful disposition of Prince Ferdinand, that instead of taking measures to harmonize their operations, they pursued the enemy's line, were severely cannonaded. They did not have reason to be satisfied with the issue of this battle, without risking, in any measure, the advantage which they had gained. It was their business to remain quiet until their reinforcements should arrive; and this plan they invariably pursued. On the other hand, the allies, in consequence of their miscarriage, were reduced to the necessity of acting upon the defensive, and encountering a great number of difficulties and inconveniences during great part of the campaign, until the misconduct of the enemy turned the scale in their favour. In the meantime the prince thought proper to begin his retreat in the night, and by the 15th of March, preferred considerably from a body of the enemy's light troops under the command of M. de Blisiel, who surprised two squadrons of dragoons, and a battalion of grenadiers. The first were taken or dispersed; the last escaped with the loss of their baggage. The allied army returned to their cantonments about Munster; and the prince began to make preparations for taking the field in earnest.

§ XIV. But the great object was to drive the enemy from Frankfort, before they should receive the expected reinforcements. Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, being determined upon this enterprise, assembled all his forces near Fulda, to the amount of forty thousand choice troops, and began his march on the tenth day of April. On the thirteenth he came in sight of the enemy, whom he found strongly encamped about the village of Berga, between § XVI. While great part of the allied army remained in cantonments about Munster, the French armies on the Upper and Lower Rhine, being put in motion, joined on the third day of June near Marburg under the command of commanding General Lefevre, who advanced to the northward, and fixed his head-quarters at Corbach: from whence he detached a body of light troops to take possession of Cassel, which at his approach was abandoned by General Lohr and advanced upon the town of Stadtbreda, the Duke de Broglie, who commanded the right wing, advanced from Cassel into the territories of Hanover, where he occupied Göttingen without opposition; while the allied army assembled in the neighbourhood of Lipstadt, and encamped about Soest and Werle. Prince Ferdinand, finding himself inferior to the united forces of the enemy, was obliged to retire as they advanced, after having left strong garrisons in Lipstadt, Retberg, Munster, and Minden. These precautions, however, seemed to produce little effect in his favour. Retberg was surprised by the Duke de Broglie, who likewise took Minden by assault; and made General Zastrow, with his garrison of fifteen hundred men, prisoners of war; a misfortune considered by the loss of an immense magazine of hay and corn, which fell into the hands of the enemy. They likewise made themselves master of Munster, invested Lipstadt, and all their operations were hitherto crowned with success. The reason of their success at their progress, resolved to provide for the worse, by sending their chancery and most valuable effects to Stade; from whence, in case of necessity, they might be conveyed by sea to England. In the meantime they exerted all their industry in press men for recruiting and reinforcing the army under Prince Ferdinand, who still continued to retire; and on the eleventh day of July removed his head-quarters from Osnabrück to Homberg, near the Weser. Here having received advice that Minden was taken by the French, he sent forwards a detachment to secure the port of Saltznan on that river, where on the eighteenth they were encamped.

§ XVII. The general of the allied army had for some time exhibited marks of animosity towards Lord George Sackville, the second in command, whose extensive understanding, penetrating eye, and inquisitive spirit, could neither be deceived, dazzled, nor soothed into tame acquiescence. He had opposed, with all his influence, a design of retiring towards the frontiers of Brunswick, in order to cover that country. He supported his opposition by alleging the enemy’s ease in cutting their communication with the Weser and the Elbe; in which, should they succeed, it would be found impossible to transport the British troops to their own country, which was at that time threatened with an invasion. He therefore opposed the army’s reconnaissance as to keep the communication open with Stade; where, in case of emergency, the English troops might be embarked. By adhering tenaciously to this opinion, and exhibiting other instances of a prying disposition, he had rendered himself so disagreeable to the commander-in-chief, that, in all appearance, nothing was so eagerly desired as an opportunity of removing him from the station he filled.

§ XVIII. Meanwhile the French general, advancing to Minden, encamped in a strong situation; having that town on his right, a steep hill on his left, a morass in front, and a rivulet in rear. The Duke de Broglie commanded a separate body between Hansebergen and Munster, on the other side of the Weser; and a third under the Duke de Brissac, consisting of eight thousand men, occupied a strong post by the village of Coelebit, to facilitate the route of the convoys from Paderborn. Prince Ferdinand having moved his camp from Sollma to Paderborn, detached the hereditary prince on the twenty-eighth day of July to Lubeke, from whence he drove the enemy, and proceeding to Hinsel, was joined by Major-General Drevois, who had retaken Osnabrück, and cleared all that neighbourhood of the enemy’s parties; then he advanced towards Hervorden, and fixed his quarters at Kichlmüen, to hamper the enemy’s communication. From that point of observation, Prince Ferdinand marched with the allied army in three columns from Paderborn to Hille, where it encamped, having a morass on the right, the village of Komauch as a barrier between the Prussians and Holstenhausen. Fifteen battalions and nineteen squadrons, with a brigade of heavy artillery, were left under the command of General Wagenheim, on the left, while the king and the whole army marched along with some redoubts, defended by two battalions. Colonel Lucknor, with the Hanoverian husars, and a brigade of hunters, sustained by two battalions of grenadiers, was posted between Bückeburg and Weser, to observe the body of troops commanded by the Duke de Broglie on the other side of the river.

§ XIX. On the last day of July the Maréchal de Con- tades, resolving to attack the allied army, ordered the corps of Broglie to repass the river; and, advancing in eight columns, about midnight, passed the rivulet of Barta, which runs along the morass, and falls into the Weser at Minden. At day-break he formed his army in order of battle; part of it forming the corps of General Wangen- heim at Dodenhausen, and part of it facing Hille; the two wings consisting of infantry, and the cavalry being stationed in the centre. At three in the morning, the enemy began to cannonade the prince’s quarters at Hille, and the Maréchal de Conades sent an order to the right, preceding evening on the duke of Eckhorst. This was probably the first intimation he received of their intention. He forthwith caused two pieces of artillery to be conveyed to Hille; and ordered the officer of the piquet-guard to proceed there to defend himself to the last extremity: at the same time he sent orders to General Giesen, who occupied Lubeke, to attack the enemy’s post at Eckhorst; and this service was successfully performed. The Prussian chief of Anhalt, lieutenant-general for the day, took possession with the rest of the piquets of the village of Halen, where Prince Ferdinand resolved to support his right. It was already in the hands of the enemy, but they soon abandoned it with precipitation. The allied army, being put in motion, advanced in eight columns, and occupied the ground between Halen and Hemmen, while General Wagenheim’s corps filled up the space between this last village and Dodenhausen. The enemy made their prin- cipal effort on the left, intending to force the infantry of Wagenheim’s corps, and penetrate between it and the body of the allied army. For this purpose the Duke de Broglie sent a party of his army to cut off the communication with Wesers and the Elbe; in which, should they succeed, it would be found impossible to transport the British troops to their own country, which was at that time threatened with an invasion. He therefore opposed the army’s reconnaissance as to keep the communication open with Stade; where, in case of emergency, the English troops might be embarked. By adhering tenaciously to this opinion, and exhibiting other instances of a prying disposition, he had rendered himself so disagreeable to the commander-in-chief, that, in all appearance, nothing was so eagerly desired as an opportunity of removing him from the station he filled. service; nor could they have come up in time and condition to perform effectual service, had the orders been exact and consistent, and the commander acted with all prudence. But, on the contrary, they were repeatedly repulsed in all their attacks with considerable loss: at length they gave way in every part; and about noon, abandoning the field of battle, were pursued to the ramparts of Minden. In this action they lost a great number of men, who were killed or taken, and many cannon and standards; whereas the loss of the allies was very considerable, as it chiefly fell upon a few regiments of British infantry, commanded by the Major-Generals Weymouth, O'Neal, and Temple, consisting of some gallant brigades, and the fire of the British artillery, which was admirably served by the Captains Philips, Macbean, Drummond, and Foy, the victory was in a great measure described. The same night the enemy passed the Weser, and burned the bridges over that river. Next day the garrison of Minden surrendered at discretion; and here the victors found a great number of French officers wounded.

The siege of the Mareschal de Contades seemed inclined to retreat through the defiles of Wittenkendest, to Paderborn; but he was fair to change his resolution, in consequence of his having received advice, that on the very morning of his march, the town of Minden was investment by the hereditary prince in the neighbourhood of Cövelsd, so that the passage of the mountains was rendered impracticable. The Duke de Brissac had been advantageously posted to defend the Weser, having been placed between the Weser and his front, and his right extending to the salt-pits. In this advantageous situation he was attacked by the hereditary prince and General von Kilmanseg, with such ardour and activity, as his troops were twice repulsed, with the loss of the left wing, and considerable number of men killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. After the battle of Minden, Colonel Freytag, at the head of the light troops, took, in the neighbourhood of Detmold, a large body of Swiss, the Prince de Conde, and the Duke de Brissac, with part of their military chancy and chancery, containing papers of the utmost consequence.

His serjeant highness declares publicly, that next to God he attributes the almighty day to the intrepidity and extraordinary good behaviour of these troops, which he assures him shall remain the ingenuity of all those who are able to serve these brave troops, or any of them in particular, it will give them universal delight. He commands you, therefore, to present thanks to his Lieutenants General, the Duke of Waldegrave, Lord Newcastle, and the great Duke of Marlborough, for their extraordinary and constant services; and, besides the forces and troops that shall be obliged to the Count de Bucckeburg, for his extraordinary care and assistance in the present siege, to give him all the merit and advantage, and the effect. Likewise to the commanding officers of the several brigades of light troops, till that may become known. It is his command to the Duke of Conde, and the Duke of Brissac, that they have been ordered to take the town of Minden, and to march to Hanover. In short, his serjeant highness orders that some of those states whose honor, who have been in the enemy's service, shall be of the army, that upon all occasions, and under all circumstances, they may be obeyed punctually. And we have reason to hope, that this will be the case.

§ XXI. Prince Ferdinand having possessed himself of the town and castle of Marburg, proceeded with the army to Neudorf-Weimar, and there encamped; while Contades remained at Gießen, on the south side of the river Lahn, where he was joined by the Duke de Contades, Prince of Conde, and the Duke de Brissac, with part of their military chancy and chancery, containing papers of the utmost consequence.

conduct of Broglio, who recriminated on him in his turn, and seemed to gain credit at the court of Versailles. While the two armies lay encamped in the neighborhood of Langres, nothing but skirmishes took place between their respective outposts. The French army was employed in removing their magazines, and fortifying Gien, as if their intention was to retreat to Frankfurt on the Main, after having consumed all the forage, and made a military desert between the Lahn and that river. In the beginning of November, the Marshal Duke de Broglio returned from Paris, and assumed the command of the army. On December 20, he ordered the whole army to retrench, and reviewed the corps. Of the several officers that were senior to the new commander.

§ XXIII. The Duke of Würtemberg, having taken possession of Fulda, the hereditary Prince of Brunswick resolved to beat up those quarters. For this purpose he selected a body of troops, and began his march from Marburg early in the morning on the twenty-eighth day of November. Next night they lay at Augerbach, where they defeated the volunteers of Nassau; and at one o'clock in the morning of the thirteenth they marched directly to Fulda; where the Duke of Würtemberg, far from expecting such a visit, had invited all the fashionable people in Fulda to a supper. The hereditary prince, having reconnoitred the avenues in person, took such measures, that the troops of Würtemberg, who were scattered in small bodies, would have been cut off, if they had not hastily retired into the town, where, however, they found no shelter. The French forced open the gates; and they retreated to the other side of the town, where four battalions of them were defeated and taken; while the duke himself, with the rest of his forces, filed off on the other side of the Fulda. Two pieces of cannon, two pairs of colours, and all their baggage, fell into the hands of the victors; and the hereditary prince advanced as far as Rüpingenrode, a place situated on the right flank of the French army. Perhaps this change of position was the Duke de Broglio's means of abandoning Gien, and fall back to Friedberg, where he established his head-quarters. The allied army immediately took possession of his camp at Kleinleins and Heuchelheim, and seemed to make preparations for the siege of Gien.

§ XXIV. While both armies remained in this position, the Duke de Broglio received the staff as Marshals of France, and made an attempt to beat up the quarters of the allies. Having called in all his detachments, he marched up to them on the 25th day of December; but found them so well disposed to give him a warm reception, that he thought proper to lay aside his design, and nothing but a general capitulation ensued; when he returned with his forces to Frankfort. From Kleinleins the allied army retired to Cordos, where they were cantoned till the beginning of January, when they fell back as far as Marburg, where Prince Ferdinand established his head-quarters. The enemy retired the same time retaining the whole of his superiority, in the order of the hereditary prince's being detached with fifteen thousand men to join the King of Prussia at Freyberg, in Saxony. Thus, by the victory at Minden, the domination of Hanover and Brunswick were preserved, and the enemy obliged to evacuate great part of Westphalia. Perhaps they might have been driven on the other side of the Rhine, had not the general of the allies been obliged to weaken his army for the support of the Prussian monarch, who had met with divers disasters in the course of body of troops. It was not to any relaxation or abatement of his usual vigilance and activity, that this warlike prince owed the several checks he received. Even in the middle of winter his troops under General Manteuffel acted with great spirit against the Swedes in Pomerania. They made themselves masters of Demgarten, and several other places which the Swedes had garrisoned; and the frost setting in, they then proceeded on the ice. Usedom passed over the ice to Wolgast, which they reduced without much difficulty. They undertook the sieges of Demmen and Anclam at the same time; and the garrisons of both surrendering themselves prisoners of war, to the number of two thousand seven hundred men, with a large quantity of ammunition. In Anclam there was a considerable magazine, with six-and-thirty cannon, mortars, and howitzers. A large detachment under General Knob- loch advanced to Pomerania, to reinforce the forces in those parts of the empire; and, advancing by the passes of Gota, Lensen, and Fulda; from whence also they conveyed all the forage and provisions to Saxo-Nassau.

In the latter end of February, the Prussian Major-General Wolfsen marched with a strong body of troops from Goslin in Silesia to Poland; and, advancing by the way of Liss, attacked the castle of the Prince Sulkowski, a Polish grandee, who had been very active against the interest of the Prussian monarch. After some resistance he was overpowered, and fifty-three hundred men surrendered to his new garrison. After which Wolfsen proceeded to Posna, where he made himself master of a considerable magazine, guarded by two thousand Cosscas, who retired at his approach; and having destroyed several others returned to Silesia. In April the fort of Penamunde, in Pomerania, was surrendered to Mantueller; and about the same time a detachment of Prussian troops bombarded Schwentin, the capital of Mecklenburg. Meanwhile, reinforcements were sent to the Russian army in Poland, which in April began to assemble upon the Vistula. The court of Petersburg had likewise begun to equip a large fleet, by means of which the army of the Moscovy was to be supported by the transports and provisions; but this permanent was retarded by an accidental fire at Revel, which destroyed all the magazines and materials for ship-building to an immense value.
of Kulmbach under contribution, destroyed all the magazines provided for the imperial army, and sent fifteen hundred prisoners to Leipzig. A party of imperialists, under Count Pulte, ending all resistance, were defeated near Hoff, with considerable slaughter: nevertheless, the imperial army, though now reduced to ten thousand men, returned to Bamberg: and as the Prussians approached the frontiers of Saxony, the Austrian generals, hearing, that in their rear stood large bodies of troops, and that these transactions, the Mareschal Count Damm remained with the grand Austrian army at Schurta, in the circle of Königsgratz; while the Prussians, commanded by the king himself, advanced towards the Rhine between Landschut and Schweinitz. General Fouquet commanded a large body of troops in the southern part of Silesia: but these being mostly withdrawn, in order to oppose the Russians, the Austrian general, De Fée, also marched on the frontiers of Moravia, with a considerable detachment, took advantage of this circumstance; and advancing into Silesia, encompassed within sight of Nesa.

§ XXVII. As mutual calumny and recrimination of all kinds were not spared on either side, during the progress of this war, the enemies of the Prussian monarch did not fail to charge him with cruelties committed at Schwein, the capital of Mcklenburg, which his troops had burned, plundered, and killed all the youth fit to carry arms, who were pressed into his service: he besides taxed the duchy at seven thousand men, and nine million of crowns, by way of contribution. He was also accused of having encamped all the prisoners from Berlin to Spandau; but this step he justified, in a letter to his ministers at foreign courts, declaring that he had provided for all the officers that were his prisoners the best accommodation, and permitted them to reside in his capital; that some of them had grossly abused the liberty they enjoyed, by maintaining illicit correspondence, and other practices equally offensive, which had obliged him to remove them to the town of Schweinitz; where he had thought proper to confound them with the fortress of that name, from which it was entirely separated, and in which they would enjoy the same ease they had found at Berlin, though under more vigilant inspection. His conduct on this occasion, he said, was sufficiently authorized, not only by the laws of nations, but also by the example of his enemies; insomuch as the empress-queen had never suffered any of his officers, who had fallen into her hands, to reside at Vienna; and the commanders of the different provinces of the empire, as Count Hohenlohe. He concluded with saying, that, as his enemies had let slip no opportunity of blackening his most innocent proceedings, he had thought proper to acquaint his ministers with the whole transaction: and he had also sent letters to his prisoners, whether French, Austrians, or Russians.

§ XXVIII. In the beginning of June, the King of Prussia, understanding that the Russian army had begun their march from the Vistula, gave the alarm to the magazine of his troops, under Hilsen and Wobensow, reinforced by detachments from his other armies, to join the force under Count Dohna, as general in chief, and march into Poland. Accordingly, they advanced to Meritz, where the count having published a declaration, he continued his march towards Poona, where he found the Russian army under the command of Count Sour, encamped in their rear, and in their front a formidable intrenchment mounted with a great number of cannon. Count Dolhua judging it impracticable to attack them in this situation with any prospect of success, endeavored to cut off their retreat to the eastward; but, for want of provision, was in a little time obliged to return towards the Oder; then the Russians advanced to Zullichow, in Silesia. The King of Prussia thinking Count Dolhua had large forces, and considering the emergency of his affairs, gave him leave to retire for the benefit of his health; and conferred his command upon General Wedel, who resolved to give the Russian battle without delay. Thus determined, he marched against them in two columns; and, on the twenty-third day of July, attacked them at Kay, near Zullichow, where, after a very obstinate engagement, he was repulsed with great loss, Wobensow being killed and Manteufel wounded in the action; and in a few days the Russians made themselves masters of Frankfort upon the Oder.

§ XXIX. By this time, the armies of Count Dohna and the King of Prussia had made several motions. The Austrians having quitted their camp at Schurta, advanced towards Zittau in Losatia; where having halted a few days, they resumed their march, and encamped at Gotzheim, between Sudent and the Oder, in front of the enemy. The Austrians, in order to observe their motions, marched by the way of Herzberg to Labn; and his vanguard skirmished with that of the Austrians commanded by Landolin, who entered Silesia by the way of Griffenberg. The Austrian general was obliged to retreat with loss; while the King penetrated into Silesia, that he might be at hand to act against the Russians, whose progress was now become the chief object of his apprehension. He no sooner received information that the Russians were near him, than he raised with a select body of ten thousand men from his camp in Silesia, in order to take upon him the command of Wedel's army, leaving the rest of his forces strongly encamped, under the direction of his brother Prince Henry, who had joined him before this event. Count Dohna being apprized of the king's intention, and knowing the Russians were very defective in cavalry, immediately detached a body of twelve thousand horse to join them, under the command of Count Lutzenburg, who was ordered to march through Silesia and Losatia, with some loss, arrived in the Russian camp at a very critical juncture. Meanwhile the King of Prussia joined General Wedel on the fourteenth of July, at Muhrose, where he was in the command of the army: but finding it greatly inferior to the enemy, he recalled General Emk, whom he had detained some time before with a body of nine thousand men, to oppose the progress of the imperialists in Saxony; for when Prince Henry joined his brother in Silesia, the army of the empire had entered that electorate. Thus reinforced, the number of the king's army at Muhrose seems to have been from their aloofness and for us to enter into the service of a power with whom he is at war, his majesty, therefore, makes known by these proclamations, that all of his subjects serving in the monarch's army, who shall be taken with arms in their hands, shall, agreeably to the laws, be sentenced to be hanged without mercy, as traitors to his king and country. Of all whom who suffer for any concert are to be taken notice of, etc.

On the 3rd of June.

We invite and desire that the nobility, archbishops, bishops, abbots, provosts, magistrates, and all the other inhabitants of our duchies, principalities, or provinces, shall not leave their lands, or go away, unless for the necessary service in the field; nor shall they, on the road to Poona, and beyond it, repair in person, or by his deputies, to the place of meeting; nor shall any person, whether in the imperial head quarters, there to treat with the commander in chief, or the commander in arms, for the delivery of forces and provisions, of the sustenance of the army, to be paid for with ready money.

We promise and assure ourselves, that no person in Poland will attempt to seduce the imperial troops to desert, that an assurance will be given to the subjects of the imperial army, that no man, whatever his rank or profession, shall be permitted to desert, or to be induced to turn deserters, unless for the payment of ready money or for the delivery of arms; and we promise further, that any person, who shall induce any man to turn deserters, or to assist in seducing the same shall be put to death, and a reasonable indemnity assigned.

We promise and assure ourselves, that every person, who shall, against the law and our assurances, attempt to seduce the imperial troops to desert, or to be induced to turn deserters, or to assist in seducing the same shall be put to death, and a reasonable indemnity assigned.

did not exceed fifty thousand; whereas the Russians were more numerous by thirty thousand. They had chosen a strong camp at the village of Cunersdorff, almost opposite to Frankfort upon the Oder, and increased the natural strength of their situation by intrenchments mounted with a numerous artillery. In other circumstances it might have been rash to risk such an attack, but, thinking such an army under such complicated disadvantages; but here was no room for hesitation. The king's affairs seemed to require a desperate effort; and perhaps he was partly impelled by self-confidence and animosity. § XXX. Having determined to hazard such an attack, he made his disposition, and on the twelfth day of August, at two in the morning, his troops were in motion. The army being formed in a wood, advanced towards the enemy; and about eleven the action was begun with a severe cannonade. This having produced the desired effect, he charged the left wing of the Russian army with his best troops formed in columns. After a very obstinate dispute, the enemy's intrenchments were forced with great slaughter, and seventy pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the Prussians. A narrow defile was afterwards passed, and several redoubts that covered the village of Cunersdorff were taken by assault, one after another: one had resisted until two o'clock in the morning; the Russian made a firm stand at the village; but they were overborne by the impetuosity of the Prussians, who drove them from post to post up to the last redoubt they had to defend. As he advanced with all the gaiety of victory, they were held down in their ranks; this success was not acquired without infinite labour, and a considerable expense of blood. After a furious contest of six hours, fortune seemed to declare so much in favour of the Prussians, that the king despatched the following letter to the queen at Berlin: "Madam, we have driven the Russians from their intrenchments. In two hours expect to hear of a glorious victory." This intimation was premature, and subjected the writer to the ridicule of all enemies. The Russians were staggered, not routed. General Soltikoff rallied his troops, and reinforced his left wing under cover of a redoubt, which was erected on an eminence called the Jews' Burning-ground; and here they stood in order of battle, with the most resolute contenance; favoured by the situation, which was naturally difficult of access, and now rendered almost impregnable by the fortification, and a numerous artillery still greatly superior to that of the Prussians. Had the king continued himself with the advantage already gained, all the world would have acknowledged he had fought against terrible odds with astonishing prowess; and that he judiciously desisted, when he could have continued his work without merit, if not of being actuated by frenzy or despair. His troops had not only suffered severely from the enemy's fire, which was close, deliberate, and well directed; but they were totally dispirited by their success, and had a general repugnance to the battle, which was excessive. His general officers are said to have reminded him of all these circumstances; and to have dissuaded him from hazarding an attempt attended with such difficulty as even an army of fresh troops could hardly hope to surmount. He rejected this salutary advice, and ordered his infantry to begin a new attack; which, being an enterprise beyond their strength, they were repulsed with great slaughter. Being afterwards rallied, they returned to the charge; they miscarried again, and their loss was redoubled. Being thus rendered unfit for further service, the cavalry succeeded to the attack, and repeated their unsuccessful efforts until they were almost broke, and entirely exhausted. At this critical juncture, the whole body of the Austrian and Russian cavalry, which had hitherto remained inactive, and were therefore fresh, and in spirit, fell in among the Prussian horse with great fury, broke the line at the first charge; and forcing the enemy in confusion, it was impossible for him to reform his disorder as could not be repaired. The Prussian army being thus involved in confusion, was seized with a panic, and, in a few minutes, totally defeated and dispersed, notwith standing the spirit and energy of the king, and the disorder in the inferior ranks, and was dissolved, to the utter destruction of his life in the hottest parts of the battle, led on his troops three times to the charge, had two horses killed under him, and his clothes in several parts penetrated with musket-balls. His army being routed, and the greater part of his generals either killed or disabled by wounds, nothing but the approach of night could have saved his court from ruin. When he abandoned the field of battle, he despatched another letter to the queen, couched in these terms: "Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the army remain there; they are a powerful enterprize, which the enemy can not resist, can not play off, can not treat with; they placed in strong conditions with the enemy." The horror and confusion which this intimation produced at Berlin may be easily conceived; horror the more aggravated, as it seemed they had been the only reserves or succour occasioned by the first despatch; and this was still more disastrously accelerated by a subsequent indistinct relation, importing that the army was totally routed, the king missing, and the enemy in full march to Berlin. The battle of Cunersdorff was by far the most bloody action that had happened since the commencement of hostilities. The carnage was truly horrible: above twenty thousand Prussians lay dead on the field: and among these General Putkammer. The Gene- rals Stenitz, Itzenplitz, Hulsen, Fink, and Weidel, the Prince of Wittenberg, and five major-generals were wounded. The loss of the enemy amounted to ten thousand. It must be owned, that if the king was prodigal of his own person, he was likewise very free with the lives of his subjects; and from his own letter to the queen, it appeared, barbarity, were the lives of men squandered away with such profusion as in the course of this German war. They were not only unnecessarily sacrificed in various expostulations of no consequence, but they were spent in the harshest and most dismizingly of winter campaigns, which were introduced on the continent, in despite of nature, and in contempt of humanity. Such are the improvements of war without feeling! such the refinements of German discipline! On the day that succeeded the defeat at Cunersdorff, the King of Prussia, having lost the best part of his army, together with his whole train of artillery, re-passed the Oder, and encamped at Retnow; from whence he advanced to Pustendorf, and now, with astonishment, the forbearance of the enemy. Instead of taking possession of Berlin, and overwhelming the wreck of the king's troops, destitute of cannon, and cut off from all communica- tion with Prince Henry, they took no step to improve the victory they had gained. Laudohn retired with his horse immediately after the battle; and Count Soltikoff marched with part of the Russians into Lusatia, where he joined Daun, and held consultations with that general. Perhaps the safety of the Prussian monarch was owing to the jealousy subsisting among his enemies. In all probability, the court of Vienna would have been charmed to see the Russians in possession of Brandenburgh, and therefore there were more motive than there, for the imprudence of Prussia had now reason to be convinced, that his situa- tion could not justify such a desperate attack as that in which he had miscarried at Cunersdorff; for if the Russians did not give in the winter, they might triumph the next year. The king was totally defeated, and the flower of his army cut off, they certainly would not have aspired at that conquest while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood with fifty thousand veterans, inured to war, accustomed to conquer, confident of success, and well supplied with provisions, am- munition, and artillery. As the victors allowed him time to breathe, he improved this interval with equal spirit and capacity. He re-assembled and refreshed his broken troops; he furnished his camp with cannon from the arsenal at Berlin, which likewise supplied him with a consi- derable number of recruts: he recalled General Kleist, with five thousand men, from Pomerania; and, in a little time, retrieved his former importance. § XXXI. The army of the empire having entered Saxony, where it reduced Leispitz, Torgau, and even took possession of Dresden itself, the king detached six thou- sand men under General Wumeh, to check the progress of the emperor. In the meantime, the Elector of Saxony intended to besiege Great Glogau, he, with the rest of his army, took post between them and that city, so as to frustrate their design. While the four great armies, enquantod to an hundred and odd miles from each other, the Prince Henry, and Count Daun, lay encamped in Lusatia, and on the borders of Silesia, watching the motions of each other, the war was carried on by detachments with great vivacity. General Wurich, having taken Leipsic, and joined Finck at Eulenburg, the united body began their march towards Dresden; and a detachment of the army of the empire, which had encamped near Dobelin, retired at their approach. But on the night of the eleventh, General Haddick abandoned the advantageous post he occupied near Roth-Scemberg; and, being joined by the whole army of the empire, resolved to attack the Prussian general, who now encamped at Cötzta, near Massen; accordingly on the twenty-first day of October, he advanced against them, and endeavored to dislodge them by a furious cannonade, which was mutually maintained from morning to night, being pressed so long with considerable loss; leaving the field of battle, with about five hundred prisoners, in the hands of the Prussians.

§ XXXIII. This advantage was succeeded by another exploit of Prince Henry, who, on the twenty-third day of the month, quitted his camp at Hornsodorf, near Cötzta; and, on an incredible march of eleven German miles, by the way of Rothenberg, arrived, about five in the afternoon, at Hoyerswerda, where he surprised a body of four thousand men, commanded by General Veita, killed six hundred, and made twice that number prisoners, including the commander himself. After this achievement, he joined the detachment under General Haddick at Massen, and likewise abandoned his camp to Lusatia, and made a forced march to Dresden, in order to frustrate the prince's supposed design on that capital. The Russians, disappointed in their scheme upon Glogau, had re-passed the Oder at Naug初步, encamped at Baross, divided General Laudohn, with a body of Austrians, lay at Scheltingkraig, and the King of Prussia at Kőben; all three on or near the banks of that river. Prince Henry, perceiving his army almost surrounded by Austrian detachments, ordered General Knick to drive them from Vogelsang, which they attacked accordingly; and sent Wunich, with six battalions and some cavalry, across the Elbe, to join the corps of General Littenhaut, who, it is said, was retired from Duben at the approach of the Austrians. On the twenty-ninth day of October the Duke d'Arblamberg, with sixteen thousand Austrians, decamped from Dammitsch, in order to occupy the heights near Pretsch, and was encountered by General Wunich; who, being posted on two rising grounds, coaxed the Austrians on their march with considerable effect; and the prince took twelve hundred prisoners, including Lieutenant-General Gemmington, and twenty-three field-guns, with their carriages, and a large quantity of baggage. The Duke was obliged to change his route, while Wunich marched from Duben to Eulenburg; and General Wassersleben occupied the spirit of the mine, and detached about fifteen pieces of cannon, fifty pair of colours, and twenty-five standards, fell into the hands of the Austrian generals. The musforse was the more mortifying to the King of Prussia, as it implied a censure on his conduct, for having detached such a numerous body of troops to a situation where they could not be sustained by the rest of his army. On the other hand, the court of Vienna exulted in this victory, as an insupportable proof of Daun's superior talents; and, in point of glory and advantage, much more than an equivalent for the loss of the Saxony army, which, though less numerous, capitulated in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six, after having held out six weeks against the whole power of the Prussian monarchy. General Count Uebentish detached, about nine battalions and thirty squadrons, to the assistance of Finck; but he arrived at Klingenberg too late to be of any service; and, being recalled, was next day sent to occupy the important post of Rugen. A. § XXXIII. The defeat of General Finck was not the only disaster which befell the Prussians at the close of this campaign. General Diercke, who was posted with seven battalions of infantry, and a thousand horse, on the right bank of the Elbe, opposite to Memmin, finding it impractical to lay a bridge of pontoons across the river, on account of the floating ice, was obliged to transport his troops in boats; and when all were passed except himself, with the rest-guards of the detachment, he retired that night, on the third day of December, in the morning, attacked by a strong body of Austrians, and taken with all his men, after an obstinate dispute. The King of Prussia, weakened by these two successive defeats, that happened in the rear of an unfortunate campaign, would hardly have been able to maintain his ground at Freyberg, had he not been at this juncture reinforced by the body of troops under the command of the hereditary Prince of Brunswick. As for Daun, the advantages he had gained did not elevate his mind above the usual maxims of his cautious discretion. Instead of attacking the King of Prussia, respectable and formidable even in adversity, he quietly occupied the strong fortress of Reichenbach, and forbade the band to scour Duben, in case it should be attacked, and maintain his communication with Bohemia.

§ XXXIV. By this time the Russians had retired to winter-quarters in Poland; and the Swedes, after a frontless and governor in the absence of Maneufel, retreated to Stralsund and the isle of Rügen. This campaign, therefore, did not prove more decisive than the last. Absence of lives was lost, and great part of Germany was exposed to rapine, murder, famine, desolation, and every species of misery that war could engender. In vain the conterminous powers of Austria, Russia, and Sweden, united their efforts to crush the Prussian monarch. Though his army had been surprised, and the Emperor of Russia thrown, with great slaughter, in the heart of his own dominions; though he appeared in a desperate situation, enviroved by hostile armies, and two considerable detachments of his troops were taken, and destroyed; yet he kept all his adversities at bay till the approach of winter, which proved his best auxiliary; and even maintained his footing in the electorate of Saxony, which seemed to be the prize contested between him and his monarch. Yet, long before the approach of winter, one would imagine he must have been crushed between the shock of so many adverse hosts, had they been intent upon closing him in, and heartily concurred for his destruction; but, instead of urging the war, with accumulations of forces, he acted in separate bodies, and with jealous eye seemed to regard the progress of each other. It was not, therefore,
to any compunction, or kind of forbearance, in the court of Vienna, that the inactivity of Daun was owing. The remission of the house of Austria seemed, on the contrary, to grow with the redoubled indications; and the majority of the Germanic body seemed to enter with warmth into her quarrel.\footnote{The obduracy of the powers as apposition to Great Britain and Prus- sia in their contest, was the probable cause of their enmity, which Duke Louis of Brunswick delivere to their ministers at the Hague, in a letter dated November 9; and which was totally rejected by the envoys of France, totally defeated.} § XXXV. When the Protestant states in arms against the court of Vienna were put under the dominion of the empire, the evangelical body, though without the concurrence of the Swedish and Danish ministers, issued an arrest at Ratisbon, in the month of November of the last year, and to this breach of the capitulation signed by the emperor at his election, in order for the loans, the Protestants claimed nothing but what was agreeable to the constitution. They declared that their association was no more than a mutual engagement, by which they obliged themselves to adhere to the laws, without suffering, under any pretext, that the power of putting under the ban of the empire should reside wholly in the emperor. They affirmed that this power was renounced, in express terms, by the capitulation; they, therefore, refused to admit, as legal, any sentence of the ban deficient in the requisite conditions; and inferred that, according to the law of Brabant, nor the Elector of Hanover, nor the Duke of Wolfenbuttel, nor the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, nor the County of Nassau, nor the Duke of Brunswick, the Duke of Saxe-Gotha and Brunswick, the Duchies of Saxe-Weimar, and Wolfenbuttel, and the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, were the persons who disturbed the empire; these, therefore, being an affair in which they themselves were parties, they could not possibly be qualified to concur in a resolution of this nature; besides, the number of the other states which had acceded to the act was very considerable: for these reasons, the emperor could not but consider the resolution in question as an act whereby the general peace of the empire was disturbed, both by the parties that had incurred the ban, and by the states which had joined them, in order to support and favour their furious pretensions. He, therefore, repelled this abuse of his subject, and considered that the other electors, princes, and states of the empire, would vote the said resolution to be null, and of no force, and never suffer so small a number of states, who were adherents of, and aletors to, the disturbers of the empire, to prejudice the rights and prerogatives of the whole German body; to abuse the name of the associated states of the Augsburg confession, in order forcibly to impose a faction, entirely repugnant to the constitution of the empire, to deprive them of co-states of the empire; and thereby endeavouring totally to subvert the system of the Germanic body. These remarks will speak for themselves to the reflection of the unjudged reader.

The imperial court of Vienna was equalized by nothing but the perseverance of the French ministry. Though their numerous army had not gained one inch of ground in Westphalia, the campaign on that side having ended exactly where it had begun; though the chief source of their commerce in the West Indies had fallen into the hands of Great Britain, and they had already laid their account with the loss of Quebec:

\footnote{The method called (breveschoppen) in that of making French troops to lead Dutch vessels to the presence of Franche.} though their coffers rung with emptiness, and their creditors were clamorous for subsidies; they still resolved to maintain the war in Germany: this was doubtless the most politic measure; for they could not renounce the augmentation of their ordinary expense. Some of the springs of their national wealth were indeed exhausted, or diverted into other channels; but the subjects declared for a continuation of the war, and the necessities of the state were supplied by the loyal and patriotic contrivances of the people. They not only acquiesced in the bankruptcy of public credit, when the court stopped payment of the interest on twelve different branches of the national debt, but they likewise sent in large quantities of plate to be melted down, and coined into specie for the maintenance of the war. All the bills drawn on the government by the colonies were protested to an immense amount, and a stop was put on all the annuities grants, in consideration on sums borrowed for the use of the marine. Besides the considerable savings occasioned by these acts of state bankruptcy, they had resources of credit among the merchants of Holland, who beheld the success of Great Britain with envy against them with the most rancorous resentment, on account of the curates which had been made of their West India ships by the English cruisers.

§ XXXVI. The merchants of Amsterdam, having received advice that the cargoes of the West India ships, detained by the English, would, by the British courts of judicature, be declared lawful prizes, as being French property, sent a deputation, with a petition to the States-general, entreating them to use their intercession with the court of London, representing the impossibility of furnishing the proofs required in so short a time as that prescribed by the British admiralty; and that, as far as the Dutch commerce was concerned, there was no other way of taking in cargoes but that of Overschippen, to which the English had objected, a condemnation of these ships, as legal prizes, would give the finishing stroke to the trade of the colony. Whatever representations the States-general might have made on this subject to the ministry of Great Britain, they had no effect upon the proceedings of the court of admiralty, which continued to condemn the cargoes of the Dutch ships as often as they were proved to be French property, and the commodi- ty in a little time intimated the subjects of Holland from persevering in this illicit branch of commerce. The enemies of England in that republic, however, had so far prevailed as to have intimated that the English had in Holland passed a formal resolution to equip five-and- twenty ships of war; and orders were immediately despatched to the officers of the admiralty to complete the armament with all possible expedition. In the month of April, the States-general sent over to London three ministers extraordinary, to make representations, and remove, if possible, the causes of misunderstanding that had arisen between Great Britain and the United Provinces. They delivered their credentials to the king, with a formal bar- rage; they said his majesty would see, by the contents of the letter they had the honour to present, how ardently their high mightinesses desired to cultivate the sincere friendship which had so long continued to exist between the two nations, so necessary for their common welfare and preservation: they expressed an earnest wish that they might be happy enough to remove those difficulties which had at one time struck at this friendship, and caused so much suffering to the principal sea-borne commerce of the kingdom; who, by the commerce they carried on, constituted its greatest strength, and chief support. They declared their views of reconciliation, and to contribute to the re-establishment of public tranquillity. In due course of time, they communicated the following observation, in order to the termination of any misunderstanding, that respect, their said majesties have determined to make the following declaration:—

They that are ready to send plaintiffs to the place which shall be thought sufficient, 1. that they have already expressed a desire to establish a general peace with them, whose beneficial parties shall think fit to enter into it; 2. that they are desirous, as far as the powers they have been capable of it, of the establishment of general concord, and of pursuing the objects of concord, in particular and in their tender concord for the maintenance of their independence and the defence of their states. If they neglected the proper means to put a stop to the progress of so severe whole confidence was placed in his majesty's equity, for which the republic had the highest regard; and in the good-will he had always expressed towards a state which on all occasions had interested itself in promoting his glory; so, as he had in the artillery and pretensions to the queen by a princess so dear to his affection. "Full of this confidence (said they) we promise to flatter ourselves that your majesty will be graciously pleased to listen to our just demands; and we shall endeavour, during the course of the ensuing summer, to strengthen the bonds by which the two nations ought to be for ever united." In answer to this oration, the king assured them that he had always regarded their high importance in various collisions, existing between his subjects and his neighbours; it was hence, arising trade; ought to be considered as the consequences of a burthensome war which he was obliged to wage with France. He desired they would assure their high mightinesses, that he should endeavour, on his part, to remove the obstacles in question; and expressed his satisfaction that they (the deputies) were come over with the same disposition. What representations these deputies made, further than complaints of some irrul gularities in the conduct of the British sea-officers, we cannot pretend to specify; but as the subject in dispute related entirely to the practices of the courts of judicature, it did not fail properly under cognizance of the govern ment, and was adjourned for the information of the ministers, and for the advantage of justice. In all probability, the subjects of Holland were by no means pleased with the success of this negoti ation, for they murmured against the English nation with ferocious asperity. In the course of two or three months; and eagerly seized all opportunities of display their partiality in favour of the enemies of Great Britain.
§ XXXVIII. In the month of September Major-General Yorke, the British minister at the Hague, presented a memorial to the States-general, remonstrating, that the merchants of Holland carried on a contraband trade in favour of France, by transporting cannon and warlike stores from the Baltic to Holland, in Dutch bottoms, under the borrowed names of private persons; and then, conveying them by the inland rivers and canals, or through the Dutch fortresses, to Dunkirk, and other places of France. He desired that the king, his master, might be made easy on that head, by their putting an immediate stop to such practices, so repugnant to the connections subsisting by treaty between Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to every idea of neutrality. He ob served, that they had been detained at Amsterdam, and had been given to their representations against the excesses of the English privateers, by procuring an act of parliament which laid them under proper restrictions, gave him a good title in to the recovery of such stores as he should be forward to them. He reminded them that their trading towns felt the good effects of these restrictions; and that the freedom of nava vation which their subjects enjoyed amidst the troubles and distractions of Europe, had considerably augmented their commerce. He observed that some return ought to be made to such solid proofs of the king's friendship and protection; at least, the merchants, who were so ready to complain of England, ought not to be contemnaced in excesses which would have justified the most rigorous examination of their conduct. He recalled to their memo ries that, during the course of the present war, the king had several times applied to their high mightinesses, and to their ministers, on the liberty they had given, to carry stores through the fortresses of the republic for the use of France, to invade the British dominions; and though his majesty had passed over in silence many of these instances of complaisance to his enemy, he was less sensible of the injury; but he chose rather to be a sufferer himself, than to increase the embarrassment of his neighbours, or extend the flames of war. He took notice that even the court of Vienna had, upon more than one occasion, em ployed its influence with his sovereign to induce his name to obtain passes for warlike stores and provisions for the French troops, under colour of the barrier treaty, which it no longer observed; nay, after having put France in possession of Dunkirk, had continued to violate that treaty, and without any regard to the rights which their king the master had acquired in that treaty, at the expense of so much blood and treasure.
§ XXXIX. The memorial seems to have made some impression on the States-general, as they scrupled to allow the British to carry on the trade in the Dutch provinces; but their scruples vanished entirely on the receipt of a counter-memorial presented by the Count D'Affy, the French ambassador, who mingled some equal treatment with his animosity. He desired them to remember, that, during the whole course of war, the French king had required nothing from their friendship that was inconsistent with the strictest impartial ity; and, if he had deviated from the engagements sub scribed the regimen, it was on the score of removing the most essential and lucrative favours to the subjects of their high mightinesses. He observed that the English, notwithstanding the insolence of their behaviour to the republic, had derived, on many occasions, assistance from the protection their effects had found in the territories of the United Provinces; that the artillery, stores, and am munition belonging to Wessel were deposited in their territories, where the Hessian army in passing the Ilimne had very little respected, that when they returned that river, they had no other way of saving their sick and wounded from the hands of the French, than by embarking them in boats, and conveying them to places where the French left them, after the most barbarous butchery. He also added, that the neutrality of the republic: that part of their magazines was still deposited in the towns of the United Provinces; where also the enemies of France had purchased and con sumed quantities of provisions in his presence and told them, that though these and several other circumstances might have been made the subject of the justest complaints, the King of France did not think it proper to require that the freedom and independency of the subjects of the republic should be restrained in branches of"com merce that were not inconsistent with its neutrality, per suaded that the faith of an engagement ought to be in violately preserved, though attended with some accidental and trivial inconvenience. He then told them, that the king his master had ordered the generals of his army carefully to avoid encroaching on the territory of the republic, and transferring thither the theatre of the war, when his enemies retreated that way before they were forced to pass the Ilimne. After such unquestionable marks of regard, he said, his king would have the justest ground of complaint, if, contrary to expectation, he should hear that the artillery and stores belonging to him were now exposed to the view of an enemy. Thirdly, he declared that all such detentions would be construed as a violation of the neutrality; and demanded, in the name of the king his master, that the artillery and stores should, without delay, be restored to him; and if the same were not done, he would claim the satisfaction of putting an end to the inland navigation. This last argument was so conclusive, that they immediately granted the necessary pass ports; in consequence of which the cannon were convey ed to the Austrian Netherlands.
§ XL The powers in the southern parts of Europe were too much engrossed with their own concerns to interest themselves deeply in the quarrels that distracted the German empire. The King of Spain, naturally of a melancholy complex and delicate constitution, was so deeply affected with the loss of his queen, who died in the course of the preceding year, that he renounced all com pany, neglected all business, and immured himself in a chamber at Villa-Vicosa, where he gave a loose to the most extravagant sorrow. He abstained from food and rest until his strength was quite exhausted. He would neither shift himself nor allow his beard to be shaved; he rejected all attempts of consolation; and remained dea to the most earnest and respectful remonstrances of those who had a right to render their advice. In this case, the affliction of the mind must have been reinforced by some peculiarity in the constitution. He inherited a melancholy disposition from his father, who had been much affected as a family disease; for the Infant Don Louis, who like wise resided in the palace of Villa-Vicosa, was fam to amuse himself with hunting, and other diversions, to prevent his being affected with the king's disorder, which continued to gain ground, notwithstanding all the efforts of medicine. The Spanish nation, naturally superstitious, had recourse to saints and relics: but they seemed insensible to all their devotion. The king, however, in the midst of all these disorders, presented a very calm and tranquil appearance to the world, which was patronised by the Count de Valparaiso and signed by the Duke de Bejar, high-chancellor of the kingdom. The exorbitancy of his grief, and the mortifications he underwent, soon produced an incurable malady, under which he languished from the month of September in the preceding year till the tenth of August in the present, when he expired. In his will, which was bequeathed to his brother Don Carlos, King of Naples, successor to the crown of Spain, he designated the queen dowager as regent of the kingdom until that prince should arrive. Accordingly, she assumed the reins of government, and gave directions for the funeral of the deceased king, who was interred with great pomp in the church belonging to the convent of the Visitacion at Madrid.

§ XLI. As the death of this prince had been long expected, so the politicians of Europe had universally prognosticated that his demise would be attended with great commotions in Italy. It had been agreed among the subscribing powers to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, that in case Don Carlos should be advanced in the course of succession to the throne of Spain, his brother Don Philip should be admitted on the throne of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, which now constituted his establishment, should revert to the house of Austria. The King of Naples had never acceded to this article; therefore he paid no regard to it on the death of his brother: but retained his mind on the claims of the emperor to the throne of Parma, which he knew was at that time in no condition to support her pretensions. Thus the German war proved a circumstance very favourable to his interest and ambition. Before his brother embarked for Spain, however, he took some extraordinary steps, which evinced him a sound politician and sagacious legislator. His eldest son Don Philip, who had now attained the thirteenth year of his age, being found in a state of incurable idiocy, was wholly and resolutely removed from him by the succession, without any regard to the pretended right of primogeniture, by a solemn act of abdication, and the settlement of the crown of the Two Sicilies in favour of his third son, Don Ferdinand. In this extraordinary act he observes, That, according to the spirit of the treaties of this age, Europe required that the sovereignty of Spain should be separated from that of Italy, where such a separation could be effected by either prince rejecting the rules of justice: that the unfortunate prince-royal having been destitute of reason and reflection ever since his infancy, and no hope remaining that he could ever acquire the use of these faculties, he could not think of raising any claim to the succession, as it was not an agreeable scene for such a disposition to be made to nature and his paternal affection: he was therefore constrained, by the Divine will, to set him aside, in favour of his third son Don Ferdinand, whose minority obliged him to vest the management of these realms in a regency, which he accordingly appointed, after having previously declared his son Ferdinand from that time emancipated and freed from not only all obedience to his paternal power, but even from all submission to his supreme and sovereign authority. He then declared that the minority of the prince succeeding to the kingdom of the Two Sicilies should expire with the fifteenth year of his age, when he should act as sovereign, and have the entire power of the administration. He next established and explained the order of succession in the male and female line; on condition that the monarchy of Spain should never be united with the kingdoms of the Two Sicilies: he transferred and assigned the crown to his said Don Ferdinand, these kingdoms with all that he possessed in Italy: and this ordinance, signed and sealed by himself and the infant Don Ferdinand, and countersigned by the councillors and secretaries of state, in several manufactures of the most usual forms of authenticity. Don Carlos having taken these precautions for the benefit of his third son, whom he left King of Naples, embarked with the rest of his family on board a Spanish vessel, and arrived at Cadiz, where a fleet, under the command of Don Pedro de Torres Nova, and Conde de Santa Cruz, was hereditary lord-steward of the king's household, and president of the palace-cour, or last tribunal of appeal in the kingdom, in which he possessed the first office at the palace. In the same year, Francisca de Asur, Marquis of Tavora, Conde of St. John and Alvor, was general of the horse, and head of the third noble house of the Tavoras, the most illustrious family in the kingdom, deriving their origin from the ancient Kings of Leon; he married his cousin, who was Marchioness of Tavora in her own right, and by this marriage acquired the marquisate. Louis Bernardo de Tavora was their eldest son, who, by virtue of a dispensation from the Pope, had espoused without his consent, his own aunt, Donna Theresa de Tavora. Joseph Maria de Tavora, his youngest brother, was also involved in the guilt of his parents. The third principal concerned was Don Jeronimo de Ataurde, Conde of Ataurque, a nobleman, in whose marriage the Marquis of Tavora was present. The characters of all these personages were unblemished and respectable, until this machination was detected. In the course of investigating this dark affair, it appeared that the Duke de Aaverro had conceived a personal hatred to the king, who had disappointed him in a projected match between his son and a sister of the Duke de Cadaval, a minor, and prevented his obtaining some commandery which the late Duke de Aaverro had possessed; that this nobleman, being determined to gratify his revenge against the person of his sovereign, had exerted all his art and address in securing the participation of the malcontents; that with this view he reconciled himself to the Jusvits, with whom he had been formerly

7 Though his royal highness Don Philip is thirtynine years old, he is of low stature, and has neither the figure nor the form of a prince-royal. He has a countenance like that of his father, and is both of a very poor health.
8 His mother is so delicate in his joints; that he can scarcely rise, and make use of them upon all occasions.
9 His head is apt to swim and to hold down his head, as people of weak eyes often do.
10 He is remarkably slow in his actions; and his eyes frequently water and are gouty, particularly in his left eye, though we cannot say in his body, but in all the other members, as his half bloodsman can without those distinguishing objects, both as to the colour and sensation.
11 As he has some indigestion, he is sometimes indifferent to things that are convenient for him, and at other times is too warm and impatient. In general, his passions are not restrained by reason.
12 His prince has an obstinate aversion to some kind of common food, such as fruits, sauces, etc.
13 He is subject to sudden swells and to dictionary, and it has the same effect whether it be soft or harshness, or harshness and diabetes.
14 He is subject to the same malady, some times not long after weak and lasting, and he is utterly unacquainted with all the sensations of weak and sudden breathing.
15 As in beds and places, he sometimes remembers them, and some occasions, and is still subject to his own dreams, or the least suggestion of the holy religion.

at variance, knowing they were at this time implacably assailed against the king, who had dismissed them from their office of penitentiaries at court, and branded them with other marks of disgrace, on account of their illegal and rebellious practices in South America: the duke, implied that any such nature of results, were it brought Marchioness of Tavorn, notwithstanding an inveterate rivality of pride and ambition, which had long subsisted between the two families. Her resentment against the king was increased by her apprehensions; she feared the repeated repulses, when she solicited the title of duke for her husband. Her passions were artfully fomented and managed by the Jesuits, to whom she had resigned the government of her conscience; and they are said to have persuaded her that she would be a monarch by inheritance to take away the life of a prince who was an enemy to the church and a tyrant to his people. She, being reconciled to the scheme of assassination, exerted her influence in such a manner as to inveigle her husband, her sons, and son-in-law, into the same infamous design; and yet this lady had been always remarkable for her piety, affability, and sweetness of disposition. Many consultations were held between the college and the Marchioness, St.

Anton, and St. Roque, as well as at the houses of the duke and the marquis. At last they resolved that the king should be assassinated; and employed two ruffians, called Antonio Alvarez and Joseph Policarpo, for the execution of the design, for their meeting was fixed for the month of February, among the transactions of the preceding year.

In the beginning of January, before the circumstances of the conspiracy were known, the Comts de Oebers and de Hilera Grande were imprisoned in the castle of St.

Julian, on a suspicion arising from their freedom of speech. The Duchess de Aveiro, the Countess of Atou-guia, and the Marchioness of Alorna, with their children, were sent off to the convents of São Domingos, where they were taken into custody. A council being appointed for the trial of the prisoners, the particulars we have related were brought to light by the torture; and sentence of death was pronounced and executed upon the convicted criminals.

Eight wheels were fixed upon a scaffold raised in the square opposite to the house where the prisoners had been confined; and the thirteenth of January was fixed for the day of execution. Antonio Alvarez Forreiga, one of the assassins who had fired into the king's equigage, was fixed to a stake at one corner of the scaffold; and at the other was placed the effigies of his accomplice, Joseph Policarpo de Avezedo, who had made his escape. The Marchioness of Tavorn, being brought upon the scaffold between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, was beheaded with one stroke, and then covered with a linen cloth.

Her two sons, and her son-in-law, the Count of Atouguia, with three servants of the Duke de Aveiro, were first strangled at the seat of the Parochial College, where their bodies remained covered; but the duke and the marquis, as chiefs of the conspiracy, were broke alive, and underwent the most executing tormentors. The last that suffered was the assassin Alvarez, who being condemned to be burnt alive, the combustibles which had been placed under the scaffold were set on fire, the whole machine, with the bodies, consumed to ashes, and these ashes thrown into the sea. The estates of the three unfortunate noblemen were confined into the hands of the houses rated to the ground. The name of Tavorn was suppressed for ever by a public decree: but that of Mascarenhas spared, because the Duke de Aveiro was a younger branch of the family. A reward of ten thousand crowns was offered to any person who should apprehend the assassin who had escaped; then the embargo was taken off the shipping. The king and royal family assisted at a public Te Deum sung in the chapel of Nova Senhora de Livramento; and that, for the satisfaction of his people, waved his handkerchief with both hands, to show he was not maimed by the wounds he had received. If such an attempt upon the life of a prince, as the subject of this narrative, would be thought sufficient to be considered as an attempt to bequeath to his people, the great and able conduct of his majesty's general, Prince

Ferdinand of Brunswick, who was considered, that action must have been motivated by that most horrid design.

However, if any thing could fill the breasts of his majesty's good subjects with still further degrees of exultation, it would be the distinguished and unbroken value of the British troops, owned and applauded by those whom they overcame. He said the glory they had gained was not merely their own; but, in a national view, was one of the most important circumstances of our success, as it must be a strong addition to our credit to our engagements whom they have to contend. He told them that his majesty's good brother and ally, the King of Prussia, attacked and surrounded by so many considerable powers, had, by his magnanimity and ability, saved his troops, been able, in a surprising manner, to prevent the mischiefs concerted with such united force against him. He declared, by the command of his sovereign, that as his majesty entered into this war not from views of ambition, so he did not wish to retire from motives of resentment; that the desire of his majesty's heart was to see a stop put to the effusion of Christian blood; that whenever such terms of peace could be established as should be just and honourable for his majesty and his allies; and by procuring such advantages as, from the successes of his majesty's arms might in reason and equity be expected, should bring along with them full security for the future; his majesty would rejoice to see the repose of Europe restored on such solid and durable foundations; and his faithful subjects, to whose liberal support and unshaken firmness his majesty owed so much, happy in the enjoyment of the blessings of peace and tranquillity; but, in order to this great and desirable end, his majesty was confident was perfectly prepared to agree with him, that it was necessary to make ample provision for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmost vigour. He assured the Commons, that the great supplies that had been in the last session, the parliament had been so happily employed for the purposes for which they were granted; but the uncommon extent of the war, and the various services necessary to be provided for, in order to secure success to his majesty's measures, had unavoidably occasioned extraordinary expenses. Finally, he repeated the assurances from the throne of the high satisfaction his majesty took in that union and good harmony which was so conspicuous among his good subjects; he said, all great powers, and himself especially, had entertained the hope, that it continued now confirmed; he observed that experience had shown how much the nation owed to this union, which alone could secure the true happiness of his people.

§ XLIV. We shall not anticipate the reader's own reflection, by pretending to comment upon either the matter or the form of this harangue, which however produced all the effect which the sovereign could desire. The Houses, in their respective addresses, seemed to vie with each other in expressions of attachment and concinnity. The Peers professed their utmost readiness to concur in the effectual support of such further measures as his majesty, in his great wisdom, should judge necessary or expedient for carrying on the war, with vigour, without imposing and repelling any desperate attempts which might be made upon these kingdoms. The Commons expressed their admiration of that true greatness of mind which disposed his majesty's heart, in the midst of prospects, to wish a stop put to the effusion of Christian blood, and to see tranquillity restored. They declared their entire reliance on his majesty's known wisdom and firmness, that the desirable object, whenever it should be obtained, would be upon terms just and honourable for his majesty and his allies; and, in order to effect that great end, they assured him they would cheerfully grant such supplies as should be found necessary to sustain, and press with all the utmost vigour, against the enemies of the state.

They did not fail to re-echo the speech, as usual: enumerating the triumphs of the year, and extolling the King of Prussia for his consummate genius, magnanimity, unwearied activity, and unwakened constancy of mind. Very great reason, indeed, had his majesty to be satisfied with an address of such a nature from a House of Commons, in which opposition lay strangled at the foot of the minister; in which those demagogues, who had raised themselves to reputation by declaiming against continental wars, measures, were become so perfectly reconciled to the object of their former reprobation, as to cultivate it even with a degree of enthusiasm unknown to any former administration. They ought, perhaps, to be permitted under some counts in our behalf, as no other ministry durst ever meditate. Thus disposed, it was no wonder they admired the moderation of their sovereign, in offering to treat of peace, after above a million of men had perished by the war, and twice that number been reduced to misery: after whole provinces had been depopulated, and countries subdued, and the victors themselves almost crushed by the trophies they had gained.

§ XLV. Immediately after the addresses were presented, the Commons resolved themselves into a committee of the whole House; and having unanimously voted a supply to his majesty, began to take the particulars into consideration. This committee was continued till the twelfth of May, when there were ordered such bills, the service of the ensuing year, they voted seventy thousand seamen, including eighteen thousand three hundred and fifty-five marines; and for their maintenance allotted three millions six hundred and forty thousand pounds. The number of land forces, including the British troops in Germany, and the invalids, they fixed at fifty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety-four men, and granted for their subsistence one million three hundred eighty-three thousand seven hundred and forty-eight pounds, sixty-six shillings, and sixpence. They granted for the maintenance of thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty men, being the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttel, Saxo-Gotha, and Buckeburg, returned in the service of Great Britain, the sum of four hundred thousand pounds, ten thousand pounds, ten shillings, and one penny. For pay to the general and general staff-officers, and officers of the houses of parliament, they fixed fifty-four thousand four hundred and fifty-four pounds, ten shillings, and nine pence. For pay to the officers of the militia in South and North Britain the sum of one hundred two thousand and six pounds, four shillings, and eight pence. They granted for the maintenance of thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty one hundred and sixty-eight pounds, twelve shillings, and seven pence, for defraying the additional expense of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Hessia, and the British army serving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to sea-officers; for carrying on the building of two hospitals, one near Gosport, and the other in the neighbourhood of Plymouth; for the support of the hospitals at Greenwich, Woolwich, at the Navy-ships, and other accommodations necessary for refitting the fleets at Halifax, in Nova Scotia; for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expense incurred by that office in the commission for the pounds, ten shillings, and five pence half-penny; and for nineteen thousand four hundred and twenty-seven pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. Towards paying off the debt, buildings, rebuilding, and repairs of the king's ships, together with the charges of transport service, they granted one million one hundred and one thousand seventy-eight pounds, sixteen shillings, and sixpence. For defraying the extraordinary expenses of the land forces and other services not provided for by the foregoing bills, they voted thirty thousand pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. For the maintenance of eighty-three thousand seven hundred and forty-four pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. For the pay of the army, for defraying the additional expense of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Hessia, and the British army serving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to sea-officers; for defraying the extraordinary expenses of the land forces and other services not provided for by the foregoing bills, they voted thirty thousand pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. For the support of the hospitals at Greenwich, Woolwich, and the Navy-ships, and other accommodations necessary for refitting the fleets at Halifax, in Nova Scotia; for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expense incurred by that office in the commission for the pounds, ten shillings, and five pence half-penny. They voted one million to empower his majesty to discharge the like sums as would be requisite in successive years. For the service of the ensuing year, they voted seventy thousand seamen, including eighteen thousand three hundred and fifty-five marines; and for their maintenance allotted three millions six hundred and forty thousand pounds. The number of land forces, including the British troops in Germany, and the invalids, they fixed at fifty-seven thousand two hundred and ninety-four men, and granted for their subsistence one million three hundred eighty-three thousand seven hundred and forty-eight pounds, sixty-six shillings, and sixpence. They afterwards bestowed the sum of one hundred and eight thousand and twelve pounds, twelve shillings, and seven pence, for defraying the additional expense of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Hessia, and the British army serving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to sea-officers; for carrying on the building of two hospitals, one near Gosport, and the other in the neighbourhood of Plymouth; for the support of the hospitals at Greenwich, Woolwich, and the Navy-ships, and other accommodations necessary for refitting the fleets at Halifax, in Nova Scotia; for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expense incurred by that office in the commission for the pounds, ten shillings, and five pence half-penny; and for nineteen thousand four hundred and twenty-seven pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. Towards paying off the debt, buildings, rebuilding, and repairs of the king's ships, together with the charges of transport service, they granted one million one hundred and one thousand seventy-eight pounds, sixteen shillings, and sixpence.
present magazine for gunpowder, situated in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, and of erecting in it some less dangerous situation. Sixty thousand pounds they gave, to defray the expenses of twenty-one procs. of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, pursuant to the separate article of a treaty between the two powers, renewed in the month of November, the sum to be paid at his most serene highness's convenience, in order to facilitate the means by which the landgrave might again fix his residence in his own dominions, and, by his presence, give fresh courage to his faithful subjects. Five hundred thousand pounds, from the said thousand pounds to be supplied towards defraying the charges of forage, bread, bread-waggons, train of artillery, wood, straw, provisions, and contingencies of his majesty's combined army under the command of Prince Ferdinand. To the Foundling hospital they granted five thousand pounds; and fifteen thousand for improving, widening, and enlarging the passage over and through London bridge. To replace divers sums taken from the sinking fund, they granting two hundred twenty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-one pounds, nineteen shillings, and four pence. For the subsistence of reduced officers, including the allowances to the several officers and private men of the troops of horse-guards, they granted seven shillings, and two pence, and, the subsequent gentlemen of the four troops of horse-guard, they voted thirty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-seven pounds, nine shillings. Upon account for the support of the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they granted twenty thousand pounds, for defraying the charges of prov-ings, and forty pounds, for the support of an additional company to the corps commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Vaughan. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, to enable the king to defray any extraordinary expenses of the war, incurred or to be incurred, for the service of the year: one thousand seven hundred and sixty; and to take all such measures as might be necessary to defeat any enterprise or design of his enemies, they thought it expedient to make the sum total granted in this session of parliament amounted to fifteen millions five thousand three hundred and sixty-three pounds, fifteen shillings, and nine pence halfpenny; a sum so enormous, whether we consider the motion that raised it, or the purposes for which it was raised, that every Briton of a sedate mind, attached to the interest and welfare of his country, must reflect upon it with equal astonishment and concern: a sum considerably more than double the largest subsidy that was granted in the reign of Queen Anne, when the nation was in the zenith of her glory, and retained half the powers of Europe in her pay; a sum almost double of what any former administration did expend and raise. And yet, when we view the most sanguine calculators, who lived in the beginning of this century, thought the nation could give without the most imminent hazard of immediate bankruptcy. Of the immense supply which we have particularized, the further three millions four hundred and sixty-four thousand four hundred and eighty-six pounds, sixteen shillings, and seven pence three farthings, were paid to foreigners for supporting the war in Germany, exclusive of the money expended by the British troops in that country, the number of which amounted, in the course of the ensuing year, to twenty thousand men: a number the more extraordinary, if we consider they were all transported to that continent during the administration of those who declared in parliament (the words still sounding in our ears) that not a man, nor even half a man, should be sent from Great Britain to Germany, to fight the battles of any foreign elector. Into the expense of the German war Sustained by Great Britain, we must also throw the charge of transporting the English troops; the article of forage, which alone amounted, in the course of the last campaign, to one million two hundred thousand pounds, besides postage, and other considerable sums. To the German war we may also impute the extraordinary expense incurred by the actual service of the militia, which the absence of the regular troops rendered in a great measure necessary. Of one thing, we may safely draw from industry, from husbandry and manufacture.
The loss sustained by this connexion was equally grievous and apparent; the advantage accruing from it, either to

A.D. 1759.—Book III.

§ XLVI. The committee of ways and means, having been duly deliberated on the articles of supply, continued sitting from the twenty-second day of November to the fourteenth of May, during which period they established the necessary funds to produce which they had been granted. The land tax at four shillings in the pound, and the malt tax, were continued, as the standing revenue of Great Britain. The whole provision made by the committee of ways and means amounted to sixteen millions one hundred thirty thousand pounds, besides about six hundred thousand pounds, and eight peace, exceeding the grants for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, in the sum of six hundred twenty-six thousand nine hundred ninety-seven pounds, thirteen shillings, and ten pence halfpenny. This excess, however, will not appear extraordinary, when we consider that it was destined to make good the premium of two hundred and forty thousand pounds to the subscribers upon the eight million loan, as well as the deficiencies in the other grants, which never fail to make a considerable article in the supply of every session. That these gigantic strides towards the ruin of public credit were such as might alarm every well-wisher to his country, will perhaps more plainly appear in the sum total of the national debt, which, including the encumbrance of one million charged upon the civil list revenue, and provided for by a tax upon salaries and pensions payable out of that revenue, amounted to this period, to the sum of one hundred eight millions four hundred ninety-three thousand one hundred fifty-four pounds, four shillings, and eleven pence; a comfortable reflection that the national debt, which had been in the more expensive war that ever was waged, and already burdened with such taxes as no other nation ever bore!

§ XLVII. It is not at all necessary to particularize the act, that was founded upon the resolutions touching the supply. We shall only observe, that, in the act for the land tax, and in the act for the malt tax, there was a clause of credit empowering the commissioners of the treasury to raise the additional duties upon them for the supply, on exchequer-bills, bearing an interest of four per cent. per annum, that is, one per cent. higher than the interest usually granted in time of peace. While the House of Commons deliberated on the bill for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising a certain sum of money to be charged on the said duties, a petition was presented by the malsters of Ipswich and parts adjacent against an additional duty on the stock of malt in hand; but no resolution was then taken in that respect, and the act passed, with several new amendments, passed through both Houses, under the title of "An act for granting to his majesty several duties upon malt, and for raising the sum of eight millions four hundred thousand pounds to be charged on the said duties; and to prevent the fraudulent obtaining of allowances in the gaugings of corn making into malt; and for making fictitious duplicates of exchequer-bills, tickets, certificates, receipts, annuities, and other orders lost, burned, or otherwise destroyed." The other three bills that turned wholly on the supply, were passed in common course, without the least opposition in either House; and received the royal assent by commission at the end of the session. The first of these, entitled, "A bill for enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money for the uses and purposes therein mentioned," contained a clause of approbation, added to it by instruction; and the bank was enabled to lend the million which the commissioners of the treasury were empowered by the act to borrow, at the interest of four pounds per cent. The second, granting to his majesty a certain sum of money out of the sinking fund, for the payment of the one thousand seven hundred and sixty, comprehended a clause of credit for borrowing the money thereby granted; and another clause, empowering the bank to lend it without any limitation of interest, enabling his majesty to raise a certain sum of money towards discharging the debt of the navy, and for naval services during the ensuing year, enacted, that the exchequer-bills thereby to be issued should not be received, or pass to any receiver or collector of the public revenue, or at the receipt of the exchequer, before the twenty-sixth day of March in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one.

§ XLVIII. As the preceding session, prohibiting the malt distillery, was to expire at Christmas, the Commons, thinking it necessary to consider of proper methods for laying the malt distillery under such regulations as should be for the advantage of the health and morals of the people, began, as early as the month of November to deliberate on this affair; which being under agitation, petitions were presented to the House of Commons, in behalf of the principal inhabitants of Spital-fields, the mayor and corporation of Newcastle, the gentlemen, clergy, merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of Colchester; the mayor, aldermen, and common council of King's Lynn in Norfolk; the mayor and bailiffs of Berwick-upon-Tweed; representing the advantages accruing from the prohibition of the malt distillery, and praying the continuance of the act by which it was prohibited. On the other hand, coutret-petitions were offered by the mayor, magistrates, merchants, manufactur- ers, and other gentlemen of the city of Norwich; by the landholders and owners of the south-west part of Essex; and by the freeholders of the shires of Ross and Cromartyt, in North Britain: alleging, that the scarcity of corn, which had made it necessary to prohibit the malt distillery, had ceased; and that the continuing the prohibition beyond the necessity which had required it, would be a great loss and discouragement to the landed interest; because they thought the distillery which had again opened, under such regulations and restrictions as the House should think proper. These remonstrances being taken into consideration, and divers accounts perused, the House of Commons agreed that the prohibition should be continued for a limited time; and a bill being brought in, pursuant to this resolution, passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent; by which it was provided, that the prohibition should be continued till the twenty-fourth day of December in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty, unless such continuance should be abrogated by any other act to be passed in the present session.
detrimental to the commercial interests of the nation; and they conceived the advantages proposed to be allowed upon the exportation of such spirits, being so much above the value of their commodity, would lay such a temptation for corruption amongst the retailers, and would enable them freely to express their fears, that, should such a bill pass into a law, the excessive use of spirituous liquors would not only deplete and enervate the labourers, manufacturers, sailors, soldiers, and all the lower class of people, and thereby extirpate the moral and religious economy we may have had lately so eminently appeared in the British nation, which must always depend on the vigour and industry of its people; but also its liberty and happiness, which cannot be respected when, for the purpose of惟ting the run the utmost risk of being destroyed. They declared themselves also apprehensive, that the extraordinary consumption of bread corn by the still would not only raise the prices, so as to oppress the lower class of people, but would raise such a bar to the exportation thereof, as to deprive the nation of a great influx of money, at that time essential towards the maintaining of an expensive war, and therefore highly favourable to the landed and commercial interest; they therefore prayed that the present prohibition of distilling spirits from corn might be continued, or that the use of wheat might not be allowed in distillation. This remonstrance was corroborated by another to the same effect from some merchants, and traders residing in and near the city of London; and seemed to have some weight with the Commons, who made several amendments in the bill, which they now enacted; one of which was, that spirituous liquors, by laying additional duties thereon; for shortening the prohibition for making low wines and spirits from wheat; for encouraging the exportation of British-made spirits, and preventing the importation thereof. Thus altered and amended, it passed on a division; and, making its way through the House of Lords, acquired the royal sanction. Whether the law be adequate to the purposes for which it was enacted, time will determine. The best way of preventing the excess of spirituous liquors would be to lower the excise on beer and ale, so as to enable the poorer class of labourers to refresh themselves with a comfortable liquor for nearly the same expense that will procure a quantity of geneva sufficient for intoxication; for it cannot be supposed that a poor wretch will expend his last penny upon a draft of small beer, without strength or the least satisfaction. When the word is heard that he can purchase a cordial, that will both instantaneously allay the sense of hunger and cold, and regale his imagination with the most agreeable illusions. Malt was at this time sold for the first year of King James I., when the parliament enacted, that the malt-monger, brewer, or ale-housekeeper, should sell less than a full quart of the best ale or beer, or two quarts of the small, for one penny, under the penalty of twenty shillings. It appears, then, that in the reign of King James the subject paid but four pence for a gallon of strong beer, which now costs one shilling; and, as the malt is not increased in value, the difference in the prices in the bills must entirely owing to the taxes on beer, malt, and hops, which are indeed very grievous, though perhaps necessary. The duty on small beer is certainly one of the heaviest taxes imposed upon any sort of consumption that cannot be considered as an article of offence, and with half a crown of shilling and hop duty, are required to make a barrel of good small beer, which was formerly sold for six shillings; and the taxes payable upon such a barrel amounted to three shillings and sixpence; so that the sum total of the imposition on this commodity was equal to a land tax of eleven shillings and eight pence in the pound.

§. L. Immediately after the resolution relating to the prohibition of spirits from wheat, a motion was made, and least stringent, that on an amendment for that purpose; at the time, the act of the last session, permitting the importation of salted beef from Ireland. This permission was accordingly extended to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the annual hundred of Freelance. We could mention but little probability this short and temporary connexion was proposed by the favourers of the bill, in order to avoid the clamour and opposition of prejudice and ignorance, which would have been dangerously alarmed had it been rendered perpetual. Yet as undoubted evidence had proved before the committee, while the bill was being, that the importation had been injurious to the producers of beef in this country in reducing the price of salted beef for the use of the navy, perhaps no consideration ought to have prevented from the legislature from perpetuating the law; a measure that would encourage the graziers of Ireland to breed and fattening horses, and give new life to that industry which the exportation of salted beef from that kingdom to France, which undoubtedly furnishes the traders of that kingdom with opportunities of exporting wool to the same country. But, as several reasons, suspended all proceedings in the execution of the laws relating to the militia for limited times, which suspensions were deemed inconsistent with the intent of the legislature, a bill was now brought in, to enable his majesty's lieutenants of the several counties of England and Wales to proceed in the execution of the militia laws, notwithstanding any adjournments. It was enacted, that, as the speedy execution of the laws for regulating the militia was most essentially necessary at this juncture to the peace and security of the kingdom, every lieutenant of the place where such suspension had happened should, within one month after the passing this act, proceed if it is necessary, with the谘生素 of the militia for the better security of the place. The regiment of a regular militia in South Britain could not fail to make an impression upon the patriots of Scotland. They were conceived, from reason and experience, that nothing the field could do to their country by such an establishment in North Britain, the inhabitants of which had been peculiarly exposed to insurrections, which a well-regulated militia might have prevented, or stifled in the birth; and their coast had been lately alarmed by a threatened invasion, which nothing but the want of such an establishment had rendered formidable to the natives. They thought themselves entitled to the same security which the legislature had provided for their fellow-subjects in South Britain, and could not help being uneasy at the prospect of seeing themselves left unarmed, and exposed to injuries both foreign and domestic, while the sword was put in the hands of their southern neighbours. Some of the members who represented North Britain in parliament, moved by these considerations, as well as by the earnest injunctions of their constituents, resolved to make a vigorous effort, in order to obtain the establishment of a regular militia in that country. In the House of Commons, Mr. Tweed moved and resolved, that the House would, on the twelfth day of the month, resolve itself into a committee, to consider of the laws in being which relate to the militia in that part of Great Britain called Scotland. The result of that inquiry was, that these laws were ineffectual. Then a motion was made for leave to bring in a bill for the better ordering of the militia forces in North Britain, and, though it met with great opposition, was carried by a large majority. The principal Scottish members of the House were appointed, in conjunction with others, to prepare the bill, which was soon printed, and reinforced by petitions presented by the several counties of Scotland and other parts. They requested the commissioners of the supply for the shire of Ayr; and by the freeholders of the shires of Edinburgh, Stirling, Perth, and Forfar. They expressed their approbation of the established militia in England, and their ardent wish to see the benefit of that wise and salutary measure conferred on North Britain. This was an indulgence they had the greater reason to hope for, as by the articles of the Union they were undoubtedly entitled to be on the same footing as those of England; and as the legislature must now be convinced of the necessity of some such measures, by the consternation lately produced in their defenceless country, from the threatened invasion of a great body of French soldiers, to no weight with the majority in the House of Commons, who, either unable or unwilling to make proper distinctions between the ill and well affected subjects of North Britain, rejected the bill, as a very dangerous experiment in favour of a people among whom so many rebellions had been implanted and produced. When the motion was made for the bill's being committed, a warm debate ensued, in the course of which many Scottish members spoke in behalf of their country with great force and argument, and a very laudable spirit of patriotism. Mr. Eildon, in particular, one of the commissioners of the board of admiralty, distinguished himself by a noble flow of eloquence, adorned with all the graces of oratory, and warned with the true spirit of patriotism. Mr. Oswald, of the treasury, acquitted himself with great honour on the occasion; ever nervous, steady, and sagacious, independent though in office, and invariable in pursuing the interest of his country. It must be owned, for the honour of North Britain that all her representatives, except two, warmly contended for this national measure, which was carried in the negative by a majority of one hundred and six, though the bill was exactly modelled by the late act of parliament for the establishment of the militia in England.

§ LII. Even this institution, though certainly laudable and necessary, was attended with so many unforeseen difficulties that the militia of Parliament, even when it was first established, has produced new acts for its better regulation. In April,leave was given to prepare a bill for limiting, confining, and better regulating the payment of the militia's wages, which was made by the act of parliament, for the maintenance of families unable to support themselves during the absence of militia men embodied, and ordered out into actual service; as well as for amending and improving the establishment of the militia, and lessening the number of commissioned officers entitled to serve that part of Great Britain called England. While this bill was under consideration, the House received a petition from the mayor, aldermen, town-clerk, sheriffs, gentlemen, merchants, clergy, tradesmen, and others, inhabitants of the ancient city of Lincoln, representing, That by an act passed relating to the militia, it was provided, that when any militia man should be ordered out into actual service, leaving families unable to support themselves during their absence, the overseers of the parish where such families reside, should allow them such weekly support as should be prescribed by any one justice of the peace, which allowance should be reimbursed out of the county stock. They alleged, that a considerable number of men, inhabitants of the said city, had entered themselves to serve in the militia of the county of Lincoln, as volunteers, for several parishes and persons; yet their families were, nevertheless, supported only by the county stock of the city and county of the city of Lincoln. They took notice of the bill under deliberation, and prayed that if it should pass into a law, they might have such relief in the premises, as to the House should seem meet. Regard was had to this petition in the amendments to the bill,² which passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent by commission. During the dependence of this bill another was brought in, to explain so much of the militia passed in the thirty-first year of his majesty's reign, as related to the money to be given to private militia men, upon their being ordered out into actual service. By this law it was enacted, that the guineas, which by the former act was due to every private man of every regiment or company of militia, when ordered out into actual service, should be paid to every man that shall afterwards be enrolled into such regiment or company whilst in actual service; that no money should be entitled to his clothes for his own use, until he should have served three years, if unembodied, or one year, if embodied, after the delivery of the clothes; and that the full pay of the militia should commence from his majesty's warrant for drawing them out. The difficulties which attend the raising and maintaining a militia, whatever it may be, will be amply recompensed by the good effects of a national militia, provided it be employed in a national way; and for national purposes: but if the militia be embodied, and the wages given as mentioned in the above paragraph, the payment is made to the respective counties to which they belong; if the men are detailed for any length of time in actual service, at a distance from their families, when they might be employed at home in works of industry, for the support of their families, dependent upon the nation; it will be more than an addition to, or augmentation of, a standing army, enlisted for the term of three years. The labour of the men is lost to the community; they contract the sitt habits and dissolve manners of the other troops; their families are left as encumbrances on the community; and the charge of their subsistence is at least as heavy as that of maintaining an equal number of regular forces. It would not, we apprehend, be very easy to account for the government's ordering the regiments of militia to march from their respective counties, and to do duty for a considerable length of time at a great distance from their own homes, unless we suppose this measure was taken to create to the people a spirit of discipline and order, and to enforce that it was an establishment extorted from the secretary by the voice of the nation. We may add, that some of the inconveniences attending a militia will never be totally removed, and will move even at liberty to hire substitutes; for it cannot be supposed that men of substance will incur the danger, fatigue, and damage of service in person, while they can hire among the lowest classes of people mercenaries of desperate fortune and abandoned morals, who will greedily seize the opportunity of being paid for reconnecting that labour by which they were before obliged to maintain themselves and their family connexion; it would, therefore, deserve the censure of the legislature, whether the number of substitutes should not be limited to certain classes of men, who are either raised by their rank in life above the necessity of serving in person, or engaged in such occupations as cannot be interrupted without prejudice to the commonwealth. It must be allowed, that the regulation in this new act, by which the families of substitutes are deprived of any relief from the parish, will not only diminish the burden of the poor's rates; but also, by raising the price of mercenaries, oblige a greater number of the better sort to serve in person. Without all doubt the fewer substitutes that are employed, the more dependence may be placed upon the militia in the preservation of our rights; and the number of men whose trade is that of discipline may be increased: because at the expiration of every three years the lot men must be changed, and new militia men chosen; but the substitutes will, in all probability, continue for life in the service, provided they can find lot men to hire them at every rotation. The reader will forgive our being so circumstantial upon the regulations of an institution, which we cannot help regarding with a kind of enthusiastic affection.

² By this law it was enacted, that if any militia man who shall have been accepted as substitute, be disabled by the passing of the act, or who shall have been chosen by lot, whether before or after the act shall have been made, or called out in actual service, and ordered to march, leave a family unable to support themselves, or to be enrolled in the company, the pay out of the poor's rates of such parish a weekly allowance to such family, according to the usual and ordinary price of labour and maintenance, but not to exceed there, viz. for one child under the age of ten years, the price of one day's labour, for two children under the age of ten years, the price of two days' labour, for thee or four children under the age of ten years, the price of three days' labour, for five or more children, the price of four days' labour; and for the wife of such militia man, the price of one day's labour; but that the families of such men only as shall be accepted and enrolled, shall, after the passing of this act, receive any such allowance as shall be made under this act, as a substitute for the price of the above petition, it is enacted, that where treasurers shall reimburse to over-to treachery and every other accident. They alleged, that if, through treachery, lighting, or any other accident, this magazine should take fire, not only their lives and properties, but the palace and hospital, the king's yards and stables, and the houses of Woolwich, together with the navigation of the Thames, with the ships sailing and at anchor in that river, would be inevitably destroyed, and inconceivable damage would accrue to the cities of London and Westminster. Therefore, in order to obviate the mischief that might ensue, they were then in a dangerous condition, supported on all sides by props that were decayed at the foundation; that in case it should fall, the powder would, in all probability, take the dreadful calamities above recited: they therefore prayed that the magazine might be removed to some more convenient place, where any accident would not be attended with such dismal consequences.

The subject of this remonstrance was so pressing and important, that a committee was immediately appointed to take the affair into consideration, and procure an estimate for purchasing lands, and erecting a powder-magazine, at Purfleet, in Essex, near the banks of the river, together with a guard-house, barracks, and all other necessary conveniences. While the report of the committee lay upon the table for the perusal of the members, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his majesty's command, acquainted the House, that the king, having been informed of the state of the magazine, immediately directed that the necessary measures should be taken to remove the party-walls, and that the magazine might be rebuilt, or otherwise remedied, in order to render this possible explosion still less dangerous, it would be necessary to form the magazine of small distinct apartments, totally independent of each other; that in case one should be accidentally blown up, the explosion might be less injurious. The same plan ought to be adopted in the construction of all combustible stores subject to confiscation. The marine bill, and mutiny bill, as annual regulations, were prepared in the usual form, passed both Houses without opposition, and received the royal assent.

§ LIV. The next affair that engrossed the deliberation of the Commons, was a measure relating to the internal economy of the metropolis. The sheriffs of London declared the land mayors and aldermen, in common-council assembled, representing that several streets, lanes, and passages within the city of London, and liberties thereof, were too narrow and incommodious, particularly by the sale, letting, or hire of houses as of coach-house, carts, and other carriages, to the prejudice and inconvenience of the owners and inhabitants of houses, and to the great hindrance of business, trade, and commerce. They alleged that these defects might be remedied, and several new streets opened within the said city and liberties, to the great ease, safety, and convenience of passengers, as well as to the advantage of the public in general, if they, the petitioners, were enabled to widen and enlarge the narrow streets, lanes, and passages, to open and lay out such new streets and ways, and to purchase the several houses, buildings, and grounds which might be necessary for these purposes. They took notice that there were several houses within the city and liberties, partly erected over the ground of other proprietors; and others, of which the several floors or apartments belonged to different persons; so that difficulties and disputes frequently arose amongst the said several owners and proprietors, about pulling down or rebuilding the party-walls and premises; that such rebuilding was often prevented or delayed, to the great injury and inconvenience of those owners who were desirous to rebuild; that it would therefore be of public benefit, and frequently prevent the increase of fire, theft, or damage, that might be made by law, as well for determining such disputes in a summary way, as for explaining and amending the laws then in being relating to the building of party-walls. They leave might be given to bring in a bill for enabling the petitioners to widen and enlarge the several streets, lanes, and passages, and to open new streets and ways to be therein limited and prescribed; as well as for determining, in a summary way, all disputes concerning about the party-walls, not relating to the said city and liberties, wherein several persons have an interdicted property; and for explaining and amending the laws in being relating to these particulars. A committee being appointed to examine the matter of this petition, agreed to a report, upon which leave was given to bring in a bill, and this was brought to accordingly. Next day a great number of citizens represented, in another petition, that the pavement of the city and liberties was often damaged, by being broken up for the purposes of amending or new laying water-pipes belonging to the proprietors of water-works; and praying that provision might be made in the bill then depending, to compel those proprietors to make good any damage done to the said water-pipes, or opening the pavement for alterations. In consequence of this representation, some amendments were made in the bill, which passed both Houses, and was passed into a law, under the title of an Act for widening certain streets, lanes, and passages, within the city of London and liberties thereof; and for opening certain new streets and ways within the same, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

§ L.V. The inhabitants of Westminster had long laboured under the want of a fish-market, and complained that the price of this species of provision was kept up at an exorbitant rate by the fraudulent combination of a few dealers, who engrossed the whole market at Billingsgate, and destroyed great quantities of fish, in order to enhance the value of those that remained. An act of parliament had passed in the twenty-second year of his present majesty's reign, for establishing a free market for the sale of fish in Westminster; and, seven years after that period, it was found necessary to procure a second, for explaining and amending the first; but neither-effectively answered the purpose of the legislature. In the month of January, 1798, in the present session, the House took into consideration a petition of the several fishermen trading to Billingsgate-market, representing the hardships to which they were exposed, particularly by the sale, letting, or hiring of the said streets and passages, and the fees, and cargoes, incurred by the negligence of servants who had omitted to make the particular entries which the two acts prescribed. This petition being examined by a committee, and the report being made, leave was given to bring in a new bill, which should contain effectual provision for the better supplying the cities of London and Westminster with fish, and for preventing the abuses of the fishmongers. It was entitled, An Act to repeal so much of an act passed in the twenty-sixth of George II. concerning a free market for fish at Westminster, as requires fishermen to enter their fishing vessels at the office of the searcher of the customs at Gravesend, and to regulate the sale of fish at the first hand in the market of London and Westminster; and to prevent salesmen of fish buying fish to sell again on their own account; and to allow brest and turbot, brill and pearl, although under the respective dimensions mentioned in a former act, to be imported and sold; and to punish persons who shall take or sell any spawn, brood, or fry of fish, unseasonable fish, or fish out of season, or smelts under the size of five inches, and for other purposes." Though this, and the former bill relating to the streets and houses of London, are instances that evince the care and attention of the legislature, even to matters of such remote and trifling importance as the regulation of the keeping of cats, we can hardly consider them as objects of such dignity and importance as to demand the deliberations of the parliament, but think they naturally fall within the cognizance of the municipal magistracy. After all, perhaps the most effectual method for regulating Westminster with plenty of fish, at reasonable rates, would be to execute with rigour the laws already enacted against forestalling and regrating, an expedient that would soon dissolve all such combinations, and raise the price of fish; to increase the number of markets in London and Westminster; and to establish two general markets at the Nore, one on each side of the river, where the fishing vessels might unload their cargoes, and return to sea without delay. A number of light boats might be employed to convey fresh fish from these markets to London and Westminster, where all the different fish markets might be plentifully supplied at a reasonable expense; for it cannot be supposed that, while the fresh fish are brought up the river to the fishing-smacks themselves, which can hardly save the tides to Billingsgate, they will ever dream of carrying their cargoes above bridge; or that the price of fish can be conduced by the fishmongers to lose the same time in running up to Gravesend or Billingsgate.

§ LVI. The annual committee being appointed to inquire into what laws were expired, or nearly expiring, agreed to certain bills, in which a bill was prepared, and obtained the royal assent, importing a continuation of several laws, namely, the several clauses mentioned of the acts in the fifth and eighth of George I. against the clandestine running of uncustomed goods, except the clauses relating to quarantine; the act passed in the third of George II. relating to the carrying race from Carolina; the act of the seventh of the same reign, relating to cochineal and indigo; and that of the twelfth George II. so far as it relates to the importation of frustra frui, there was also a law enacted, to continue to the twenty-ninth day of September in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven, an act passed in the twelfth year of Queen Anne, for encouraging the making of sailcloth, by a duty of one penny per ell laid upon all foreign-made sail, and sailcloth imported, and a bounty in the same proportion granted upon all home-made sail-cloth, and canvass fit for or made into sails, and exported; another act was passed, for continuing certain laws of the last reign to the end of the year, such as the six-year-old hackney coaches and chairs, which law was rendered perpetual. The next law we shall mention was intended to be one of the most important that ever fell under the cognizance of the act, it being a law that provided for the freedom of the dignity, and independency of parliaments. By an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Anne, it was provided that no person should be chosen a member of parliament who did not possess in England or Wales an estate, freehold or copyhold, for life, according to the following qualifications: for every knight of a shire six hundred pounds per annum; and above what will satisfy all encumbrances; and three hundred pounds per annum, for every citizen, burgess, and baron of the cinque ports. It was also declared, that the return of any person not thus qualified should be void; and that every candidate should, at the reasonable request of any other candidate at the time of election, or of two or more persons who had a right to vote, take an oath prescribed to establish his qualification. This restraint was by no means effectual. So many oaths of different kinds had been prescribed since the revolution, that they began to lose the effect they were intended to have on the minds of men: and in particular, political perjury grew so common, that it was no longer considered as a crime. Subterfuges were discovered, by means of which this law relating to the qualifications of candidates was effectually cheated. Those who were actually possessed of such estates as were intended to procured temporary conveyances from their friends and patrons, on condition of their being restored and cancelled after the election. By this scoundrel fraud the intention of the framers of the bill, the dignity of parliament, prostituted, the example of perjury and corruption extended, and the vengeance of Heaven set at defiance. Through this infamous channel the ministry had it in their power to thrust into parliament a set of venal beggars, who, as they depended upon their bounty, would always be obsequious and artful; according to the direction, without the least regard to the dictates of conscience, or to the advantage of their country. The mischiefs attending such a vile collusion, and in particular the undue influence of such gratuities, which usually crowned the practice, were either felt or apprehended by some honest patriots, who, after divers unsuccessful efforts, at length presented to the House a bill, importing that every person who shall be elected a member of the House of Commons, should be capable of being aforesaid to the clerk of the House at the table, while the Commons are sitting, and the speaker in the chair, a paper or schedule, signed by himself, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification, specifying the nature of his estate, whether messuage, land, rent, tithe, or what else; and if such estate consists of messuages, lands, or tithes, then specifying in whose whose occupation they are, and if in rent, then specifying the names of the owners or possessors of the lands and tenements out of which such rent is issuing, and also specifying the parish, township, or precinct and county, in which the said estate lies, and the value thereof; and every such person shall be required to subscribe the following oath, to be fairly written at the bottom of the paper or schedule: "I, A. B. do swear that the above is a true rental; and that I truly and solemnly, have such an estate, in the above or aforesaid, for the above described benefit, of and in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, above described, over and above what will satisfy and clear all encumbrances that may affect the same; and that such estate has not been granted or made over me fraudulently, or on purpose to qualify me to be a member of this house. So help me God!" It was provided that the said paper or schedule, with the oath aforesaid, should be carefully kept by the clerk, to be inspected by the members of the House of Commons, and directed, that if any person, elected to serve in any future parliament should presume to sit or vote as a member of the House of Commons before he had delivered in such a paper or schedule, and taken the oath aforesaid, should not be qualified according to the true intent and meaning of this act, his election should be void; and every person so sitting and voting should forfeit a certain sum to be recovered by such persons as should sue for the same by action of debt, bill, or information, on the false pretences of having been a member of the House of Commons, or for any new act, or information should be brought, in pursuance of this act, against any member of the House of Commons, the clerk of the House shall, upon demand, forthwith deliver a true and attested copy of the paper or schedule so delivered in to him as aforesaid by such members to the plaintiff or prosecutor, or his attorney or agent, paying a certain sum for the same; which, being proved a true copy, shall be admitted to his or their trial, and used in evidence in any such action. Provided always, that nothing contained in this act shall extend to the eldest son or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any person so qualified as aforesaid, for such estate as shall be for either of the universities in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members for that part of Great Britain called Scotland. Such was the substance of the bill; as originally presented to the House of Commons; but it was altered in such a manner as we are afraid will fail in answering the salutary purposes for which it was intended by those who brought it into the House. Notwithstanding the provisions made in the act as it now stands, any minister or patron may still introduce his pensum seven hundred and ninety thousand pounds, and in the old method of temporary conveyance, though the force must now be kept up until the member shall have delivered in his schedule, taken his oath, and his seat is parliamento a re-conveyance, without running any risk of losing his seat, or of being punished for his fraud and perjury. The extensive influence of the crown, the general corruptibility of individuals, and the obstacles so indusquently thrown in the way of doing justice in that case, in cases of dependency of parliaments, must have produced very mortifying reflections in the breast of every Briton warmed with the genuine love of his country. He must have perceived that all the bulwarks of the constitution were little better than butresses of ice, which would solarily stand before the heat of ministerial influence, when artfully concentrated; that either a minister's professions of patriotism were meaner, or his credit insufficient to effect any material alteration in the unpopular measures of government; and that, after all, the liberties of the nation could never be so firmly established, as by the power, generosity, and virtue of a patriot king. This inference could not fail to awaken the attention of those that had been long unthinkingly snatched from the eager hopes and warm affections of a whole nation, before he had in his power to manifest and establish his favourite maxim, 'that a monarch's glory is inseparably connected with the happiness of his people.'

§ LVII. On the first day of February, a motion was made, and leave given, to bring in a bill for erecting him into the large sum of his majesty's offices, lands, and hereditary possessions, parcel of his duchy of Cornwall, or annexed to the same; accordingly it passed both Houses without opposition; and enacted that all leases and grants made, or to be made, by his majesty, within seven years next ensuing, in or annexed to the said duchy, under the limitations therein mentioned, should be good and effectual in law against his majesty, his heirs, and successors, and against all other persons that should hereafter inherit the said duchy, either by an act of parliament, or any limitation whatsoever. This act appears the more extraordinary, as the Prince of Wales, who has a sort of right by prescription to the duchy of Cornwall, was then but a boy of age, and might have been put in possession of it by the present possession of his majesty, under a settlement of an account of the produce of the fund established for paying annuities granted in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine, with a charge on that fund on the fifth day of July next, as one of the ancestors of the present sovereign there had been a considerable deficiency in the said fund on the fifth day of July preceding, and this had been made good out of the sinking fund, by a resolution of the seventh of February, already particularized. They therefore instructed the committee of ways and means to consider so much of the annuity and lottery act passed in the preceding session as related to the three per cent annuities, amounting to the sum of seven millions five hundred and ninety thousand pounds, granted in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty, and to receive all such of the said fund as act related to the subsidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandise to be imported into this kingdom, and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate. The committee having taken the matter into deliberation, agreed to the two resolutions we have already mentioned with respect to the consolidation; and a bill was brought in for adding those annuities granted in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine to the joint stock of the revenue and projected income arising by the acts of the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-second years of his majesty's reign, and for several duties therein mentioned, to the sinking-fund. The committee was afterwards empowered to receive a clause for cancelling such lottery tickets as were made forth in pursuance of an act passed in the thirtieth year of his majesty's reign, and were not then disposed of: a clause for this purpose was accordingly added to the bill, which passed through both Houses without opposition, and received the royal assent at the end of the session.

§ LVIII. On the twenty-ninth day of April, Lord North presented to the House a bill for encouraging the exportation of rum, by the establishment of a factory, for the manufactory of the British sugar plantations, from Great Britain, and of British spirits made from molasses; a bill which in a little time acquired the sanction of the royal assent. Towards the end of April, Act VII. had presented a bill for the more effectual securing the payment of such prize and bounty monies as were appropriated to the use of Greenwich hospital by an act passed in the year twenty-nine, by the twenty-ninth, and thirty-second years of his majesty's reign, that law no time was limited, or particular method prescribed for giving notifications of the day appointed for the payment of the shares of the prizes and bounty money; and many agents had neglected to specify, in the notification given in the London Gazette for payment due to the several shares condemned in the courts of admiralty in Great Britain, the particular day or time when such payments were to commence, whereby it was rendered difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the time when the hospital at Greenwich became entitled to the unclaimed shares, of consequence could not enjoy the full benefit of the act; the bill now prepared imported, that from and after the first day of September in the present year, all notifications of the day appointed for the payment of such prize and bounty monies, as were granted in the majesty's ships of war, and condemned in Great Britain, and from and after the first day of February in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one, all notifications of the payment of such shares condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions in Europe, or in any of the British plantations in America; and from and after the twenty-fifth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one, all notifications of the payment of the shares of prizes taken divers, and these conditions only, his Royal Highness thinks he has a right not to doubt of having a most cordial support from all those good men who mean their country and this constitution well, and that they will become his and his family's friends, and unite with him to promote the good government of this country, and that they will believe him, upon these principles, both in court and out of court: and if he should live to be an admiral, it should be improper, without distinction, of men of knowledge, and prudence. His Royal Highness further promises to ascend on no more declarative, nor is it offered to him, than ISADNAM, for his cruel hand, by way of retribution.

The Lords and Privy Council, on the 3d of May, communicated, even in his Royal Highness the prince's gracious intention upon several important and public points, as the state and interest of his government, and absolutely necessary for the serving and perpetuation of the true and design of parliament, acknowledged the uprightness and generosity of his Royal Highness's noble and generous sentiments and resolution, and the present condition of the kingdom, his goodness, and goodness of the purest and excellence of his parliament restored, and the happiness and welfare of our constitution preserved. and condemned in any other of his majesty's dominions, shall be respectively given and published in the following manner: if the prize be condemned in any court of admiralty in Great Britain, such notification, under the agent's hand, shall be published in the London Gazette; and if condemned in any court of admiralty in any other of his majesty's dominions, such notification shall be published in like manner in the Gazette, or other newspaper of public authority, or if published elsewhere, or if the prize be condemned, and if there shall be no Gazette, or such newspaper, published there, then in some or one of the public newspapers of the place: and such agents shall deliver to the collector, customer, or searcher, or his lawful deputy, and the public officers, or his lawful deputy, or the public officers or officers of the place, where the prize is condemned, or to the lawful deputy of such principal officers; two of the gazettes or other newspapers in which such notifications are inserted, and if there shall not be any public newspapers in any such island or place, the agent shall give two such notifications in writing, under his hand: and every such collector, or other officer as aforesaid, shall subscribe his name on both the said gazettes, newspapers, or written notifications; and, by the first ship which shall sail from thence to any port of Great Britain, shall transmit to the treasurer or deputy-treasurers of the said royal household, and to the principal officers of his majesty's customs, with his name subscribed, to be there registered; and shall faithfully preserve and keep the other, with his name theron subscribed, in his own custody; and in every notification as aforesaid the agent shall specify his place of abode, and the nature and amount of the goods and passengers and the payment of the respective shares to the captors; and all notifications with respect to prizes condemned in Great Britain shall be published in the London Gazette three days at least before any share of such prize shall be paid; and with respect to prizes condemned in any other part of his majesty's dominions, such notifications shall be delivered to the said collector, or other officers as aforesaid, three days at least before any share of such prize shall be paid; it was likewise enacted, that the agents for the distribution of bounty bills should insert, and publish under their hands, in the London Gazette, three days at least before payment, public notifications of the day and year appointed for such payment, and also insert therein their respective places of abode. The bill, even as it now stands, is liable to several objections. It may be dangerous to leave the money of the unclaimed shares so long as three years in the hands of the agent, who, holding it securely, may prove insolvent before the expiration of that term: then the time prescribed to the sailors, within which their claim is limited, appears to be too short, when weighed against the risk they may be exposed to from one ship over to another ship, and conveyed to a distant part of the globe, that they shall have no opportunity to claim payment: and should three years elapse before they could make application to the agent, they would find their bounty or prize money appropriated to the use of Greenwich hospital; nay, should they die in the course of the voyage, it would be lost to their heirs and executors, who, being ignorant of their title, could not possibly claim within the time limited.

§ LIX. A committee having been appointed to inquire into the original standards of weights and measures in the kingdom of England, to consider the laws relating thereto, and to report their opinion of the most effectual means for ascertaining and enforcing uniform and certain standards of weights and measures, they prepared copies, models, patterns, and marked them with their seal, and account to the treasurer and collector; then there were locked up by the clerk of the House; and Lord Caversfield presented a bill, according to order, for enforcing uniformity of weights and measures to the standards by law to be established; but this measure, which had been so long a subject of discussion, was not yet fully discussed, and the standards and weights were reserved to another occasion. A law was made for reviving and continuing so much of an act passed in the twenty-first year of his majesty's reign, as related to the measurement and punishment of high treason in the highlands of Scotland; and also for continuing two other acts passed in the nine-commanded both to Houses the continuance of that union and good harmony which he had observed with so much pleasure, and from which he had derived such important effects. He desired they would study to promote these desirable objects, to support the king's government, and the good order of the arts and sciences, and to consult their own real happiness and prosperity.

§ I. The successes of the last campaign had flushed the whole nation with the most elevated hope of future conquest, and the government was enabled to take every step which appeared necessary to realize that sanguine expectation; but the war began on the land very differently from what had been expected; and the immense sums that were raised for the expenses of the current year; notwithstanding the great number of land forces maintained in the service, and the numerous fleets that filled the harbours of Great Britain; we do not find that one fresh effort was made to improve the advantages she had gained upon her own element, or for pushing the war on national principles; for the reduction of Canada was no more than the consequence of the measures which had been taken in the preceding campaign. But before we record the progress of the war, it may be necessary to specify some domestic occurrences that for a little while engrossed the public attention.

In the month of May, 1760, the King of Prussia sent a gentleman of some fortune in Derbyshire, was executed at Nottingham, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, for the murder of an infant born of his own sister, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty. On the third day after the birth, this brutal ruffian thrust the child into a linen bag, and accompanied by his own brother on horseback, conveyed it to Amesty, in Nottinghamshire, where it was next day found dead under a hay stack. Though this cruel rustic knew how much he lay at the mercy of his brother, whom he had made privy to this affair, far from endeavouring to engage his secrecy by offices of kindness and respect, he treated him as an alien to his blood; not barely with indifference, but even with the most barbarous rigour. He not only de-Sackville. Some writers, either animated by the hope of advantage, or lured to betray the cause which they undertook to defend, entered the lists as professed champions of the accused, assumed the pen in his behalf, devoid of sense, unfurnished with truth, and animated by a false sense of honor, which could not fail to injure his character among all those who believed that he counterenanced their endeavours, and supplied them with the facts and arguments of his defence. Such precisely was the state of the dispute when Lord George arrived in London. While Ferdinand was crowned with laurel; while the King of Great Britain approved his conduct, and, as the most glorious mark of that approbation, invested him with the order of a knight; while his name was inscribed throughout all England, and entailed, in the warmest expressions of hyperbole, above all the heroes of antiquity; every month was opened in execution of the late commander of the British troops in Germany. He was now made acquainted with the particulars of his imputed guilt, which he had before indistinctly learned. He was accused of having disobeyed three successive orders he had received from the general, during the action at Minden, to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, which he commanded, and sustain the infantry that were engaged; and after the cavalry were put in motion, of having halted them unnecessarily, and marched so slow, that they could not reach the place of the action in time; by which conduct the opportunity was lost of attacking the enemy when they gave way, and rendering the victory more glorious and decisive. The first step which Lord George took, in his resolution was, writing a short address, entreaty them to suspend their belief with respect to his character, until the charge brought against him should be legally discussed by a court-martial; a trial which he had already solicited, and was in hopes of obtaining.

§ III. Finding himself unable to stem the tide of popular prejudice, which flowed against him with irresistible impetuosity, he might have retired in quiet and safety, and left it to ebb at leisure. This would have been generally deemed a prudent step, by all those who consider the unfavourable medium through which every particular of his conduct must have been viewed at that juncture, even by men who cherished the most candid intentions; when they reflected upon the power, influence, and popularity of his accuser; the danger of aggravating the resentment of the sovereign, already too conspicuous; and the risk of hazarding his life on the honour and integrity of war, should he think their fate depended upon the nature of the evidence they should give. Notwithstanding those suggestions, Lord George, seemingly impotent of the imputation under which his character laboured, avenge the privations of his trial, and his evidence, was granted accordingly, after the judges had given it as their opinion that he might be tried by a court-martial, though he no longer retained any commission in the service. A court of general officers being appointed and assembled to inquire into his conduct, the judge-advocate gave him to understand, that he was charged with having disobeyed the orders of Prince Ferdinand, relative to the battle of Minden. That the reader may have the more distinct idea of the charge, it is necessary to remind him that Lord George Sackville commanded the cavalry of the right wing, consisting of Hanoverian and British horse, disposed to two lines, the British being at the extremity of the right, extending to the village of Hartzun; the Hanoverian cavalry forming the left that reached almost to an open wood or grove, which divided the horse from the line of infantry, particularly from that part of the line of infantry consisting of two brigades of British foot, the Hanoverian guards, and Hardenberg’s regiment. This was the body of troops which sustained the brunt of the battle with the most incredible courage and perseverance. They of their own accord advanced to attack the left of the enemy, in cavalry, and though a most formidable body of horse and small arms, to which they were exposed in front and flank; they withstand the repeated attacks of the whole French gendarmerie, whom at length they totally routed, together with the body of Saxony which had made a most formidable stand, and whose valor the victory was chiefly owing. The ground from which these troops advanced was a kind of heath or plain, which opened a considerable way to the left, where the rest of the army was formed in order of battle, but on the right it was bounded by the wood, on the other side of which he desired the cavalry to turn, by marching straight forward, to front the village of Hartzun, from whence the French had been driven by the pikets in the army there posted, and in front of them a windmill, situated in the middle space between them and a battery placed on the left of the enemy.

§ IV. While Prince Ferdinand, posted the cavalry of the right wing in the situation we have just described; the village of Hartzun with enclosures on the right, a narrow wood on the left, the village of Hintenrode, about two-thirds of a mile in the middle of an open plain, which led directly to the enemy. In this position Lord George Sackville was directed to remain, until he should receive further orders; and here it was those orders were given which he was said to have disobeyed. Indeed he was previously charged with having neglected the orders of the preceding evening, which import that the horses should be saddled at one in the morning, though the tents were not to be struck, nor the troops under arms, until they should receive further orders. He was accused of having disobeyed these orders, and of having come late into the field, after the cavalry was formed. Captain Winchingrode, aide-de-camp to Prince Ferdinand, ordered the infantry of the right wing were advancing towards the enemy for the second time, he was sent with orders to Lord George Sackville to advance with the cavalry of the right wing towards the place of the public, and engage, by forming the horse under his command, upon the heath, in a third line behind the regiments; that he delivered these orders to Lord George Sackville, giving him to understand that he should march the cavalry through the wood, or trees on his left to the heath, where they were to be formed; that, on his return to the heath, he met Colonel Fitzrov riding at full gallop towards Lord George; and that he (Winchingrode) followed him back, in order to hasten the march of the cavalry. Colonel Ligonier, another of the prince’s aides-de-camp, deposed that he carried orders from the general to Lord George to advance with the cavalry, in order to profit from the disorder which appeared in the enemy’s cavalry; that Lord George made no answer to these orders, but turning to the troops, commanded them to draw their swords, and march; that the colonel seeing them advance a few paces on the right forwards, told his lordship he must march to the left, and he accordingly did; and that he (Winchingrode) with orders for the British cavalry only to advance, Lord George said the orders were contradictory; and Colonel Ligonier replied they differed only in numbers, but the former were the orders of Prince Ferdinand, the latter of Colonel Furuy; the third aide-de-camp to Prince Ferdinand, gave evidence, that when he told Lord George it was the prince’s order for the British cavalry to advance towards the left, his lordship observed that it was different from a former order brought by Colonel Ligonier, and he could not think the prince intended to break the line; that he asked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide; that when he (the aide-de-camp) offered to lead the column through the wood on the left, his lordship seemed still dissatisfied with the order, saying, it did not agree with the order brought by Colonel Ligonier, and desired to be conducted in person to the prince, that he might have an explanation from his own mouth; a resolution which was immediately executed. The next evidence, an officer of rank in the army, made oath, that in his opinion, when the orders were delivered to Lord George, his lordship was alarmed to a very great extent, and appeared to be in the utmost confusion. A certain nobleman, of high rank and unblemished reputation, declared, that Captain Winchingrode hearing told him it was absolutely necessary that the cavalry should march, and form a line to support the left of the army, and he of princes, should march to the left; that as soon as they arrived at the place where the action began, he was met by Colonel Fitzrov, with an order for the cavalry to advance as fast as possible; that the same was repeated to him; and that they could be joined by the first line of cavalry; that afterwards, in advancing, they were again halted by Lord George Sackville; that, in his opinion, they might have marched with more expedition, and even come up time enough to act against the enemy: some other officers who were in motion, according to this subject, agreed with the marquis in these sentiments.

§ V. Lord George, in his defence, proved, by undeniable evidence, that he never received the orders issued on the eve of the battle, nor any sort of intimation or place of advance, and consequently entitled to none such communication, as commander-in-chief of the British forces; that, nevertheless, the orders concerning the cavalry, who were obeyed by those who received them; that Lord George, instead, instructed the officers who were marching the troops to form, prepared to put himself at the head of the cavalry on the first notice that they were in motion; that he was so eager to perform his duty, as to set out from his quarters without even waiting for an aide-de-camp to attend him, and was in the field before any general officer of his division. He declared that, when Captain Winchingrode delivered the order to form the cavalry in line, making a third, to advance and sustain the infantry, he neither heard nor saw him, so that he was to march by the left, nor saw him point with his sword to the wood through which he was to pass. Neither of these directions were observed by any of the aides-de-camp or officers then present, and therefore, and behaved more consistently to the confusion in the looks and deportment of his lordship. It was proved that the nearest and most practicable way of advancing against the enemy was by the way by which Lord George wished to attack the enemy, that is, by the right.

It appeared that Lord George imagined this was the only way by which he should be ordered to advance; that in this persuasion, he had sent an officer to reconnoitre the village of Halen, as an object of importance, as it would have been upon the flank of the cavalry in advancing forwards; that when he received the order from Winchingrode to form the line, and advance, he still imagined this was his route, and on this supposition immediately detached an aide-de-camp to remove a regiment of Saxo-Gotha, which was in the front; that he sent a second to observe the place where the infantry were, and a third to reconnoitre the enemy; that in a few minutes Colonel Lugomer came up with an order from Prince Ferdinand to advance the cavalry, his lordship immediately drew his sword, and ordered them to march forward by the windmill. The colonel declared that when he delivered the order, he added "by the left;" but Lord George affirmed that he never used the word, seeing, as both Captain Smith and any other person then present except of that officer who witnessed to the same direction given by Winchingrode. It was proved that immediately after the troops were put in motion, the body might be extricating itself, by the orders given by Prince Ferdinand, importing that the British cavalry only should advance by the left; that Lord George declared their orders were contradictory, and seemed the more puzzled, as he understood that both these gentlemen came off nearly at the same time from the prince, and were probably directed to communicate the same order. It was therefore natural to suppose there was a mistake, as there might be danger in breaking the line, as the route by the windmill appeared more difficult and tedious than by that of the windmill, which led directly through open ground to the enemy; and as he could not think that if a body of horse was immediately wanted the general would send for the British, that were at the furthest extremity of the same, rather than for the Hanoverian cavalry who formed the left of the line, and consequently were much nearer the scene of action. It was proved that Lord George, in this uncertainty, resolved to apply for an explanation to the prince in person, who he understood was at a small distance; that with this view he set out with all possible expedition; that having entered the wood, and perceived that the country beyond it opened sooner to the left than he had expected, and what was also more surprising, advising that the British cavalry should be put in motion, he sent back that gentleman, with orders for them to advance by the left with all possible despatch; that he rode through error of judgment, rode with him without the marks of displeasure, and ordered him to bring up the whole cavalry of the right wing in a line upon the heath; an order, as the reader will perceive, quite different from that which was so warmly espoused by the aide-de-camp; that as the Marquis of Granby had already put the second regiment in motion, according to his orders which he had received, and the head of his column was already in view, coming out of the wood, Lord George thought it necessary to halt the troops on the left until the right should come in the line; and the cavalry sent there to form march slower, that two regiments, which had been the front rank of the line, might have an opportunity to replace themselves in their proper stations.

§ VI. With respect to the confusion which one officer affirmed was perceived in the countenance and deportment of this commander, a considerable number of other officers then present being interrogated by his lordship, unanimously declared that they saw no such marks of confusion, but that he delivered his orders with all the marks of coolness and deliberation. The candid reader will of himself determine, whether a man's heart is to be judged by any change of his complexion, granting such a change to have happened; whether the evidence of one witness, in such a case, will weigh against the concurrence of testimony of all the officers whose immediate business it was to attend and observe the commander; whether it was likely that an officer, who had been more than once in actual presence, and beheld an eminence in the army, should exhibit symptoms of fear and confusion, when there was in reality no appearance of danger; for none of the orders imported that he had an enemy; and only advanced the British cavalry to the infantry. The time which elapsed from the first order he received by Captain Winchingrode, to the arrival of Colonel Lugomer, did not exceed eight minutes, during which his aide-de-camp, Captain Hugo, was employed in removing the Saxo-Gotha regiment from the front, by which he proposed to advance. From that period till the cavalry actually marched in consequence of an order from Lord George, the length of time was differently estimated in the opinion of different witnesses, but at a medium furnished by the judge-advocate at fifteen minutes, during which the following circumstances were transacted: the troops were first ordered to advance forwards, then halted; the contradictory orders arrived and were disputed; the commander desired the two aides-de-camp to agree about which was the precise order, and he would obey it immediately; each insisting upon that which he had delivered, Lord George hastened to the general for an explanation; and, as he returned back Captain Smith informed him, that the cavalry, which was at a considerable distance, to put the British horse in motion. We shall not pretend to determine whether the commander of such an important station, in the midst of the battle, was necessary, or contradictory orders at the same time, especially when both orders run counter to his own judgment, whether in that case it is allowable for him to suspend the operation for a few minutes, in order to consult in person the commander-in-chief about a step of such consequence to the preservation of the whole army. Neither will we venture to decide dogmatically on the merits of the march, after the cavalry were put in motion; whether they marched too slow, or were unnecessarily halted in their way to the heath. It was proved, indeed, that Lord George was always remarkably slow in his movements of cavalry; on the supposition that if horses are blown they must be unfit for service, and that the least hurry is apt to disorder the line of horse to such a degree, as would rob them of their proper effect, and render all their efforts abortive. This being the system of Lord George Sackville, it may deserve consideration, whether he could deviate from this method, when such an occasion, without renouncing the dictates of his own judgment and discretion; and whether he was at liberty to use his own judgment, after having received the order to advance. After all, whether he was intentionally right or wrong, in his conduct, is a matter of great importance. The immediate acts, or questions which his own conscience alone can solve. Even granting him to have lacked from perseverance, to have lagged from vexation, to have failed by imprudence, he will not be without praise, with the candid and humane part of his fellow-subjects, when they reflect upon the nature of his situation, placed at the head of such a body of cavalry, uninstructed and uninformed of plan or circumstance, divided from the rest of the army, and through the negligence of the generals, charged with doubt and disappointment, and perplexed by contradictory orders, neither of which he could execute without offering violence to his own judgment; when they consider the endeavours he used to manifest his obedience; the last distinct order which he in person received and executed: that mankind are liable to mistakes; that the cavalry were not originally intended to act, as appears in the account of the battle published at the Hague, by the authority of Prince Ferdinand; the cavalry on the right did not act, because it was destined to sustain the infantry in a third line; that if it had really been designed for action, it ought either to have been posted in another place, or permitted to advance straight forwards by the windmill, according to the idea of its commander; finally, when they recall to view the general confusion that seems to have prevailed through the manoeuvres of that morning, and remember some particulars of the action; that the brigades of British artillery had no orders until they applied to Lord George Sackville, who directed them to the spot where they acquitted themselves with so much honour and effect, in contributing to the victory of the day; that they alone and ardently acquired by the few brigades of infantry, who may be said to have defeated the whole French army, was in no respect owing to any general or particular orders or instructions, but springing from the natural valour of the troops and the spirited conduct of their immediate commanders; and that a great number of officers in the allied army, even of those who remained on the open heath, never saw the face of the enemy, or saw them at such a distance that they could not distinguish more than the hats and the arms of the British regiments with which they were engaged. With respect to the imputation of cowardice levelled at Lord George by the unthinking multitude, and even, in part, by his own mind and his private opinion, we ought to consider it as a mob-accusation, which the bravest of men, even the great Duke of Marlborough, could not escape; we ought to receive it as a dangerous suspicion, which strikes at the root of character, and may blast that honour in a moment which the soldier has acquired in a long course of painful service, at the continual hazard of his life; we ought to distrust it as a malignant charge, altogether inconsistent with the former conduct of the person accused, as well as with his subsequent impatience of perseverence in demanding a trial, to which he never would have been called; a trial which, though his life was at stake, and his cause out of countenance, he sustained with such graces of behaviour, and pretences of mind, as even his enemies themselves could not help admiring. Thus have we given a succinct detail of this remarkable affair, with that spirit of impartiality, that sacred regard to truth, which the importance of history demands. To the best of our recollection, we have forgot no essential article of the accusation, nor suppressed any material circumstance urged in defence of Lord George Sackville. Unknown to his person, unconnected with his friends, unmoved by fear, unbeset by interest, we have candidly obeyed the dictates of justice, and the calls of humanity, in our endeavours to dissipate the clouds of prejudice and misconception; warned, perhaps, with an honest disdain at the unmeaning, and in our opinion, unjust persecution, which, previous to his trial, an officer of rank, service, and character, the descendant of an illustrious family, the son of a nobleman universally respected, a Beeton, a fellow-subject, had undergone:

§ VII. The court-martial having examined the evidence and heard the defence, gave judgment in these words: "The court, upon due consideration of the whole matter before them, is of opinion that Lord George Sackville is guilty of neglect of duty, and the disobedience of the orders of Brunswick, whom he was, by his commission and instructions, directed to obey as commander-in-chief, according to the rules of war; and it is the further opinion of the court, that the said Lord George Sackville he is hereby adjudged, unfit to serve his majesty in any military capacity whatsoever." His sentence was confirmed by the king, who moreover signified his pleasure that it should be given out in public orders, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where his majesty's interest was concerned. We are being convinced that neither high birth nor great employments can shelter offences of such a nature, and that seeing they are subject to censures much worse than death to a man who has any sense of honour, they may avoid the fatal consequences arising from a dispensation of orders. To complete the disgrace of this unfortunate general, his majesty in council called for the council-book, and ordered the name of Lord George Sackville to be struck out of the list of officers. No; but Mr. Johnson, who had, during the best part of his life, been employed in the family, was now appointed receiver of the estates, at the earl's own request. The conduct of Mr. Johnson was such as might have been expected, to be, that he had disappointed him in regard to a certain contract about coal-mines; in a word, that there was a collusion between Johnson and the Earl's adversaries. Fired with these suspicions, he first expressed his resentment, by giving Johnson notice to quit the farm which he possessed on the estate; but finding the trustees had confirmed the lease, he determined to graft the estate into the hands of two of his relations, and his young daughter. On Sunday the thirteenth of January he appointed this unhappy man to come to his house on the Friday following, in order to peruse papers, or settle accounts; and Johnson went thither without the least suspicion of what was prepared for his reception; for although he was no stranger to his lordship's dangerous disposition, and knew he had some time before incurred his displeasure, yet he imagined his resentment had entirely subsided, as the earl had laid no body of troops commanded by Lord George Sackville. He therefore, at the time appointed, repaired to his lordship's house at Stanton, in Leicestershire, at the distance of a short mile from his own habitation, and was admitted by a man of mind, and in the house, upon various pretences, except three women who were left in the kitchen. Johnson, advancing to the door of his apartment, was received by his lordship, who desired him to walk into another room, where he joined him in a few minutes, and then the door was locked on the inside. After a great deal of warm expostulation, the earl insisted upon his subscribing a paper, acknowledging himself a villain; and on his refusing to comply with this demand, declared he would put him to death. In vain the unfortunate man remonstrated against this cruel injustice, and deprecated the indulgence of this furious nobleman. He remained deaf to all his entreaties, drew forth a pistol which he had loaded for the purpose, and commending him to implore Heaven's mercy on his knees, shot him through the body, while he remained in that suppliant attitude. The consequence of this violence was not immediate death; but his lordship, seeing the wretched victim still alive and sensible, thought it unseemly, felt a momentary motion of pity. He ordered his servants to convey Mr. Johnson up stairs to a bed, to send for a surgeon, and give immediate notice of the accident to the Earl of Sackville. The daughter of Prince Ferdinand, who was the heir to the dukedom of Colloway, came to the house, the earl having sent for her daughter to come to the house; she was met by the earl, who told her he had shot his father upon purpose, and with deliberation. The same declaration he made to the surgeon, on whose arrival at the Earl of Sackville's request. He was described the manner in which the ball had been treated, and seemed surprised that it should be lodged within the body. When he demanded the surgeon's opinion of the wound, the operator thought proper to temporize for his own safety, as well as for the sake of the public, lest the ear should take some other desperate step, to endeavour to escape. He therefore amused him with his usual story, and, after such a time as he supposed to be extremely anxious. He supported his spirits by immoderate drinking, after having retired to another apartment with the surgeon, whom he desired to take all possible care of him. A surgeon was sent for, but he did not repeat of what he had done; that Johnson was a villain, who deserved to die; that, in case of his death, he (the earl) would surrender himself to the House of Peers and the sheriffs, and that Johnson would be done to his own conscience, and owned his intention was to have killed Johnson outright; but as he still survived, and was in pain, he desired that all possible means might be used for his recovery. Nor did he seem altogether neglectful of his own safety: he endeavoured to tamper with the surgeon, and suggest what evidence he should give when called before a court of justice. He continued to drack himself into a state of intoxication, and all the cruelty of his conduct to return. He about which he now novamente and feared to resist, and to save himself, to withdraw, to keep him under his own roof, that he might the same in extremity. He returned to the chamber where Johnson lay, instead of contenting himself with cut off, or even with being cut through by the head, and could hardly be restrained from committing further acts of violence on the poor man, who was already in extremity. After he retired to the bed, the surgeon, accompanied by the physi- cians of the court, and the surgeon's assistants, who conveyed Mr. Johnson in an easy chair to his own house, where he expired that same morning in great agonies. The same surgeon assembed a number of armed men to seize the murderer, who at once threatened resistance, but was soon apprehended, endeavouring to make his escape, and committed to the county prison. From thence he was conveyed to London by the gaoler of Leicester, and conducted by the black rod to his deputy into the House of Lords, where the coroner's inquest, and the affidavits touching the murder, being read, the gaoler delivered up his prisoner to the care of black rod, and he was immediately committed to the Tower. He appeared very calm, composed, and unconcerned, from the time of his being apprehended; conversed coolly on the subject of his imprisonment; made some pertinent marks on the nature of the insane corpus act of parliament that he was rvwemc. The next morning, when they withdrew from the House of Peers, desired he might not be visited by any of his relations or acquaintances. His understanding, which was naturally good, had been well preserved, and his arguments were rational, but his conduct was frantic.

§ IX. The circumstances of this assassination appeared so cruel and deliberate, that the people cried aloud for vengeance. The government gave up the conduct to the justice of his country. The Lord Keeper Hervey was appointed lord high steward for the trial of Earl Ferrers, and sat in state with all the peers and judges in Westminster-hall, which was for this purpose converted into a very august tribunal. On the sixteenth day of April the delinquent was brought from the Tower in a coach, attended by the major of the Tower, the gentleman gaoler, the warders, and a detachment of the foot guards. He was brought into court alone, and was unaccompanied by the peers taking their places, he was arranged alone in the midst of an infinite concourse of people, including many foreigners, who seemed wonderfully struck with the manner of his conduct. It was plain that the responsibility was fully proved by unquestionable evidence: but the earl pleaded insanity of mind; and, in order to establish this plea, called many witnesses to attest his lunacy in a very evident way. The Earl Henry was then examined and cross-examined, without the assistance of counsel. He was examined with great care, and was found to be in a state of great incandescence; unreserved jealousy of plots and conspiracies, unconnected ravings, fits of insanity, incoherence, puerilities, sudden starts of fury, denunciations of unprovoked revenge, frantic gesticulations, and a strange mixture of tender, were proved to have distinguished his conduct and deportment. It appeared that lunacy had been a family taint, and affected divers of his lordship's relations; that a solicitor of reputation had denounced his business on the full persuasion of his being disordered in his brain; that long before this unhappy event, his nearest relations had declared upon the expediency of taking out a commission of lunacy against him, and were prevented by no other reason than the apprehension of his convicted of scandalous malignant, should the jury find his lordship composit mentia, a circumstance which, in all probability, would have happened, as much as the earl's madness did not prevent his being guilty of delinquent conduct. A physician of eminence, whose practice was confined to persons labouring under this infirmity, declared that the particular of the earl's deportment and personal behaviour seemed indisputable, and that to his house had long considered him as a madman; and a certain noble lord declared in the House of Peers, when the bill of separation was on the carpet, that he looked upon him in the light of a maniac; and that if some effectual step was not taken to divest him of the power of doing mischief, he did not doubt but that one day they should have occasion to try him for murder.

The lawyers, who managed the prosecution in behalf of the crown, endeavoured to invalidate the proofs of his lunacy, by observing, that his lordship was never so much deprived of his reason as that he could distinguish between good and evil; that the murder he had committed was the effect of a fit of lunacy, and was not an act of standing; that the malice was deliberate, and the plan artfully constructed; that immediately after the deed was perpetrated, the earl's conversation and reasonings were cool and consistent, and made him frank his handwriting; and insanity, the opinion of the greatest lawyers, no criminal can avil himself of the plea of lunacy, provided the crime was committed during a fixed interval; but his lordship, far from exhibiting any marks of insanity, had, in the course of this trial, displayed uncommon understanding and sagacity in examining the witnesses, and making many shrewd and pertinent observations on the evidence which was given. These observations were in no way contrary to the opinion of the peers, who unanimously declared him guilty. After all, in examining the various actions of a man who has betrayed manifest and manifold symptoms of insanity, it is not easy to distinguish those which are committed during the lucid interval. The suspicions of madness are often momentary and transient: the determinations of a lunatic, though generally rash and instantaneous, are sometimes the result of artful contrivance; but there is no way of proving or disproving the species of the disease, either in the premises or conclusion. The earl, it is true, had formed a deliberate plan for the perpetration of the murder; but he had taken no precautions for his own escape: the more plainly appear to have been the criterion of insanity, if we reflect that he justified what he had done as a meritorious action; and he declared he would, upon Mr. Johnson's death, surrender himself to the House of Lords. Had he been impelled to this violence by a sudden gust of passion, it could not be expected that he should have taken any measure for his own preservation; but as it was the execution of a deliberate scheme, and his lordship was by no means defective in point of ingenuity, he might have easily contrived means for concealing the murder, until he should have accomplished his escape: and in our opinion, any other than a madman would either have taken some such precautions, or have been prevented from the concealment of his own guilt. The design itself seems to have been rather an intended sacrifice to justice than a gratification of revenge. Neither do we think that the sanity of his mind was assuured by the exigence of the delirium and deliberation with which he made his remarks, and examined the evidence at his trial. The influence of his phreny might be past: though it was no sign of sound reason to supply the proofs of guilt, which such an answer to him as justice. Had his judgment been really unimpaired, he might have assumed the mask of lunacy for his own preservation.

§ X. The trial was continued for two days; and on the second day the lord steward, after having made a short speech touching the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the same sentence of death upon the earl which malefa-lores of the lowest class undergo; that from the Tower, in which he was imprisoned, he should, on the Monday following, be led to the common place of execution, there to be apprehended by the constables, and his body afterwards dissected and anatomized. This last part of the sentence seemed to shock the criminal extremely: he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in great agitation; but during the remaining part of his life he behaved with the greatest calmness. Before he had received sentence, the lords his judges, by virtue of a power vested in them, resorted his execution for one month, that he might have time to settle his temporal concerns. Before he left the earl read a paper, in which he begged pardon of their lordships for the trouble he had given, as well as for having, against his own inclination, pleaded luracy at the request of his friends. He thanked them for the candid trial with which he had been indulged, and entreated their lordships to recommend him to the king for mercy. He afterwards sent a letter to his majesty, remonstrating, that he was the representative of a wise and indomitable family, which had been allied to the crown; and requesting that, if he could not be favoured with the species of death which, in cases of treason, distinguishes the nobleman from the plebeian, he might, at least, out of considerations of humanity, be allowed to suffer in the Tower, rather than at the common place of execution; but this indulgence was refused. From his return to the Tower to the day of his execution, he betrayed no mark of apprehension; but regulated the affairs with precision, and conversed without concern or restraint.

§ XI. On the fifth day of May, his body being demanded by the sheriffs at the Tower gate, in consequence of a writ under the Great Seal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, his lordship desired permission to go in his own landau; and appeared only dressed in a light coloured suit of clothes, embroidered with silver. He was attended in the landau by one of the sheriffs, and the chaplain of the earl, for the purpose of divining, a mourning coach and six, filled with his friends, and a bearers for the conveyance of his body. He was guarded by a posse of constables, a party of horse grenadiers, and a detachment of infantry; and in this manner the procession moved from the Tower, through an infinite concourse of people, to Tyburn, where the gallows, and the scaffold erected under it, appeared covered with black baze. The earl behaved with great composure to Mr. Sheriff Vaillant, who attended him in the landau; he observed that the gaity of his apparel might seem odd on such an occasion, but that he had particular reasons for wearing that suit of clothes: he took notice of the vast multitude which crowded the landau, brought this circumstance to his notice, and expressed his anxiety to see a nobleman hanged; he told the sheriff he had applied to the king by letter, that he might he permitted to die in the Tower, where the Earl of Essex, one of his ancestors, had been beheaded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; an application which, he said, he had made with the more confidence, as he had the honour to quarter part of his majesty's arms. He expressed some displeasure at being executed as a common felon, exposed to the eyes of such a multitude. The chaplain, who had never been admitted to him before, hinting that some account of his lordship's sentiments on religion would be expected by the public, he made answer, that he did not think himself sufficiently acquainted to the public for his private sentiments; and that, as he had always adored one God, the Creator of the universe; and, with respect to any particular opinions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proselytes, because he thought it was criminal to disturb the established religion of his country, as Lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the great number of sects, and the multiplication of religious disputes, had almost banished morality. With respect to the ceremony, for which he might have supposed he had no malice against Mr. Johnson, and that the murder was owing to a perturbation of mind, occasioned by a variety of crosses and vexations. When he approached the scaffold, he observed, that expressed an earnest desire to see and take leave of a certain person who waited in a coach, a person for whom he entertained the most sincere regard and affection: but the sheriff prudently observed, that such an interview might shock him at a time when he had occasion for all his fortitude and recollection: he acquiesced in the proposal, and suffered a pocket-book, a ring, and a purse, desiring that they might be given to that person, whom he now declined seeing. On his arrival at Tyburn he came out of the landau, and ascended to the scaffold, where he was preceded, with a firm and undaunted countenance. He refused to join the chaplain in the usual prayer, but, kneeling with him on black cushions, he repeated the Lord's Prayer, which he said he had always adored; and added, with great energy, 'O Lord, forgive me all my sins. For Thine own sake, out of kindness to Thy creature, and for the advancement of Thy glory, accept this offering of my soul; and, by giving me strength to bear the stroke of death, may I be a witness to others of the happiness I feel in giving up my life in Thy service.' Mr. Johnson presented his watch to Mr. Sheriff Vaillant; thanked him and the other gentlemen for all their civilities; and signified his desire of being buried at Brentford, or Stanton, in Worcestershire. Finally, he granted the executioner with a purse of money; then, the halter being adjusted to his neck, he stepped upon a little stage, erected upon springs, on the middle of the scaffold; and, the cap being pulled over his eyes, the sheriff made a signal, which the stage fell from under his feet, and he was left suspended. His body, having hung an hour and five minutes, was cut down, placed in the bearers, and conveyed to the public theatre for dissection; where, being opened, and lying for some days, in the yard of Tyburn, the executioner carried it off, and privately interred. Without all doubt, this unhappy nobleman's disposition was so dangerously mischievous, that it became necessary, for the good of society, to prevent all such persons from coming to the common penalties of the law; for, though, in the eye of casuistry, consciousness must enter into the constitution of guilt, the consequences of murder committed by a maniac may be as pernicious to society as those of the most criminal and desperate crimes; and the number of death can be hardly deemed unjust or rigorous, when inflicted upon a mischievous being, divested of all the perceptions of reason and humanity. At any rate, as the nobility of England are raised by many illustrious distinctions above the level of plebeians, and as they are eminently distinguished from them in suffering punishment for high treason, which the law considers as the most atrocious crime that can be committed, it might not be unworthy of the notice of the legislature to deliberate whether some such pre-eminence ought not to be extended to noblemen convicted of other crimes; in order to alleviate, as much as possible, the disgrace of noble families which have deserved to be alienated, and that may tend to diminish the lustre of the English nobility in the eyes of foreign nations; or to bring it into contempt with the common people of our own, already too licentious, and prone to abuse those distinctions which should serve as the basis of decorum, order, and subordination.

§ XII. Homicide is the reproach of England: one would imagine there is something in the climate of this country, that not only divides the natives to this unhumble state, but even infects foreigners who reside among them. Certain it is, high passions will break out into the most enormous violence in that country where they are least controlled by the restraint of regulation and discipline; and it is easy to conceive, that in no family, which may tend to diminish the lustre of the English nobility in the eyes of foreign nations; or to bring it into contempt with the common people of our own, already too licentious, and prone to abuse those distinctions which should serve as the basis of decorum, order, and subordination.

Derry; but before this design could be executed, the weather grew tempestuous, and the wind blowing off southwest set the ships on fire, and in the night cast sight of the Manatee, which never joined them in the sequel. After having been tempest-bitten for some time, and exposed to a very scanty allowance of provision, the officers requested of Thurst that he would return to France; lest there should all perish by famine; but he sent a clear par to this proposal, and frankly told them he could not return to France without having struck some stroke for the service of his country. Nevertheless, in hopes of meeting with some success, he solicited Thurst to pursue his design, than he sailed from 1s a to the bay of Carrickfergus, in Ireland, and made all the necessary preparations for a descent; which was accordingly effected with six hundred men, under the first-day of May, Lieutenant-Colonel Jennings, who commanded four companies of raw undisciplined men at Carrickfergus, having received information that three ships had anchored about two miles and a half from the castle, which was ruinous and defenceless, immediately detached a party to make observations, and ordered the French prisoners there confined to be removed to Belfast. Meanwhile, the enemy landing without opposition, advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place, which was deserted; and the circumstances of the English commander, would allow. A regular attack was carried on, and a spirited defence made until the ammunition of the English failed: then Colonel Jennings retired in order to the castle, which, however, was in all respects untenable; for, besides a breach in the wall near fifty feet wide, they found themselves destitute of provision and ammunition. Nevertheless, they repulsed the assailants in the first attack, even after the gate was burst open, and supplied the want of shot with stones and rubbish. At length the colonel and his troops were obliged to surrender, on condition that they should not be sent prisoners to France, but be nasoned themselves. This was the method of procuring French prisoners from Great Britain or Ireland: that the castle should not be demolished, nor the town of Carrickfergus plundered or burned, on condition that the mayor and corporation of the town furnish the French with necessary provisions. The enemy, after this exploit, did not presume to advance further into the country; a step which indeed they could not have taken with any regard to their own safety: for by this time a considerable body of regular troops was assembled; and the people of the country manifested a laudable spirit of loyalty and resolution, crowding in great numbers to Belfast, to offer their service against the invaders. These circumstances, to which the enemy were no strangers, and the defeat of Conflans, which they had also learned, obliged them to quit their conquest, and re-establish with some precipitation, after having lost Carrickfergus under moderate contribution.

§ XV. The fate they escaped on shore they soon met with. Captain John Elliot, who commanded three frigates at Kinsale, and had in the course of this war more than once already distinguished himself even in his early youth, by extraordinary acts of valour, was informed by a despatch from the Duke of Bedford, that of England, that three of the enemy's ships lay at anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus; and thither he immediately shaped his course in the ship Azolia, accompanied by the Pallis and Brilliant of the Captain, Clemen, and Log. On the twenty-eighth day of February they descried the enemy and gave chase in sight of the isle of Man; and, about nine in the morning, Captain Elliot, in his own ship, engaged the Bellesse, commanded by Thurst, although coming by superior force, a number of guns, and weight of metal. In a few minutes his consorts were also engaged with the other two ships of the enemy. After a warm action, maintained with great spirit of both, Captain Elliot boarded the lieutenant boarded the Bellesse; and, striking her colours with his own hand, the commander submitted: his example was immediately followed by the other French captains, and the English commodore, taking possession of the prizes, conveyed them into the bay of Ramsey, in the isle of Man, that their damage might be repaired. Though the Bellesse was very leaky, and had lost her bolt- spout, mizen-mast, and main-yard, in all probability the victory would not have been so easily obtained, had not the gallant Thurst fallen during the action. The victor had not even the consolation to perform the last offices to his brave enemy; for his body was thrown into the sea by his own crew, who, in consequence of the capture of a great part of the English did not exceed forty men killed and wounded, whereas above three hundred of the enemy were slain and disabled. The service performed on this occasion was described in the last chapter. lieutenant-Colonel Jennings, that the thanks of the House of Commons in that kingdom were voted to the conquerors of Thurst, as well as to Lieutenant-Colonel Jennings, for his spirited behaviour at Carrickfergus; and the freedom of the city of Cork was presented in silver boxes to the Captain Elliot, Clemen, and Logie. The name of Thurst became terrible to all the trading sea-ports of Great Britain and Ireland; and therefore the defeat and capture of his squadron were celebrated. Captain Skinner of the Bedelford, and Captain Kennedy of the Flamborough, both frigates, sailed on a cruise from Lisbon; and on the fourth day of April fell in with two large French frigates, convey a fleet of merchant ships, which the English captains immediately resolved to engage. The enemy did not decline the battle, which began about half an hour after six in the evening, and raged with great fury till eleven. By this time the Belliss had been lamed by small shot and broadside; she had also lost fifteen men and fifty-five wounded, including the lieutenant of marines, and considerable damage both in her hull and rigging. In three days he was joined by the Bedelford, who had also compelled her antagonist to give way, and pursued her till she was out of sight. In about an hour after the action began, Captain Skinner was killed by a cannon ball; and the command devolved to Lieutenant Knollis, son to the Earl of Banbury, who maintained the battle with great spirit, even after he was wounded, until he received a second shot in his body, which proved mortal. Then the master assuming the direction, continued the engagement with equal resolution until the enemy made his escape; which he more easily accomplished, as the Bedelford was disabled in her masts and rigging.

§ XVII. The bravery of five Irishmen and a boy belonging to the crew of a ship from Waterford, deserves commendation. The vessel, in her return from Bilboa, was laden with copper, lead, and silver, and a large quantity of Irish goods: the master, name of the vessel off Ushant, about the middle of April, the captors

[1] One circumstance that attended this dispute deserves to be transmitted to posterity, as an example to future commanders: it consists in the true character of the French and English courts. While the French and English were belligerently engaged, a light child happened to come between them, having no idea of the danger to which it was exposed; a common soldier of the adverse side, out of the kindness of his heart, gave it some protection and advice, being advanced deliberately between the lines of fire, took up the child in his arms, conveyed it to a place of safety; then returning to his place, resulted his musket and remained at his post. The first was shot in the forehead, and the second was lost in the reduction of Grandesalde; Lord Wallingford, the eldest was shot and the shot of Carrickfergus, and the third was slain in this engagement.

[2] Five sons of this nobleman were remarkably distinguished in this war. The first was killed by a cannon-ball, and his eldest brother was mortally wounded; the second was but the reduction of Grandesalde; Lord Wallingford, the eldest was shot and the shot of Carrickfergus, and the third was slain in this engagement. removals, the master, and all the bands but these five men and the boy, who were left to assist nine Frenchmen in navigating the vessel to France. These stout Hibernians immediately formed a plan of insurrection, and executed it with success. Four of the French marines being below deck, and the rest of the crew, excepting those above, ran another walking the deck, Bran, who headed the enterprise, tripped up the heels of the French steersman, seized his pistol, and discharged it at him who walked the deck; but the Frenchman, turning in the instant, was killed. One of the hands of the French, the crew, twenty in number, being left on the poop deck, those who were aloft called for quarter, and surrendered without opposition. The Irish having thus obtained a complete victory, almost without bloodshed, and secured the prisoners, another difficulty occurred; neither Bran nor any of his associates could read or write, or knew the least principle of navigation; but supposing his course to be north, he steered at a venture, end the first land he made was the neighbourhood ofough, where he happily arrived with his prisoners.

§ XIX. The only considerable damage sustained by the navy of Great Britain, since the commencement of this year, was the loss of the Wrecks, a man-of-war, of 22 guns, and twenty-three men, to Adm. Boscowen commanded on the coast of France, in order to watch the motions and distress the commerce of that restless, enterprising enemy. In the beginning of February a series of stormy weather obliged the admiral to return from the bay of Quiberon to Plymouth, where he arrived with much difficulty; but the Ramilies overshot the entrance to the Sound; and being embayed near a point called the Bolt-head, about four leagues higher up the channel, was dashed in pieces among the rocks, after all her anchors and cables had given way. All her officers and men, amounting to seven hundred, perished on this occasion, except one midshipman and twenty-five privates, who, having the good fortune to save themselves by leaping on the rocks as the hull was thrown forwards, and raised up by the succeeding billows. Such were the most material transactions of the year relating to the British empire in the seas of Europe.

§ XX. We shall now transport the reader to the continent of North America, which, as the theatre of war, still maintained its former importance. The French empressire was the enemy were now the object of much of our attention, and arts of imitation with such success among the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of Indians settled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, that they had infringed the peace of the latter province, during the last year, and began hostilities by plundering, massacring, and scalping several British subjects of the more southern provinces. Mr. Lyttleton, governor of South Carolina, having received information of these outrages, obtained the necessary aid from the assembly of his province, for maintaining a considerable body of forces, which was raised with great expedition. He marched in the beginning of October, at the head of eight hundred provincials, reinforced with three hundred regular troops, and penetrated into the heart of the country possessed by the Cherokees, and, as most intimiated by his vigour and despatch, that they sent a deputation of their chiefs to sue for peace, which was re-established by a new treaty dictated by the English governor. They obliged themselves to renounce the French interest, to deliver up all the spies and emissaries of that nation then resident among them; to conduct the goods seized in the Delaware province, which had been concerned in murdering and scalping the British subjects; and for the performance of these articles two-and-twenty of their head men were put as hostages into the hands of the governor. So little regard was paid by these savages to this solemn accommodation, that Mr. Lyttleton had been returned but a few days from their country, when they attempted to surprise the English fort at Prince (now, of York), which was commanded by Mr. Bell, and lying diller in a body, on pretence of delivering up some murderers; but the commanding officer, perceiving some suspicious circumstances in their behaviour, acted with such vigilance and circumspection, as entirely frustrated their design. Thus disappeared, they wreaked their vengeance upon the English subjects trading in their country, all of whom they butchered without mercy. Not contented with this barbarous sacrifice, they made incursions to the British settlements at the Long Lanes, and the mouth of the Broad river, and massacred about forty defenceless colonists, who repose themselves in full security on the peace so lately ratified. As views of interest could not have induced this act as a matter of war, they might not have been inflamed by any fresh provocation; these violations must be imputed to the instigation of French incendiaries; and too plainly evinced the necessity of crowning our American conquests with the reduction of Louisiana, from whence these emissaries were undoubtedly despatched.

§ XXI. The cruelty and mischief with which the Cherokees prosecuted their renewed hostilities, alarmed all the southern colonies of the English; and application was made for assistance to Mr. Amherst, the commander-in-chief of the king's forces in America. He forthwith dispatched twelve hundred chosen men to South Carolina, under the command of Colonel Montgomery, brother to the Earl of Eglinton, an officer of approved conduct and distinguished gallantry. Immediately after his arrival at Charles-town, he advanced to Ninety-six, and proceeded to Twelve-mile river, which he passed in the beginning of the month, without opposition. He continued his march until he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Indian town called Little Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous situation. Having reason to believe the enemy were now the object of his pursuit, he thought fit to rush upon them in the night by surprise. With this view, leaving his tents standing with a sufficient guard for the camp and wagons, he marched through the woods Eastward, and was met by the Indians five-and-twenty miles: and in his route detached a company of light infantry to destroy the village of Little Keowee, where they were received with a smart fire; but they rushed in with their haymotes, and all the men were put to the sword. The main body proceeded straight to Estatoe, which they reached in the morning; but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. Some few of the Indians, who had not time to escape, were slain; and the town, consisting of two hundred houses, well stored with provison, ammunition, and all the necessaries of life, was first plundered, and then reduced necessary to put the hostages to death without further ceremony. In the evening a party of Indians approached the fort, and brought two signals, which were answered with a volley of shot and musto ashes; some of the wretched inhabitants who concealed themselves perishing in the flames. It was necessary to strike a terror into those savages by some examples of severity; and the soldiers became deaf to all the suggestions of humanity when they heard of the Indian town being taken, the body of an Englishman, whom they had put to the torture that very morning. Colonel Montgomery followed up his blow with surprising rapidity. In the space of one day, he took Fort Saggafon, which was a large na Estacoa, and every village and house in the Lower Nation. The Indian villages in this part of the world were agreeably situated, generally consisting of about one hundred houses, neatly and commodiously built, and well surrounded by a rampart or parapet. The houses were large magazines of corn, which were consumed in the flames. All the men that were taken suffered immediate death; but the greater part of the nation had escaped with the utmost precipitation. In many houses the beds were yet warm, and the tables spread with victuals. Many loaded guns went off while the houses were burning. The savages had lost time to save their most valuable effects. The soldiers found some money, three or four watches, a great quantity of wampum, clothes, and peltry. Colonel Montgomery having thus taken vengeance on the perfidious Cherokees, at the expense of five or six men killed or wounded, returned to Fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children, whom he had made prisoners. Two of their warriors were set at liberty, and desired to inform their nation, that though they were now in the power of the English, they might still, on their surrender, receive provender, and be allowed to return. Montgomery, in the name of the English, called Attakalikalla, alias the little Carpenter, who had signed the last treaty, disapproved of the proceedings of his countrymen, and had made many good offices to the English since the remonstration of the war, he was now given to understand that he might come down with some other chiefs to treat of an accommodation, which would be granted to the Cherokees on his account; but that the nations that had begun the war, and were about the seventh days, otherwise all the towns in the Upper Nation would be ravaged, and reduced to ashes.

§ XXII. These intimations having produced little or no effect, Colonel Montgomery resolved to make a second irruption into the middle settlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the twenty-fourth day of June. On the twenty-seventh Captain Morrison, of the advanced party, was killed by a shot from a thicket, and the firm being broken, so troublesome that his men gave way. Having engaged the grenadiers and light infantry being detached to sustain them, continued to advance, notwithstanding the fire from the woods; until, from a rising ground, they discovered a large body of enemy. There they engaged, and obliged to retire into a swamp; which, when the rest of the troops came up, they were, after a short resistance, compelled to abandon: but as the country was difficult and narrow, and, in particular narrow, the forces suffered on their march from the fire of scattered parties who concealed themselves behind trees and bushes. At length they arrived at the town of Etowahowee, which the inhabitants had forsaken after having removed every thing of value. Here, while the army encamped on a small plain, surrounded by hills, it was iniminated by volleys from the enemy, which wounded some men, and killed several horses. They were even so daring as to attack the purgat guards with such impetuosity as to be attended with difficulty; but, generally speaking, their parties declined an open engagement. Colonel Montgomery, sensible that, as many horses were killed or disabled, he could not proceed further without levying on them, ordered the women and children of the men to the brutal revenge of a savage enemy, resolved to return; and began his retreat in the night, that he might be less disturbed by the Indians. Accordingly, he pursued his route for two days without interruption; but afterwards sustained some straggling fires from the woods, though the parties of the enemy were put to flight as soon as they appeared. In the beginning of July he arrived at Fort Prince George; this expedition having cost him about seven hundred pounds, and was attended with some sacrifices of life and interest.

§ XXIII. In revenge for these calamities, the Cherokees assembled to a considerable number, and formed the blockade of Fort Loudon, a small fortification near the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconsiderable garrison, ill supplied with provision and necessaries. After having sustained a long siege, and being reduced to the utmost necessity, he determined to practice a council of war with the other officers, to deliberate upon their present situation; when it appeared that their provisions were entirely exhausted; that they had subsisted a considerable time upon roots, and such supplies of pork and beans as the Indian women could introduce by stealth; that the men were so weak with famine and fatigue, that in a little time they would not be able to do duty; that, for two nights past, considering his situation and particular lack of victuals, they were so weak that they were unable upon the mercy of the enemy; that the garrison in general threatened to abandon the officers, and betake themselves to the woods; and that there was no prospect of relief, their communication having been long cut off from all the British settlements: for these reasons they were unanimously of opinion that it was impracticable to prolong their defence; that they should accept of an honourable capitulation; and Captain Stuart should be sent to treat with the warriors and the head men of the Cherokees, about the conditions of their surrender. This officer being accordingly despatched with full powers, obtained a capitulation on the twenty-seventh, and the terms permitted to retire. The Indians desired that, when they arrived at Keowee, the Cherokee prisoners confined at that place should be released, all hostilities cease, a lasting accommodation be re-established, and a regulated trade re- established. This was acceded to, and the Indians of the fort, and had marched about fifteen miles on their return to Carolina, when they were surrounded and surprised by a large body of Indians, who massacred all the officers except Captain Stuart, and slew about twenty of the soldiers: the rest were made prisoners, and distributed among the different towns and villages of the nation. Captain Stuart owed his life to the generous intercession of the chiefs, who rejoiced, with the rest, in the success of all he could command, and conducted him safe to Hobston river, where he found Major Lewis advanced so far with a body of Virginians. The savages, encouraged by their success at Fort Loudon, undertook the siege of Ninety-six, and other small fortifications; but retired precipitately on the approach of a body of provincials.

§ XXIV. In the meantime, the British interest and empire were firmly established on the banks of the Ohio, by the possession of Fort Pitt, garrisoned by about one thousand men, and which had passed the winter at Pittsburgh, formerly Dun Queans, and employed that time in the most effectual manner for the service of his country. He repaired the old works, established new ones, surrounded the town of Monongahela, mounted the bastions that cover the isthmus with artillery, erected casemates, store-houses, and barracks for a numerous garrison, and cultivated with equal diligence and success the friendship and alliance of the Indians. The happy consequence of these measures were soon apparent in the production of a considerable trade between the natives and the merchants of Pittsburgh, and in the perfect security of about four thousand settlers, who now returned to the quiet possession of the lands from whence they had been driven by the enemy on the frontiers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia.

§ XXV. The incidents of the war were much more important and decisive conduct of Massachusetts; but, generally speaking, the interest of General Murray was left to command the garrison of Quebec, amounting in about six thousand men: that a strong garrison, in the hands of General Amherst, at the command of Prince Charles, in Nova Scotia, under the direction of Lord Colvii, an able and experienced officer, who had instructions to revisit Quebec in the beginning of summer, as soon as the river St Lawrence should be navigable; and that General Amherst, the commander-in-chief, would proceed by sea, and in the beginning of November by land, for maintaining the important conquest of Quebec, and subduing all the Lower Canada; the inhabitants of which actually submitted, and took the oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain. The garrison, however, within the walls of Quebec, suffered greatly from the excessive cold in the winter, and the want of vegetables and fresh provisions; insomuch that three thousand, two hundred and forty thousand soldiers were shorn of the scurvy, and twice that number rendered unfit for service. Such was the situation of the garrison, when Mr. Murray received undoubted intelligence that the French commander, the Chevalier de Levis, was employed in assembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal; that from the inhabitants of the country he had completed his eight battalions, regimented forty companies of the troops of different nations, and that he was about to march on Quebec, whenever the river St. Lawrence should be clear of ice, that he could use his four frigates, and other vessels, by means of which he was entirely master of the river.

§ XXXVI. The brigadier, considering the city of Quebec as no other than a strong cantonment, had projected a plan of defence, by extending lines, and intermuting his troops on the heights of Abraham, which, at the distance of only one and a half miles, were distant only one-quarter of a mile of the city, and might have been defended by a small force against a formidable army. Fanciful, and on every other necessity for this work, had been provided; and in the mean time, some bodies of Canadians were engaged in the projected lines; but the earth was so hardened by the frost, that it was found impracticable to proceed. Being informed on the night of the twenty-sixth, that the enemy had landed at Point au Tremble, to the number of ten thousand men, with five hundred savages, he ordered all the bridges over the river Cagmogue to be broken down, secured the landing-places at Syllier and the Foulon; and next day, marching in person with a strong detachment and two field-pieces, he took possession of an advantageous situation, and thus defeated the scheme which the French commander had laid for cutting off the posts which the English had established. These being all withdrawn, the brigadier that same afternoon marched to the bank of the river, and ut his loss, although his rear was harassed by the enemy. Here he formed a resolution which has been censured by some critics in war, as a measure that savoured more of youthful impetuosity and over-bouring courage, than of that military discretion, which ought to distinguish a commander in such a delicate situation; but it is more easy to censure with an appearance of reason, than to act in such circumstances with any certainty of success. Mr. Murray, in his letter to Mr. Adams, says:—"they had not so decided an army as were greatly superior to him in number, yet, when he considered that the English forces were habituated to victory, that they were provided with a fine train of field artillery, that, in shutting them at once within the walls, he should have placed his whole force on the single chance of defending a wretched fortification; a chance which could not be much lessened by on action in the field, though such an action would double the chance of success: for these reasons he determined to hazard a battle; should the event prove unprosperous, he resolved to hold out the place to the last extremity; then to retreat to the Isle of Orleans, or Coudres, with the remainder of the garrison, and there wait for a reinforcement. In pursuance of these resolutions he gave the necessary orders over-night: and on the twenty-eighth day of April, at half an hour after six in the morning, marched out with his little army of three thousand men, which he formed on the heights in order of battle. The right brigade, commanded by Colonel Hunter, consisted of two regiments of Amherst's and one of Welh, and the second battalion of royal Americans; the left, under Colonel Fraser, was formed of the regiments of Kennedy, Lascelles, Townsend, and the highlanders. Otway's regiment, and the third battalion of royal Americans, constituted the corps de reserve. Major Dunns corps of light infantry covered the right flank; the left was secured by Captain Huzzen's company of rangers, and one hundred volunteers, under the command of Captain Donald Macdonell; and a body guard of three field-pieces. Brigadier Murray having reconnoitred the enemy, perceived their van had taken possession of the rising grounds about three quarters of a mile in her front; but that their army was on the march in one column. Thinking this was the critical moment to attack them before they were formed, he advanced towards them with equal order and expedition. They were soon driven from the heights, though not without a warm dispute; during which the body of their army advanced at a running and formed in columns. Their van consisted of ten companies of grenadiers, two of volunteers, and four hundred savages; eight battalions, formed in four columns, with some pursuivants, one hundred and twenty men, under a major body; their rear was composed of two battles, and some Canadians in the flanks; and two thousand Canadians formed the reserve. Their whole army amounted to upwards of twelve thousand men. Mr. Murray, with great gallantry, dispossessed their grenadiers of a house and windmill which they occupied, in order to cover their left flank; and in this attack the major and some of his officers were wounded: nevertheless, the light infantry pursued the fugitives to a corps which was forced to stand and sustain them; then the pursuers halted, and dispersed along the front of the right: a circumstance which prevented the wing from taking advantage of the first impression they had made on the enemy. The light infantry being ordered to regain the flank, were, in attempting this motion, furiously charged, and thrown into disorder; then they retired to the rear in such a shattered condition, that they could never again be brought up during the whole action. Otway's regiment was instantly ordered to advance from the body of reserve, and sustain the right wing, which the enemy twice in vain attempted to penetrate. Meanwhile the left brigade of the British forces did not remain inactive; the French advanced the next day, with considerable doubts, and sustained with undaunted resolution the whole efforts of the enemy's right, until they were fairly fought down, overpowered by numbers, and reduced to a handful, notwithstanding that they secured the French garrison of a battalion of royal Americans, which had been stationed with the body of reserve, as well as from Kennedy's regiment, posted in the centre. The French attacked with great impetuosity; and at length a fresh column of the regiment de Rouillon penetrating the left wing of the British army, it gave way; the disorder was soon communicated to the right; so that after a very obstinate dispute, which lasted an hour and three quarters, Brigadier Murray was obliged to quit the field, with the loss of one thousand men killed or wounded, and the greater part of his artillery. The enemy lost twice the number of men, and suffered no essential advantages from their victory.

§ XVII. Mr. Murray, far from being dispirited by his defeat, determined, as was natural, to revenge his loss at Quebec, than he resolved to prosecute the fortifications of the place, which had been interrupted by the severity of the winter; and the soldiers exerted themselves with incredible alacrity, not only removing the works, but also in the defence of the town, before which the enemy had opened trenched on the very evening of the battle. Three ships anchored at the Foulon below their camp; and for several days they were employed in landing their cannon, mortars, and ammunition, while they worked incessantly at their trenches before the town; and on the eleventh day of May opened one bomb battery, and three batteries of cannon. Brigadier Murray made the necessary dispositions to defend the place to the last extremity: he raised two cavaliers, contrived some outworks, and planted the ramp-parts with one hundred and thirty-two pieces of artillery, dragging them mostly by the soldiers. Though the enemy conquered the place with great violence the first day, their fire soon slackened; and their batteries were, in a manner, silenced by the superior fire of the garrison; nevertheless, Quebec would, in all probability, have reverted to its former owners, had a French fleet from Europe got the start of an English squadron in sailing up the river.

§ XVIII. Lord Colville had sailed from Halifax, with the fleet under his command, on the twenty-second day of the last month; but was retained in his passage by fogs, contrary winds, and great showers of ice floating down the river. Commodore Swanton, who had sailed from England with a small reinforcement, arrived about the beginning of May, on the ice; in the river St. Lawrence, where, with two ships, he prepared to wait for the rest of his squadron, which had separated from him in the passage; but one of these, the Lowestoff, commanded by Captain Deane, had entered the harbour of Quebec on the first of May, and had communicated to the garrison the joyful news that the squadron was arrived in the river. Commodore Swanton no sooner received intimation that Quebec was besieged, than he sailed up the river with all possible expedition, and on the fifteenth, in the evening, anchored above Point Livi. The brigadier expressing an earnest desire that the French squadron above the town might be removed, the commodore ordered Captain Schomberg of the Diana, and Captain Deane of the Lowestoff, to slip their cables early next morning, and attack the enemy's fleet, consisting of two frigates, two armed ships, and a great number of smaller vessels. They were no sooner in motion than the French ships fled in the utmost disorder.
One of the French vessels was driven upon the rocks above Fort Diamond; the other ran ashore, and was burned at Point au Tremble, about ten leagues above the town; and all the other vessels were taken or destroyed.

§ XX. The enemy were so confounded and dispirited by this disaster, and the certain information that a strong English fleet was already in the river St. Lawrence, that in the following night they raised the siege of Quebec, and retreated with great precipitation, leaving their prov-visions, implements, and artillery to Governor Murray, who had mended to make a vigorous sally in the morning, and attempt to penetrate into the camp of the besiegers, which, from the information of prisoners and deserts, he concluded to be only next morning, and at the enemy's fleet, consisting of two frigates, two armed ships, and a great number of smaller vessels. They were no sooner in

of tools and utensils, two swivels, some barrels of pitch, and a large quantity of iron. The provincials were so incensed at sight of the scalp, that they burned a chapel, and all the houses of the enemy. Batteries being raised on the ness of the river St. Lawrence, and a few days' progress granted some troops whom no man could have been induced to fight even by death, but likewise by the armed sloops; and the disposition was made for giving the assault, when M. Pouchart, the governor, thought proper to beat a parley, and surrender on capitulation. The general, having taken possession of the fortress, it was proposed for fortifying the lake Ontario and the Mohawk river, that be resolved to maintain it with a garrison, and employed some days in preparing the fortifications.

§ XXI. From hence his navigation down the river St. Lawrence was rendered extremely difficult and dangerous, by a great number of violent riffs or rapids, and falls; among which he lost above fourscore men, forty-six boats, seventeen whale-boats, one row-galley, with some artillery, stores, and ammunition. On the sixth day of September the troops were landed on the island of Montreal, without any opposition, except some from flying parties, which exchanged a few shot, and then fled with precipitation. That same day he repaired a bridge which they had broken down in their retreat; and after a march of two leagues, formed his army on a plain before Montreal, where they lay all night on their arms. Montreal is, in general, the situation of the fort, which had been situated in an island of the river St. Lawrence, at an equal distance from Quebec and the lake Ontario. Its central situation renders it the staple of the Indian trade; yet the fort is too small; all these circumstances have been advantageous to the value of the place. General Amherst ordered some pieces of artillery to be brought up immediately from the landing place at La Chine, where he had left some regiments for the security of the boats, and determined to commence the siege in form; but in the morning of the seventh he received a letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil by two officers, demanding a capitulation; which, after some letters had passed between the two generals, was granted upon as favourable terms as the French had reason to expect, considering that General Murray, with the troops from Quebec, had by this time landed on the island; and Colonel Haviird, with the body under his command, had just arrived on the south side of the river opposite to Montreal: circumstances equally favourable and surprising, if we reflect upon the different routes they pursued, through an enemy's country, where they had no intelligence of the motions of each other. Had any accident retarded the provision of the French, they were accomplished; the French would have been attacked by General Murray, who em barked with his troops at Quebec, on board of a great number of small vessels, under the command of Captain Deux, in the fleet of seven, in full navigation; and the provisions had surmounted the difficulties of an unknown, dangerous, and intricate navigation: and conducted the voyage with such success, that not a single vessel was lost in the expedition. M. de Levie, at the head of his forces, watched the motions of General Murray, who, in advancing up the river, published manifestos among the Canadians, which produced all the effect he could desire. Almost all the parishes on the south shore, as far as the river Sorel, submitted, and took the oath of neutrality: and Lord Rollo disarmed all the inhabitants of the north shore, as far as Trois Rivieres, which, though the capital of a district, being no more than an open village, was taken without resistance. In a word, General Amherst took possession of Montreal, and thus completed the conquest of Canada; a conquest the most important of any that ever the British arms achieved, whether we consider the safety of the English colonies in North America, now secured from invasion and encroachment; the extent and fertility of the country subdued; or the whole Indian commerce thus transferred to the traders of Great Britain. The terms of the capitulation may perhaps be thought rather too favourable; but the situation of the country was such that they could not, in all hope of relief; but little points like these ought always to be sacrificed to the consideration of great objects; and the finishing the conquest of a great country without bloodshed, was a great instance of humanity of General Amherst, whose conduct had been irreplaceable during the whole course of the American operations. At the same time, it must be allowed, he was extremely fortunate in having subordinate commanders who perfectly corresponded with his ideas; and a body of men so united and discowage, which others could dismay. Sir William Johnson, with a power of authority and inscriptions peculiar to himself, not only maintained a surprising ascendency over the most ferocious of all the Indian tribes, but kept them within the bounds of such salutary reformation, that not one was permitted to either the utmost subtlety or wickedness; and their humanity was perpetuated by them during the whole course of this expedition. The zeal and conduct of Brigadier-General Gage, the undaunted spirit and enterprising genius of General Amherst, the great General Hawley, who with Colonel Haviird, happily co-operated in promoting this great event.

§ XXII. The French ministry had attempted to succour Montreal, by equipping a considerable number of store ships, and sending them out in the spring under convoy of a frigate; but as their officers understood that the British squadron had sailed up the river St. Lawrence before their arrival, they took shelter in the bay of Chaleurs, on the coast of Acadia, where they did not remain unmolested. Captain Byron, who commanded the ships of war that were left at Louisbourg, having received intelligence of them from Brigadier-General Whitmore, sailed thither with some frigates and a squadron of vessels. The whole fleet consisted of one frigate, two large store ships, and nineteen small vessels; the greater part of which had been taken from the merchants of Great Britain, which rendered these vessels which had been raised for their protection. The French town, consisting of two hundred houses, was demolished, and the settlement totally ruined. All the French subjects inhabiting the territories from the bay of Fundy to the banks of the river St. Lawrence, and all the Indians through that tract of country, were now subdued, and subjected to the English government. In the month of December of the preceding year, the French colonists of Miramichi, Hickle卜 too, and other places lying along the gulf of St. Lawrence, made their submission by deputies to Colonel Fry, who commanded in Fort Cumberland at Chignecto. They afterwards renewed this submission in the most formal manner by subscribing articles, by which they obliged themselves, and the people they represented, to repair in the spring to Bay Verte, with all their effects and shipping, to be disposed of according to the direction of Colonel Lawrence, governor of Halifax, in Nova Scotia. The French government, which had been accustomed to the formation of the Micmacs, a powerful and numerous people, now become entirely dependent upon his Britannic majesty. In a word, by the conquest of Canada, the Indian fur trade was carried into the hands of the British, and the French interest among the savage tribes, inhabiting an immense tract of country, was totally extinguished; and their American possessions shrank within the limits of Louisiana, an infant colony on the south of the Mississippi, which the British arms may at any time easily subdue.

§ XXXIII. The conquest of Canada being achieved, nothing now remained to be done in North America, except the demolition of the fortifications of Louisbourg on the island of Cape Breton; for which purpose some able engineers had been sent from England with the ships commanded by Captain Byron. By means of mines artfully disposed and well constructed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbish, the glass was melted, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were conveyed to Halifax; but the barracks were repaired so as to accommodate three hundred men occasionally; and the hospitals in the private houses, were left standing. The French still possessed, upon the continent of America, the fertile country lying on each side of the great river Mississippi, which disembroges itself into the gulf of Mexico, and the coast of New Spain, which they had rendered so ill provided, that, from being formidable, it scarce could have subsisted, unless the British traders had been base and treacherous enough to supply it from time to time with provisions and other necessaries. The same enterprising commission was employed on with divers Erench plantations in the West Indies; guished the captains and officers belonging to the squadron commanded by Sir James Douglas off the Leeward Islands. In the month of September, Captains Orry, Douglas, and Taylor, of the ships Temple and Griffin, being on a joint cruise off the islands Granaditas, received intelligence that the Virgin, formerly a British sloop of war, which had been taken by them, then lay at anchor, together with three privates, under pretence of two forts on the island, sailed thither in order to attack them, and their enterprise was crowned with success. After a warm engagement, which lasted several hours, the enemy's batteries were silenced, and indeed, of the two forts, and the English captains took possession of the four prizes. They afterwards entered another harbour of that island, having first demolished another fort; and there they lay four days undisturbed, at the expiration of which they carried off three other prizes. In their return to Antigua, they fell in with thirteen ships bound to Martinique with provisions, and took them all without resistance. About the same time eight or nine privates were taken by the ships which Commodore Sir James Douglas employed in cruizing round the island of Guadaloupe, so that the British commerce in those seas suffered under his care and protection.

§ XXXVII. In the East Indies the British arms still continued to prosper. After the reduction of Arcot, the garrisons of Permacool and Allomorpa surrendered themselves prisoners of war in the beginning of May. The French Admiral, the Earl of Chatham, who had the misfortune to run ashore to the northward of Pondicherry. The important settlement of Carnal was reduced by the sea and land forces commanded by Rear-Admiral Cornwallis and Major Monson, and the French garrison made prisoners of war; and Colonel Coote formed the blockade of Pondicherry by land, while the harbour was beset by the English squadron.

§ XXXVIII. Notation of importance was in the course of the war, if the fact be remembered, by the naval force of Great Britain who attacked, in the seas of Europe. A powerful squadron still remained in the bay of Quiberon, in order to amuse and employ a body of French forces on that part of the coast, and intercept the navigation of the enemy; though the principal aim of this armament seems to have been to watch and detain the few French ships which had run into the river Villaine, after the defeat of Conflans; an object, the importance of which will doubtless astonish pietists. The fleet employed on this service was alternately commanded by Admiral Boscowen and Sir Edward Hawke, officers of distinguished abilities, whose talents might have been surely rendered subservient to much greater national advantage. But in this case, the censured scene of action was, to take possession of a small island near the river Vannes, which he caused to be cultivated, and planted with vegetables, for the use of the men, and for the advantage of the English shore. The gentleman, sea air, and want of proper exercise. In the month of September, Sir Edward Hawke, who had by this time relieved Mr. Boscowen, detached the gallant Lord Howe, in the Magannisse, with the ships Prince Frederick and Bedford, to reduce the little island of Dumet, about three miles in length, and two in breadth, abounding with fresh water. It was defended by a small fort, mounted with nine cannon, and manned with one company of the regiment of Bouron, who surrendered in a very short time after the ships had begun the attack. By this small conquest a considerable expense was saved to the nation in the article of transports employed to carry water for the use of the squadron.

§ XXXIX. Admiral Rodney still maintained his former station off the coast of Havre de Grace, to observe what should pass at the mouth of the Seine. In the month of July, while he hovered in this neighbourhood, five large ships were seen off Boulogne, and, not long after, ran from Harlfort, in the middle of the day, with their colours flying, as if they had set the English squadron at defiance; for the walls of Havre de Grace, and even the adjacent hills, appeared the limit of the enemy's power. Sir Edward Hawke, was enabled to behold the issue of this adventure. Having reached the river of Caen, they stood backards and forwards upon the shoals, intending to amuse Admiral Rodney till night, and then proceed under cover of the darkness. He perceived their drift, and gave directions to his small vessels to be ready, and if that as soon as during the night they should make all the sail they could for the mouth of the river Orne, in order to cut off the enemy's retreat, while he himself stood with the larger ships to the steep coast of Port Bassin. The scheme succeeded. But the enemy's retreat cut off, ran ashore at Port Bassin, where the admiral destroyed them, together with the small fort which had been erected for the defence of this harbour. Each of those vessels was one hundred feet in length, and capable of containing four hundred men for a short passage. A numerous destination was we cannot pretend to determine; but the French had provided a great number of these transports; for ten escaped into the river Orne leading to Caen; and in consequence of this disaster one hundred were unloaded, and sent up again to Rouen. This was not all the damage that the enemy sustained on this part of the coast. In the month of November, Captain Orry, of the Acteon, chased a large cracker, and drove her ashore between Cape Barfleur and La Hougue, where she perished. The cutters belonging to Admiral Rodney's squadron scoured the coast towards Dieppe, where a considerable fishery was carried on, and where they took or destroyed near one hundred vessels. But the French, though the English navy suffered nothing from the French during this period, it sustained some damage from the weather. The Conqueror, a new ship of the line, was driven on to the island of Portland, and the crew and cannon were saved. The Lynx, of twenty guns, founderd in the Cattegat, in Norway, and fifty of the men perished; and, in the West Indies, a tender belonging to the Dobis, commanded by Commodore Sir James Douglas, was lost in a gale of wind, with a hundred chosn mariners.

§ XL. Of the domestic transactions relating to the war, the most considerable was the equipment of a powerful squadron for the support of some secret expedition. A numerous body of forces was assembled, and a great number of transports collected at Portsmouth. Generals were nominated to the command of this enterprise. The troops were actually embarked with a great train of artillery; and the eyes of the whole nation were attentively fixed upon this armament, which could not have been prepared without incurring a prodigious expense. Notwithstanding these preparations, the whole summer was spent in idleness and inaction; and in the latter end of the season the undertaking was laid aside. The people did not fail to clamour against the inactivity of the summer, and complain of not withstanding the immense subsidies granted for the prosecution of the war, that they were struck in Europe for the advantage of Great Britain; but that her treasure was lavished upon fruitless parade, or a German alliance still more pernicious. It must be owned, indeed, that no nation exclusive of India could afford to be extravagant on British principles; for the surrender of Montreal was the natural consequence of the steps which had been taken, and of the measures concerted, in the course of the preceding year. It will be allowed, we apprehend, that the expense incurred by the armament at Portsmouth, and the body of troops there detained, would have been sufficient, if properly applied, to reduce the island of Mauritius in the Indian ocean, Martinique in the West Indies, or Minorca in the Mediterranean; and all these three were objects of importance. In all probability, the design of the armament was either to intimidate the French into proposals of peace; to make a diversion from the Rhine, by alarming the coast of Brittany; or to throw over a body of troops into Flanders, to effect a junction with the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who, at the head of twenty thousand men, had made an irruption as far as the Lower Rhine, and even crossed that river; but he miscarried in the execution of these projects.

§ XLI. In the midst of these alarms some regard was paid to the improvements of natural knowledge. The Royal Society having made application to the king, representing to him the importance of the subject, he directed a circular letter, containing a hint that we should be enabled to behold the issue of this adventure. Having reached the river of Caen, they stood backards and forwards upon the shoals, intending to amuse Admiral Rodney till night, and then of this phenomenon at the island of St. Helena near the coast of Africa, and at Bencoolen in the East Indies, his majesty granted a sum of money to defray the expense of sending the general troops to those stations, and ordered a ship of war to be equipped for their conveyance. Accordingly, Mr. Nevil Maskelyne and Mr. Robert华盛顿 were appointed to make the observations at St. Helena; and Mr. Charles Mason and Mr. Jeremiah Dyngarn undertook the voyage to Bencoolen, on the island of Sumatra.

SE. XI.
Except the countries that were actually the scenes of war, no political revolution or disturbance disquieted the general tranquillity. At Smyrna, indeed, felt all the horrors and wreck of a dreadful earthquake, protracted in repeated shocks, which began on the thirteenth day of October, in the neighbourhood of Tripoli. A great number of houses were overthrown at Smyrna, and many people buried under its ruins. It was felt through a space of ten thousand square leagues, comprehending the mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus, with an infinite number of villages, that were reduced to heaps of rubbish. At Äcre, or Tripoli, the sea overflowed its banks, and poured into the streets, though right feet above the level of the water. The city of Saphet was entirely destroyed, and the greatest part of its inhabitants perished. At Damascus, the war of conquest and six thousand people lost their lives. The shocks diminished gradually till the twenty-fifth day of November, when they were renewed with redhead havoc; the earth trembled with the convulsions of the mountains, and Tripoli was destroyed. Balbok was entirely ruined, and this was the fate of many other towns and castles; so that the people who escaped the rains were obliged to squirm in the open fields of all Syria was threatened with the vengeance of Heaven. Such a dangerous ferment arose at Constantinople, that a revolution was apprehended. Mysten, the present emperor, had no sons, but his brother Bayazet, whose life he had spared, contrary to the maxim of ws ever more, it was made evident to one of the women with whom he was indulged in his confinement; a circumstance which aroused the jealousy of the emperor to such a degree, that he resolved to despatch his brother. The great officers of the Porte opposed this design, which was so disagreeable to the people that an inscription ensued. Several Turks and Armenians, taking it for granted that a revolution was at hand, bought up great quantities of grain; and a dreadful death was the consequence of this monopoly. The sultan assembled the troops, quieted the insurgents, ordered the engrossers of corn to be executed; and in a little time the repos of the city was re-established.

SE. XII.
Considering the prospect of a rupture in Italy, no new incident interrupted the tranquillity which the southern parts of Europe enjoyed. The King of Spain, however solicited by the other branch of the house of Bourbon to engage in the war, as its ally, refused to interpose in any other way than as a mediator between the courts of London and Versailles. He sent the Conde de Fuentes, a nobleman of high rank and character, in quality of ambassador extraordinary to the King of Great Britain, in order to offer his good offices for effecting a peace; and the Conde, after having conferred with the English ministry, made an excursion to Paris: but his proposal with respect to a cessation of hostilities, if in reality such a proposal was ever made, did not meet with a cordial reception. Other differences subsisting between the courts of Great Britain and Spain he found no difficulty in compromising. His catholic majesty persisted in the execution of a plan truly worthy of a patriot king. In the first place he spared no pains and application to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the state of his kingdom. He remitted to his people all they owed the crown, amounting to three score millions of reals; demanded and exacted his father's debt, which he would not discharge with the utmost punctuality; an order was sent to the treasury, that ten millions of reals should be annually appropriated for this purpose, until the whole should be liquidated; and to the first year's payment he added fifty millions, to be divided equally among the legal claimants. He took measures for the vigorous execution of these resolutions, and ordered the establishment of a protected commerce; and felt the exquisite pleasure of being beloved as the father of his people. To give importance to his crown, and extend his influence among the powers of Europe, he engaged a powerful squadron of ships at Carthagena; and is said to have declared his intention to employ them against Algiers, should the bey refuse to release the slaves of the Spanish nation.

SE. XIII.
Portugal still seemed averted from the shock of the last war, although only five years had elapsed since that event. The Pope's nuncoo was not only for the court, but even sent under a strong guard to the frontiers: an indignity which induced the pontiff to order the Portuguese minister to Rome to evacuate the ecclesiastical dominions. In the meantime, another embarkation of Jesuits was sent from Lisbon to Civita Vecchia; yet the expulsion of these fathers did not restore the internal peace of Portugal, or put an end to the practice of plotting: for, even since their departure, some persons of rank have been either committed to close prison, or exiled from the kingdom. The Jesuits were not more fortunate in America; for in the month of October, in the foregoing year, an obstinate struggle took place between the Jesuits and the Portuguese at Tord and the Indians of Paraguay, who were under the dominium of the Jesuits: victory at length declared in favour of the two crowns; so that the vanquished were expelled innumerable, and the court of Portugal had made remonstrances to the British ministry against the preoccupancy of the English squadron under Admiral Boscawen, which had attacked and destroyed some French ships under the Portuguese fort in the bay of Lagos, his Britannic majesty thought proper to send the Earl of Kinroul as ambassador extraordinary to Lisbon, where that nobleman made such excursions for the insult of the English admiral, as entirely removed all misunderstanding between the two crowns; and could not fail of being agreeable to the Portuguese monarch, thus respected, soothed, and deprecatoup by a mighty nation, in the very zenith of power and prosperity. On the sixth of June, being the birthday of the King of Portugal, the marriage of his brother Don Pedro with the Princess of Brazil was celebrated in the chapel of the palace where the king resides, to the universal joy of the people. The nuptials were announced to the public by discharge of cannon, and celebrated with illuminations, and all kinds of rejoicing.

SE. XIV.
An accident which happened in the Mediterranean had like to have drawn the indignation of the Ottoman Porte against the Turks. The French ship of the line, mounted with sixty-eight brass cannon, having on board a complement of seven hundred men, besides seventy Christian slaves, under the immediate command of the Turkish admiral, had, in company with two frigates, five galleys, and other small vessels, sailed in June from the Dardanelles; cruised along the coast of Smyrna, Scio, and Troia; and at length anchored in the channel of Scagenia, where the admiral, with four hundred persons, went on shore, on the nineteenth day of September: the Christian slaves, seizing this opportunity, armed themselves with knives, and fell upon the three hundred that remained with such fury and effect, that a great number of them were put to death, and the Turks were forced to retreat overboard into the sea, where they perished; and the rest sued for mercy. The Christians having thus secured possession of the ship, hoisted sail, and bore away for Malta: which, though chased by the two frigates, and a Spaniard ship, they reached, by crowding all their canvas, and brought their prize safe into the harbour of Valette, amidst the acclamations of the people. The order of Malta, as a recom pensation for this signal act of resistance, assigned to the captors the whole property of the ship and slaves, together with all the effects on board, including a sum of money, which the Turkish commander had collected by contribution, amounting to a million and a half of

of Ireland, by the name, styles, and titles of the Duke of York and Albany, and Earl of Ulster. florins. The grand signior was so enraged at this event, that he disengaged his admiral, and threatened to take vengeance on the order of Malta, for having detained the ship, and contemnanzed the capture.

§ XLVI. With respect to the dispute which had so long embroiled the northern parts of Europe, the neutral powers seemed as adverse as ever to a participation. The King of Denmark continued to perfect those plans which he had wisely formed, for increasing the wealth and promoting the happiness of his subjects; nor did he neglect any opportunity of improving natural knowledge, for the benefit of mankind in general. He employed men of ability, who were sent abroad into foreign countries, and to collect the most curious productions, for the advancement of natural history; he encouraged the liberal and mechanic arts at home, by magnificent rewards and peculiar protection; he invited above a thousand foreigners from Germany to become his subjects, and settle in certain districts of Jutland, which had lain waste above three centuries; and they forthwith began to build villages and cultivate the lands, in the dioceses of Wibourg, Arhus, and Roskilde. Their trading expenses from Altona to their new settlement were defrayed by the king, who moreover maintained them until the produce of the land could afford a comfortable subsistence. He likewise bestowed upon some of them a certain number of horses and cattle. Finally, this generous patron having visited these new subjects, who received him with unstepped emotions of joy and affection, he joined them in a common confederacy in which he participated among them, as an additional mark of his favour. Such conduct in a prince cannot fail to secure the warmest returns of loyalty and attachment in his people: and the execution of such laudable schemes will endear his name to the contemplation of posterity.

§ XLVII. The Dutch, as usual, persevered in prosecuting every branch of commerce, without being diverted to less subversive schemes of state policy. TheMemo- rations of France, or the remonstrances of Great Britain. The violation of the peace by their subjects in Bengal was no sooner known at the court of London, than orders were sent to General Yorke, the English ambassador at the Hague, to demand an explanation. He accordingly presented a memorial to the States-general, signifyin that their high mightinesses must doubtless be greatly astonished to hear, by the public papers, of the irregularities committed by their subjects in the East Indies; but that they would be much more amazed on perusing the piece annexed to his memorial, containing a minute account specified with the strictest regard to truth, of the irregular conduct of the abovementioned subjects, and the projects in the river of Bengal, at a time when the factors and traders of Holland enjoyed all the sweets of peace, and all the advantages of un molested commerce; at a time when his high mightinesses were so concerned about their high mightinesses, carefully avoiding giving the least umbrage to the subjects of the United Provinces. He observed, that the king his sovereign was deeply affected by those outrageous designs and machevious designs of the Dutch in the East Indies, whose aim was to destroy the British settlements in that country; an aim that would have been accomplished, had not the king victorious arms brought them to reason, and obliged them to sue for an accommodation. His high mightinesses would willingly believe that their high mightinesses had given no order for procuring to such extremities, and that the directors of their India company had no share in the transaction; nevertheless, he (the ambassador) with some direct and solemn assurance, in the name of the king his master, that all who should be found to have shared in the offence so manifestly tending to the destruction of the English settlements in the East Indies, would immediately be dismissed from all their stations in the company, and that all their high mightinesses should confirm the stipulations agreed upon immediately after the action by the directors of the respective companies, in consideration of which agreement among themselves, they would dispose of all their matters acknowledged their fault, in owning themselves the aggressors. To this remonstrance the States-general replied, that nothing of what was laid to the charge of their subjects had yet reached their knowledge: but they requested his Britannic majesty to suspend his judgment until he should be made perfectly acquainted with the grounds of those disputes; and they promised he should have reason to be satisfied with the exemplary punishment that would be inflicted upon all who should be found concerned in violating the peace between the two nations.

§ XLVIII. The war in Germany still raged with unrelenting fury, and the mutual rancour of the contending parties seemed to derive fresh force from their mutual disappointments: and the house of Brunswick, in its endeavours to render its princes implacable, and obstinately bent upon terminating the war with the destruction of the Prussian monarch. Her allies, however, seemed less actuated by this spirit of revenge. The French king had sustained so much damage and disgrace in the course of the war, that his resources failed, and his finances fell into disorder; he could no longer afford the subsidies he had promised to different powers; while his subjects clamoured loudly the burden of impositions, the ruin of trade, and the repeated dishonours entailed upon the arms of France. Theozzam's zeal for the alliance was evidently cooled by the irregular and defective payments of the subsidies she had stipulated. Perhaps she was in her mind, and charmed to see her armies retire from Germany at the approach of every winter; and the British ministry did not fail to exert all their influence to detach her from the Prussians. She had embossed and disdained, and distinguished in an intellectual parade of hostilities against the house of Brandenburgh; but the French interest began to lose ground in the diet of that kingdom. The King of Prussia, however, exhausted and exasperated at the article of men, betrayed no symptom of apprehension, and made no advance towards a pacification with his adversaries. He had employed the winter in recruiting his armies by every expedient that his fertile imagination could devise; in varying contributions to reinforce the vast subsidy he received from England, in filling magazines, and making every preparation for a vigorous campaign. In Westphalia, the same foresight and activity were exercised by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, who in the beginning of summer found himself at the head of a very numerous army, paid by Great Britain, and strengthened by two-and-twenty thousand national troops.

§ XLIX. No alteration in the terms of this alliance was produced by the death of William, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who breathed his last, in an advanced age, on the twenty-eighth day of January, at Rintelen upon the Weser. He was succeeded in the landgrave's principality by his son, Prince Leopold, whose consort, the Princess Mary, daughter to the King of Great Britain, now, in quality of governor of her children, assumed the regency and administration of the crown of Hesse-Cassel, which she made in the lifetime of her father-in-law, and confirmed by her husband. She had for some years been separated from him, and resides with his father, at whose decease she retired with her children to the city of Zell. The present landgrave, who lived at Magdeburg as vice-governor under the King of Prussia, no sooner learned the news of his father's death, than he sent an intimation of it to that prince and the King of Great Britain; declaring, at the same time, that he would scrupulously adhere to the engagements of his predecessor.

§ L. The advances towards a peace, which had been made in the preceding year by the Kings of England and Prussia, in their letters published in July last, were still in question; and the Prince Louis of Brunswick, seemed to infuse in neutral powers a good opinion of their moderation. We have already seen that the King of Spain offered his best offices to assist in making up a treaty in quality of mediator; and the States-general made an offer of Breda, as a place proper for the negotiation. The King of Great Britain, by the mouth of his ambassador, thanked their high mightinesses for the advice he received from them; but the situation proved to be at the Hague by the ravages of war, which had extended desolation over the face of Europe; he readily closed with their gracious offer; and in consequence of his high regard and invariable friendship for his high mightiness, wished earnestly that it might be acceptable to the other powers at war. The Dutch had expressed their sentiments nearly to the same purpose. His ambassador declared, that his most christian majesty was highly sensible of the offer they had made of Breda, for holding the congress; that, in order to agree, he had on of his sincere desire to increase the good harmony that subsisted between him and the States-general, be accepted their offer with pleasure; but as he could take no step without the concurrence of his high allies, he was obliged to wait for their answer, which could not fail to be favorable, since the Dutch had been enabled to hold oftener for holding the congress. King Stanzlaus having written a letter to his Britonice majesty, offering the city of Nancy for the same purpose, he received a civil answer, expressing the King of England's sense of his obliging offer, which however he declined, as a place not conveniently situated for all the powers interested in the great work of pacification. Civilities of the same nature likewise passed betw een the sovereigns of Nancy and the King of Prussia. As the proposals for an accommodation made by the King of England and his allies might have left an unfavourable impression on their adversaries had they been altogether declined, the desire of Vaux to be employed upon the war was carried into a declaration professing their desire of peace; which declaration was delivered on the third day of April, by the Austrian minister residing at the Hague, to his severe highness Prince Louis of Brunswick; and a positive avowal was also made to him separately by the French and Russian ministers. These professions, however, did not interrupt the operations of the campaign.

§ 4. Though the French army under the Mareschall Duke de Bourgogne remained in cantonment in the neighbourhood of Friedbeurg, and Prince Ferdinand had retired from Cobsdoff to Marburg, where in the beginning of January he established his headquarters, the winter was by no means inactive. As far back as the twenty-fifth day of December, the Duke de Bourgogne, having called in his detachments, attempted to surprise the allied army by a forced march to Kleinn-lunes; but finding them prepared to give him a warm reception, nothing but a cannonade ensued, and he retreated to his former quarters. On the twenty-ninth Colonel Luckner, at the head of the Hanoverian hunters, fell in with a detachment of the enemy, consisting of four hundred men, under the command of Count Muret. These he attacked with such vigour, that the count was made prisoner, and all his party either killed or taken, except two-and-twenty, who escaped. On the 2d of January, the Marquis de Vaugue attacked the town of Herborn, which he carried, and took a small detachment of the allies who were posted there. At the same time the Marquis Dauvet made himself master of Dillenbourg; the garrison of the allied troops being obliged to retire in the castle, where they were closely besieged. Prince Ferdinand no sooner understood their situation, than he began his march with a strong detachment for their relief, on the seventh day of the month, when he attacked and totally defeated the besiegers, took seven hundred prisoners, including forty officers, with seven pair of colours, and two pieces of cannon. On that very day, the highlanders, under Major Koch, supported by the hussars of Luckner, who commanded the whole detachment, attacked the village of Eybach, where Bourgmont's regiment of dragoons was posted on the side of Dillenbourg, and routed him with great slaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many prisoners were taken, together with two hundred horses, and all their baggage. The bands of the allies were also considerably injured by their intrepidity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits, just arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with discipline. On the eighteenth of January, M. de St Germain advanced on the left of the allies with the grenadiers of the French army, supported by eight battalions, and a body of dragoons: but he was encountered by the Duke of Holstein, at the head of a strong detachment, in the neighbour- hood of Osnahruck, where, the partisans of the allies having obliged him to retreat with precipitation. After this attempt the French parties disappeared, and their army retired into winter-quarters, in and about Frankfort on the Main; while Prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Cassel, Paderborn, Munster, and Osnabruck; this last place being allotted to the British troops, as being the nearest to Embden, where the reinforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of February, the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, with a detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz in Saxony for Westphalia, where he safely ar- rived, accompanied by the Duke of Brunswick, with his uncle Prince Ferdinand, and some principal members of the regency of Hanover.

§ 5. I. The French general continued to send out detachments to keep up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March, the Marquis de Blaisel marched at the head of two thousand four hundred men from Gisenc, where he commanded, to Marburg, forced the gates of the town, and compelled the garrison of the allies to take shelter in the castle. As he could not pretend to undertake the siege of the fortress, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he determined of the town; the contribution of one hundred thousand florins, and carried some of the magistrates along with him as hostages for the payment of this impostion. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeld, and Hartford, the frontier posts of allies; but did not think proper to attack either, because he perceived that measures were taken for his reception. The French, with all their boasted politeness and humanity, are sometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the most barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau-Munsen- zelberg for having, without their permission, acknowledged the regency of the landgrave of Hesse Casel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magistrates of that place to pour all the gold and silver plate they contained in the church of the town, amounting to seven hundred and fifty thousand florins, on pann of being subjected to plunder. This order was signified by the Prince de Robecco; to whom the magistrates represented the impossibility of raising such a sum, as the country was totally exhausted, and their credit absolutely destroyed, in consequence of their inability to pay the interest of the capitals negociated in the course of the pre- ceeding year. He still insisted upon their finding the money before night; they offered to pay eighty thousand florins, which they raised with the utmost difficulty, and begged the payment of the rest might be postponed for a few weeks; but their request was rejected with disdain. The place was reinforced by the aid of a regiment, and squadrons dispersed in the principal squares and markets of the city, and the gates were shut. They even planted mediation in the war which had subsisted for some years between France and England; and this war bearing besides nothing in common with that which the two monarchs, with their allies, have ever entered on for some years against the King of Prussia.

Though the British and Prussian majesty in reality treat of his particular peace with England, through the good offices of his catholic majesty, whose mediation is still accepted.

"As to the war which regards directly his Prussian majesty, their majesties to the two monarctes and their allies, the sovereigns of the court of France, that of Vienna, Petersbourgh, and Versailles, residing there,

Their Britannic and Prussian majesty having thought proper to make known, by the declaration delivered, on their part, at the Hague, the 5th of February, 1760, to the king of England, and the princes of the court of France, their assurances of peace and oblation with His Britannic majesty and the King of Prussia on the 22nd of November 1756, to the monarchs and great powers of Europe,

Whereas the British and Prussians, in re-establishing the public tranquillity, they were ready to send plenipotentiaries to the congress of the said courts, as the most respected nation, his important office with these, the better part of the king to state his desire of holding an armistice with him, he acquaints the Emperor King of Hungary and Bohemia, his majesty's vassal, and the king of Poland, Elector of Saxony, as his majesty the king of Sweden, who ought specifically to be invited to the future conference. cannon in the streets, and tarred matches were fixed to many houses, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. These expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of grenadiers entered the houses of the principal magistrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their best effects to the town-wall, burning the rest. Before the town was invested, a sufficient number of_active men, with victuals, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off he distributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to General Imhoff's camp at Amensel, where, after a hundred prisoners. This excursion alarmed the enemy to such a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the Duke de Broglie in person advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but, being unable to follow them, he returned to Frankefort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetterau. This alarm was not so mortifying as the secession of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to ten thousand men, commanded by their duke in person, who left the French army in disgust, and returned to his own country. The imperial army, under the Prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naumburg on the twentieth of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry, having received a check from a body of Prussians near Lutzen, they fell back; and on the fourth day of June encamped at Lichtenfels upon the Maine. The small detachments of the French army, maintaining the grand army, in the bodies commanded by General Sporcken and the Count de St. Germain, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary Prince of Brunswick being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of dragoons, and two regiments of English dragons, advanced to the country of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under General Gisbirds, and achieved some considerable exploits, particularly at Hosenfeld and Leckbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

The French, under the Marschal de Broglie were augmented to one hundred thousand; while the Count de St. German commanded a separate army on the Rhine, consisting of thirty thousand men, assembled from the quarters of Dusseldorp, Cologn, Cleves, and Weel. The second corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by such a division, would be considerably weakened; and the French court thought to form a third army in the Bosphere: but this did not appear. The Duke de Broglie was in such high favour with the French ministry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their dismission; and every step was taken to render the campaign glorious to this admired commander: but, notwithstanding all their care, and his own exertion, he found it impossible to take the field early in the season, from want of provisions. However, having been established at Frankfort, his troops were plentifully supplied with all sorts of provision from the Upper Rhine; but this convenience depended upon his being master of the course of that stream, and maintaining it unapproachable, without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the use of his forces; so that he was obliged to be inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his marches. The same inconveniences operated more powerfully on the side of Prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhausted country, was obliged to fall back as far as Paderborn, and draw his supplies from Hamburg and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weser. By this time, however, he had received a reinforcement of British troops from Embden, under the direction of Major-General Griffin; and before the end of the campaign, the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to five-and-twenty thousand; a greater number than had served at one time upon the continent for two centuries. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the fifth day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the twentieth, they encamped; but part of the troops left in the barracks of Munster, under General Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head against the French corps commanded by the Count de St. German.

The French, under General Imhoff was sent with a detachment to Kirchyn on the Orne; and General Gisblos, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirchfeld on the Fulda. The former of these had ordered Colonel Lecuck, with a body of our carabineers, to assist the officer in that, on the twenty-fourth of May, fell in with a French patrol, which gave the alarm at Burtsbach; when the garrison of that place, amounting to five hundred piquets, under General Waldemar, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, pursued, and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and dispersed. Colonel Lecuck, with the carabineers, entered Burtsbach, and until day-light were redeemed with all the money that could possibly be raised. This excitement, so little to the honour of a civilized nation, the French minister declared to the diet at Hatten, was agreeable to the instructions of his most Christian majesty.

§ LIII. By way of retaliation for the cruelty practised at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army, under General Lecuck, with a body of six thousand men, pursued the French in Fulda, and actually carried off hostages from that city; but retired before a strong body of the enemy, who took possession of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the towns of Hirchfeld and Vaca. Accordingly, they appeared at Vacha, situated on the frontiers of Hesse, and formed the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with such vigour, that Colonel Freytag, who commanded the body to abandon the town; but he maintained himself on a rising ground in the neighbourhood, where he amused the enemy until two battalions of grenadiers came to his assistance. Thus reinforced, he promised a long action, until he was thus reduced to the. Small detachments of the grand army, to the number of the bodies commanded by General Sporcken and the Count de St. Germain, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary Prince of Brunswick being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of dragoons, and two regiments of English dragons, advanced to the country of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under General Gisbird, and achieved some considerable exploits, particularly at Hosenfeld and Leckbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

§ LIV. By the twenty-fourth of June, Prince Ferdinand, quitting his situation at Fritzlar, marched to Friendorf, and encamped on the hills between Ziegenheim and Dusseldorp; where he received a small detachment of the grand army, which was sent by the Count de St. German, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. The hereditary Prince of Brunswick being detached from the allied army, with some battalions of dragoons, and two regiments of English dragons, advanced to the country of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under General Gisbird, and achieved some considerable exploits, particularly at Hosenfeld and Leckbach, where he surprised and took divers parties of the enemy.

§ LVI. By the twenty-fourth of June, Prince Ferdinand, quitting his situation at Fritzlar, marched to Friendorf, and encamped on the hills between Ziegenheim and Dusseldorp; where he received a small detachment of the grand army, which was sent by the Count de St. German, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorp, skirmished with various success. § LIX. In the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with some battalions and squadrons under Major-General Griffin, was sent forward to Saxenhausen, to put the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince continued to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but judging their whole force did not exceed ten thousand infantry and seventeen squadrons, and being impelled by the impetuousity of his own courage, he resolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm and obstinate; but the enemy being contually engaged with both, having the advantage of a numerous artillery, all the prince's efforts were ineffectual. Prince Ferdinand, being at too great a distance to sustain him, sent him an order to rejoin the army, which was by this time forming at Saxenhausen. He forthwith made dispositions for a retreat, which, however, was attended with great confusion. The enemy observing the disorder of the allied troops, piled their artillery with reluished diligence, while a powerful fire was charged to their guns, and by this proceeding the likelihood the whole infantry of the allies would have been General Kielmansegge with a body of troops for the defence of the city, decamped in the night of the thirteenth, and passed the Dythem without loss between Gieben and Dringenberg. The hereditary prince, who had the preceding day passed the same river, in order to reach the French, who was posted near Colbeke, now reconnoitred the position of the enemy, and found them possessed of a very advantageous camp between Warbourg and Ochsendorf. Prince Ferdinand having resolved to attack them, ordered the hereditary prince and General Spirochenk to turn their left, while himself advanced against their front, with the main body of the army. The enemy was accordingly attacked on the same undulations from the rear, with equal impetuosity and success. As the infantry of the allied army could not march fast enough to change at the same time, the Marquis of Granby was ordered to advance with the cavalry of the right; and the brigade of English artillery commanded by Captain Phillips, made such expedition, that they were up in time to second the attack in the most surprising manner. The French cavalry, though very numerous, retired at the approach of the marines, who swept them off the field, with some colours, and ten pieces of cannon; and about the same number were made prisoners. Monsieur de Muy lay all night under arms, on the heights of Volkmisse, from whence he next day retired towards Wolfzangen. By this success, the Marquis of Granby received orders to pass the river in pursuit of them, with twelve British battalions and ten squadrons, and encamped at Widia, about four miles from Warbourg, the heights of which were possessed by the enemy's grand army. By this success, Prince Ferdinand was enabled to maintain his communications with Westphalia, and keep the enemy at a distance from the heart of Hanover. But to these objects he sacrificed the capture of Cassel for Prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, much more numerous than that which was left under General Kielmansegge, advanced towards Cassel, and made himself master of that city; then he reduced Munnau, Cassel, and partly took Kassel, and Briel. All that Prince Ferdinand could do, considering how much he was out-numbered by the French, was to secure posts and passes with a view to retard their progress, and employ detachments to harass and surprise their advanced parties. In a few days after the action at Warbourg, General Luckner repulsed a French detachment which cut off, had not the hereditary prince made a diversion in their favour, by charging in person at the head of the British dragoons, who acted with their usual gallantry and effect. This respite enabled the infantry to accomplish their design, and to turn about two hundred men and fifteen pieces of cannon. General Count Kielmansegge, Major General Griffin, and Major Hill, of Brandenburg's dragoons, distinguished themselves by their conduct and interpidity on this occasion. The hereditary prince exposed his life in the hottest part of the action, and received a slight wound in the shoulder, which gave him far less disturbance than he felt from the chargers and musketry, and the defeat inflicted by his defeat.

§ LVIII. Many days, however, did not pass before he found an opportunity of retaliating this disgrace. Prince Ferdinand receiving advice that a body of the enemy, commanded by Major-General Gaubaut, had advanced on the left of the allies to Ziegenlin, detached the hereditary prince to oppose them, at the head of six battalions of Hanoverians and Hessians, with Elliot's regiment of light horse, Luckner's hussars, and two regiments of chasseurs; of which the main body of about seven thousand men, encamped near the village of Excdrd, and a very warm action ensued, in which Elliot's regiment signalized themselves remarkably by repeated charges. At length victory declared for the allies. The principal detachments of the enemy, commander-in-chief and the Prince of Ahlton Coth, were taken, with six pieces of cannon, all their arms, baggage, and artillery. During these transactions, the Magunians and Hessians, under General of Dragoons, were advanced, and received orders to attack the heights of Corbach. He had, in advancing from Frankfort, to detach troops to the castle of Marpou and Dillenbourgh, which was occupied by the allies, and they fell into hands, the garrisons of both being obliged to surrender prisoners of war. These were but inconsiderable conquests; nor did the progress of the French general equal the idea which had been formed of his talents and activity. The Count de St. German, who was his second officer, and believed by many to be at least his equal in capacity, having now joined his corps to the grand army, and conceiving disgust at his being obliged to serve under the Duke de Broglio, relinquished his command, in which he was succeeded by the Chevalier de Muy. At the same time, the Marquis de Vuyy and the Count de Luc, two generals of experience and reputation, quitted the army, and returned to France, actuated by the same motives.

§ LXI. The allied army having removed their camp from Schildhausen to the village of Kalle near Cassel, remained in that situation till the thirtieth day of July, were the troops were again put in motion. The Chevalier de Muy, having passed the Dythem at Straubergen, with the grand army of five thousand men, and extending this body down the banks of the river, in order to cut off the communication of the allies with Westphalia; while the Duke de Broglio marched up with his main wing to their camp at Kalle, and Prince Xavier of Saxony, who commanded their reserve on the left, advanced towards Cassel; Prince Ferdinand, leaving had advanced as far as Emnbeck, and surprised another at Northem. At the same period, Colonel Donap, with a body of the allied army, attacked a French corps of two thousand men, posted in the wood of Sababour, to prevent their being surprised by the French corps on their left. The two armies engaged, the French losing many of their officers. The French General retired, and, on being reinforced by the reduction of Ziegenheim, garrisoned by seven hundred men of the allied army, who, after a vigorous resistance, were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

§ I.X. On the first day of August, Prince Ferdinand, being encamped at Buhne, received intelligence that a considerable body of the enemy, amounting to upwards of twenty thousand men, were in motion to make a general forage in the neighbourhood of Gutzmar. He passed the Dymel early in the morning, with a body of troops, and some artillery, and posted them in such an advantageous manner, as to render the enemy's attempt totally ineffectual, although the foragers were covered with great part of their army. On the same morning the hereditary prince set out on an expedition to beat up the quarters of a French detachment. Being informed that the volunteers of Clermont and Dauphine, to the number of one thousand three hundred, were in their march at a considerable distance from the French camp at Dierenberg, and passed their time in the most careless security, he advanced towards them from his camp at Warbourg, within a league of them. He found them marching, in companies, to meet any of their patrols; a circumstance that encouraged him to beat up their quarters by surprise: for this service he pitched upon five battalions, with a detachment of horse-guards, and four regiments of dragoons. Leaving their tents standing, they began their march at eight in the evening, and passed the Dymel near Warbourg. About a league on the other side of the Dymel, at the village of Wietzen, they were joined by the light troops under Major Buhlov; and now the disposition was made both for entering the town, and securing a retreat, in case of being repulsed. When they were within two miles of Zierenberg, and in sight of the fires of the enemy's grand guard, the grenadiers of Maxwell, the regiment of Kingsley, and the hIGHLANDERS, advanced by three separate roads, and marched in profound silence; at length, the noise of their feet alarmed the French, who began to fire; when the Fusiliers pressed them, at a round pace with unloaded firelocks, pushed the piquets, threw the guard at the rear, and rushing into the town, drove every thing before them with incredible impetuosity. The attack was so sudden, and the surprise so great, that the French had not time to assemble their garrison, to form their line, or to withstand them. They fled, some through the windows; and in so doing, exasperated the allied troops, who, bursting into the houses, slaughtered them without mercy. Having remained in the place from two till three in the morning, they retired with about four hundred prisoners, including forty officers, and brought off two pieces of artillery. This nocturnal adventure, in which the British troops displayed equal courage and activity, was achieved with very little loss; but, after all, it deserves no other appellation than that of a partisan exploit; for it was attended with no sort of advantage to the allied army.

§ I.XI. Considering the superiority of the French army, we cannot account for the little progress made by the Duke de Broglie, who, according to our conception, might either have given battle to the allies with the utmost probability of success, or penetrated into the heart of Hanover, the conquest of which seemed to be the principal object of the French ministry. Instead of striking an important stroke, he retired from Immenhausen towards Cessel, where he fortified his camp as if he had thought himself in danger of being attacked; and the war was continued for some time by small actions. When, however, being sent with a strong party from the camp of the allied army, which passed with their rear in the neighbourhood of Munden: and attacked them in passing the river Orck with such vigour, that Forsen, with some of his cavalry, was taken, and Buhlov obliged to abandon this attack, we conclude that the action was just determined, when this last was reinforced by the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who had made a forced march of five German miles, which had fatigued the troops to such a degree, that he defeated them in the afternoon. His action was the first of several, which were executed by the allies until the last engagement at Winterberg, the 13th of September.

§ I.XII. Such was the position of the two opposite grand armies, when the world was surprised by an expedition to the Lower Rhine, made by the hereditary Prince of Brunswick. Whether this excursion was intended to hinder the French from reinforcing their army in Westphalia; or to co-operate in the Low Countries with the armament now ready equipped in the ports of England; or to gratify the ambition of a young prince, overboiling with courage, and glowing with the desire of conquest—we cannot explain to the satisfaction of the reader; certain it is, the Austrian Netherlands were at this juncture entirely destitute of troops, except the French garrisons of Ostend and Nieuport, which were weak and inconsiderable. Had ten thousand English troops been landed on the coast of Blankenburg, they might have taken possession of Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, and Antwerp, without resistance, and joined the hereditary prince in the heart of the country; in that case he would have found himself at the head of thirty thousand men, and might have made such a diversion in favour of Hanover, as to transfer the seat of war from Westphalia into Flanders. The empress-queen might, indeed, have been induced, from the formality of declaring war against her, not been observed by Great Britain, but considering that she was the declared enemy of Hanover, and had violated the barrier treaties, in establishing which the kingdom of Great Britain had lavished away so much blood and treasure, a step of this kind, we apprehend, might have been taken, without any imputation of perfidy or injustice. Whatever the motives of the prince's expedition might have been, he certainly quitted the grand army of the allies in the month of September, and traversing Westphalia, with twenty battalions, and as many squadrons, appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbeck and Dusseldorp. On the twenty-ninth day of the month he sent a large detachment over the river at Roorst, which surprised part of the French partisan Fischer's corps at Rhynberg, and scoured the country. Next day, other parties, crossing at Rees and Emmerick, took possession of some of the places which the French had raised along the bank of the river; and here they found a number of boats, sufficient to transport the rest of the forces. Then the prince advanced to Cleve; and at his approach the French garrison retired; a body of five hundred men, under the command of M. de Barré, retired into the castle, which, however, they did not long defend; for on the third day of October they capitulated, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, having in vain endeavoured to obtain more favourable conditions.
§ LXIII. A more important object was Wesel, which the prince invested and began to besiege in form. The approaches were made on the right of the Rhine, while the prince, preceding the army, passed over the Rhine, and kept his communication open with the other side, by a bridge above and another below the place. He had hoped to carry it by a vigorous exertion, without the formality of a regular siege, but he met with a warmer reception than he had expected; and his operations were retarded by heavy rains, which, by swelling the river, endangered his bridges, and laid his trenches under water. The difficulties and delays occasioned by this circumstance entirely frustrated his design. The French, being quite acquainted with his motious, were not slow in taking measures to anticipate his success. M. de Castries was detached after him with thirty battalions and thirty-eight squadrons; and, by forced marches, arrived on the fourteenth day of October at Rhynberg, where the prince's light troops were posted. He attacked immediately, and compelled to abandon the post, notwithstanding all the efforts of the forces, who commanded in person, and appeared in the warmest parts of this short butsingular affair. The enemy, leaving five battalions, with some squadrons, at Rhynberg, marched by the left, and encamped behind the convent at Campen. The prince, having received intimation of these events, felt perhaps some forebodings that were on the march, determined to be beforehand with them, and attempt that very night to surprise him in his camp. For this purpose he began his march at evening, after having detached, five battalions, and five squadrons, under General Hock, with instructions to observe Rhynberg, and attack that post, in case the attempt on Campen should succeed. Before the allied forces could reach the enemy's camp, they were under the necessity of crossing a river to avoid the threatened encampment of irregulars which occupied the convent of Campen, at the distance of half a league in their front. This service occasioned some firing, the noise of which alarmed the French and animated their troops. A body of over-powering Fusilier's corps of irregulars which occupied the convent of Campen, at the distance of half a league in their front. This service occasioned some firing, the noise of which alarmed the French and animated their troops. A body of over-powering Fusilier's corps of irregulars, which did not show signs of retreat, which was not effected without confusion, and left the field of battle to the enemy. His loss, on this occasion, did not fall short of sixteen hundred choice men, killed, wounded, and captured; and the loss of Great Britain, who were always found in the foremost ranks of danger. All the officers, both of infantry and dragoons, distinguished themselves remarkably, and many were dangerously wounded. Among these, the nation regretted the loss of Lord Downe, whose wounds proved mortal; he was a young nobleman of spirit, who had lately embraced a military life, though he was not regularly trained in the service.

§ LXIV. Next day, which was the sixteenth of October, the enemy attacked an advanced body of the allies, which was posted in a wood near Everick, and extended along the Rhine. The firing of cannon and musketry was maintained till six o'clock of the night. The advance of the French infantry, commanded by M. de Cabot, marched through Walsch, and took post among the thicket, at the distance of a quarter of a league, in the front of the prince's army. By this time the Rhine was so much swelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in such a manner, that it was necessary to repair, and move lower down, the bridge which had been thrown over that river. This work was performed in the presence of the enemy; and the prince, passing without molestation, in order to Brummen, where he fixed his head-quarters. His passing the Rhine so easily, under the eye of a victorious army so much superior to him in number, may be counted among the fortunate incidents of his life. Such was the issue of this expedition which exposed the projector of it to the imputation of temerity. Whatever his arm might have been, besides the reduction of Wesel, with the strength of which he did not seem to have been well acquainted, he certainly miscarried in his design; and his miscarriage was attended with the loss of the most important part of the column, which, not only by the action, but also by the dangers engendered from the wet weather, the fatigue of long marches, and the want of proper conveniences, to mention the enormous expense in contingencies incurred by this fruitless undertaking.

§ LXV. In the month of November, while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Schermbeck, a body of the enemy attempted to beat up his quarters; having received intelligence of their designs, he flanked them in his advanced posts, and made a disposition for giving them a proper reception. He abandoned the tents that were in the front of his camp, and posted his infantry in ambushes behind those that were in the rear; at the same time he ordered some regiments of horse and hussars to fetch a compass, and fall upon the back of the enemy. This stratagem succeeded to his wish. The French detachment, believing the allies actually about their camp, began to pile up the tents in the utmost disorder; then the infantry sallied from the place where they were concealed, and fell upon them with great impetuousity: the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank. In a short time defeated by some resistance, they retreated to Wesel on this expedition, scarce two hundred escaped.

§ LXVI. The Duke de Broglie endeavoured, by sundry means, to take advantage of the allied army on the other side of the river; but left four-hundred horses, four squadrons, and twenty-three guns on the bank of the river. The destruction of Wesel and the breach of the walls of the town; the occupation of the bridge; the capture of Castries; the reduction of the camp of several regiments, and the retreat of the great Duke d'Orleans with his troops under the hereditary prince; but he found Prince Ferdinand too vigilant to be surprised, and too strongly situated to be attacked with any prospect of success. He therefore continued himself with his army, and detached two regiments of horse under the command of M. de Steimmile, with a considerable body of forces, to penetrate into the heart of Hanover: and on the fifteenth day of September, that officer falling in with a detachment of the allies, commanded by Major Bullow, was repulsed with great loss; the French, in warm and obstinate engagement, were defeated, and driven to Bulemont, with the loss of their cannon, baggage, and a good number of men, who fell into the hands of the victors. After this exploit, M. de Steimmile advanced to Halberstadt, and demanded of that capital a contribution of one million five hundred thousand livres: but the citizens had been so drawn by former exactions, that they could not raise above thirty thousand; for the remainder the French paid a tax for their victualling. The French took horses, with whom he crossed to the grand army encamped at Cassel, from whence they in a little time fell back as far as Gottingen.

§ LXVII. As the enemy retreated, Prince Ferdinand advanced his army in pursuit of the allies, established his headquarters about the latter end of November. While he remained in this position, divers skirmishes happened in the neighbourhood of Gottingen. Major-General Friedenbach, at the head of two regiments of Hanoverian and Brunswick guards, with a detachment of cavalry, attacked, on the twenty-ninth day of November, the French post at Heydemunde, upon the river Worrau. This he carried, took possession of the town, which the enemy hastily abandoned. Part of their detachment crossed the river in boats; the rest threw themselves into an intrenchment that covered the passage, which the allies endeavoured to force in several unsuccessful attempts, called as they were by the fire of the French and allies's artillery, which did not make the least impression. In the length M. Friedenbach was obliged to desist, and fell back into the town; from whence he retired at midnight, after having sustained considerable damage. Prince Ferdinand had it very much at heart to drive the French from Gottingen, and accordingly invested that city; but the French garrison, which was numerous and well provided, made such a vigorous defence, as baffled all the endeavours of the allies, who were moreover impeded by the rainy weather, to march in the night, and to destroy them from undertaking the siege in form. Nevertheless, they kept the place blocked up from the twenty-second day of November to the twelfth of the following month; when the garrison, in a desperate extremity, sent the issue of the Jacobin posts, and compelled them to raise the blockade. About the middle of December, Prince Ferdinand retired. into winter-quarters; he himself residing at Uslar, and the English troops being cantoned in the hospitable of Puder-burse. Thus the enemy were left in possession of Hesse, and the whole artillery, and a considerable part of the forces of the elector of Hanover. If the allied army had not been weakened for the sake of a rash, ill-concerted, and unsuccessful expedition to the Lower Rhine, in all probability the French would have been obliged to abandon the footing they had gained in the course of this campaign; and in particular to retreat from Gottingen, which they now maintained and fortified with great diligence and circumscription.

§ 1. The King of Prussia, after all his labours, notwithstanding the great talents he had displayed, and the incredible efforts he had made, still found himself surrounded by his enemies, and in danger of being crushed by their closing, and contracting their circle. Even the Swedes, who had languished so long, seemed to be resumed to exertion in Pomerania, during the severity of the winter season. The Prussian General Manteuffel had, on the twentieth day of January, passed the river Peene, overthrew the advanced posts of the enemy at Zieten, and penetrated as far as the neighbourhood of Grieswale; but finding the Swedes on their guard, he returned to Anclam, where his head-quarters were established. This result was soon recalled with interest. On the twenty-eighth day of the month, at five in the morning, a body of Swedes attacked the Prussian troops posted in the suburbs of Anclam, on the other side of the Peene, and draw a brisk fire from thence to Gollmack; at the same time General Manteuffel, being alarmed, endeavoured to rally the troops; but was wounded and taken, with about two hundred men, and three pieces of cannon. The victors, having achieved this exploit, returned to their own quarters.
As for the Russian army, which had winterted on the other side of the Vistula, the season was pretty far advanced before it could take the field; though General Tottleben was detached from it, about the beginning of June, at the head of ten thousand Cossacks, and other light troops, with which he made an irruption into Pomerania, and established his head-quarters at Belgrad.

§ 2. At the beginning of the campaign the King of Prussia, with great precautions for the preservation of Silesia, the conquest of which seemed to be the principal object with the court of Vienna. While the Austrian army, under Marshal Count Daun, lay strongly interested in the neighbourhood of Dresden, the King of Prussia had endeavoured, in the month of December, to make him quit this advantageous situation, by cutting off his provisions, and making an irruption into Bohemia.
For these purposes he had sent a number of troops from Cappel-wa1de, Maxen, and Prettendorf, as if he intended to enter Bohemia by the way of Passberg; but this scheme being found impracticable, he returned to his camp at Freyberg; and in January the Prussian and Austrian armies were campaigning so near each other, that daily skirmishes were fought with much success. The head of the Prussian camp was formed by a body of four thousand men under General Zettwiz, who, on the twenty-ninth day of January, was attacked with such impetuosity by the Austrian General Beck, that he retreated in great confusion to Pordgau, with the loss of five hundred men, eight pieces of artillery, and a considerable quantity of baggage, and other baggage. Another advantage of the same nature was gained by the Austrians at Neustadt, over a small body of Prossians who occupied that city. In the month of March, General Laudon, with a very small detachment of horse and foot, in order to surprise the Prussians, who, in attempting to effect a retreat to Steinau, were surrounded accordingly, and very roughly handled. General Laudon summoned them twice by sound of trumpet to lay down their arms; but their commanders, the Captains Blumenthal and Zettwiz, rejecting the proposal with disdain, the enemy attacked them on all hands with a great superiority of number. In this emergency the Prussian captains formed their troops into a square, and by a close continued fire kept the Prussians at bay; until, perceiving that the Croats had taken possession of a wood between Siebenhausen and Steinau, they, in apprehension of being intercepted, abandoned their baggage, and forced their way to Steinau, which they reached with great difficulty, having been continually harassed by the Austrians, who paid dear for this advantage. Several other petty exploits of this kind were achieved by detachments on both sides before the campaign was brought to a close. The King of Prussia attacked a detachment of the enemy near Count Daun, and at the same time detached a body of troops, as a reinforce-were killed or taken; but the loss of the victors is said to have exceeded that of the vanquished. In July General Laudon undertook the siege of Glazt, which was taken after a very stout resistance; for on the very day the batteries were opened against the place, the garrison abandoned part of the fortifications, which the besiegers immediately occupied. The Prussians made repeated efforts to recover the place before it had lost; but they were repulsed in all their attempts. At length the garrison laid down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. From this tame behaviour of the Prussians, one might imagine the garrison to be no very strong. A resistance which one cannot reconcile with the known sagacity of the Prussian monarch, as the place was of great importance, on account of the immense magazine it contained, including above one hundred brass cannon, a great number of mortars, and a vast quantity of ordnance.

V. Laudohn, encouraged by his success at Glazt, advanced immediately to Breslau, which he began to bombard with great fury; but, before he could make a regular attack, he found himself obliged to retire. Prince Henry of Prussia, one of the most accomplished generals which this age produced, having received repeated intelligence that the Russian army intended to join Laudon at Breslau, was ordered to advance before the purposeted junction. In the latter end of July he began his march from Giessen, and on the last day of that month had reached Linden, near Slavie, where he understood that Tottel's detachment only had passed through the place of Polnisch-Lissa, and that the second division of Lavrustin, had marched through Kosten and Gustin. The prince, finding it impossible to pursue them by that route, directed his march to Glogau, where he learnt that Breslau was besieged by General Laudon, and immediately advanced by forced marches to its relief. Such was his expedition, that in five days he marched above one hundred and twenty English miles; and at his approach the Austrian governor, and by his prudence and activity, he not only prevented the junction of the Russian and Austrian armies, but also saved the capital of Silesia, and hampered Laudon in such a manner as subjected him to a defeat by the Prussian monarch, to whose motions we shall now turn our attention.

VI. Whether his design was originally upon Dresden, or he purposed to co-operate with his brother Prince Henry of Silesia, which his adversities seemed to have pitched upon as the scene of his operations, we cannot presume to determine; but certain it is, he, in the beginning of July, began his march to two columns through Lusatia; and Count Daun being informed of his march, ordered his army to join the march of the army of Saxony in the same manner, and by the body of troops under Lacy, to guard Saxony in his absence, he marched with great expedition towards Silesia, in full persuasion that the Prussian monarch would contest his route. In the month of July, the king, knowing that Daun was now removed at a distance, repassed the Pulants, which he had passed but two days before, and advanced with the van of his army towards Lichtenberg, in order to attack the forces of General Lacy, who was posted there; but the Austrians retired at his approach. Then the army marched to Marienstern, where the king received intelligence that Count Daun was in full march for Lauban, having already gained two marches upon the Prussians. Perhaps it was this distrust that determined the king to change his plans, and return to the Elbe. On the eighth day of the month he repassed the Sprehe, in the neighbourhood of Lauban, and began an attack upon the Prussians. On the thirteenth, his army having passed the Elbe at Kudetz, on a bridge of boats, encamped between Pirna and Dresden, which last he resolved to besiege, in hopes of reducing that place. How far this expectation was well grounded, we must leave the reader to judge, after having observed that the place was now much more defensible than it had been when the last attack of the Austrians upon it miscarried; that it was secured, in a manner not to be ascribed to General Macquarie, an officer of courage and experience.

This governor was summoned to surrender, answered that, having the honour to be intrusted with the defence of the capital, he would maintain it to the last extremity. Batteries were immediately raised against the town on both sides of the Elbe; and the poor inhabitants subjected to a dreadful devastation, that their calamities might either drive them to the castle, or induce them to embrace articles of capitulation; but these expedients proved ineffectual. Though the suburbs towards the Pirna gate were attacked and carried, this advantage made no impression on General Macquarie. The town was surrounded on every side, and the utmost precaution was taken for the defence of the city; encouraged moreover by the vicinity of Lacy's body, and the arm of the empire, encamped in an advantageous position near Gross Seydlitz; and confiding that Count Daun would hasten to his relief. In hope he was not disappointed; the Austrian general, finding himself shunted by the strategem of the Prussian monarch, and being made acquainted with his enterprise against Dresden, continued his march towards the castle with such rapidity, that on the nineteenth day of the month he reached the neighbourhood of the capital of Saxony. In consequence of his approach the King of Prussia, whose heavy artillery was not arrived, resolved to carry his efforts against the city, so as to reduce to ashes the cathedral church, the new square, several noble streets, some palaces, together with the curious manufactary of porcelain. His vengeance must have been levelled against the citizens; for it affected neither the fortresses, nor the Austrian garrison, which Count Daun found means to reinforce with sixteen battalions. This supply, and the neighbourhood of three hostile armies, rendered it altogether impossible for the city to be held. The king, therefore, abandoned the undertaking, withdrew his troops and artillery, and endeavoured to bring Daun to a battle, which that general cautiously avoided. The battle, on the seventh of August, was the least of its crisis. Notwithstanding all the efforts of his brother Prince Henry, the Russians were fast advancing to join Laudon, who had already blocked up Schweidnitz and Nessin, and their junction seemed to threaten the loss of Silesia. The king had nothing to oppose to superior numbers but superior activity, of which he determined to avail himself without delay. Instead of making a feint towards Silesia, he resolved to march thither in earnest; and for that purpose, crossing the Elbe, encamped at Dallwitz, on the further bank of the river; leaving General Hulsen, with fifteen thousand men, to guard him, and to maintain his footing in Saxony. On the third day of August he began his march for Silesia, followed by Count Daun with the grand Austrian army; while the detached body under Lacy took post at Reichenberg, and the imperial Austrian army encamped between Kresan and Cossendon, at a distance of ten miles. Count Daun’s army formed the centre of this chain, possessing the heights of Waldstadt and Hoehkirk; General Laudohn covered the ground between Jeschkendorf and Coschitz; the rising grounds of Parchwitz were secured by General Nauendorff; and M. de Beck, who formed the left, extended his troops beyond Cossendon. The king himself, on the evening of the 11th, with a view to turn the enemy, and reached Jauer; but at break of day he discovered a new camp at Prasutins, which consisted of Lacy’s detachment, just arrived from Lauen. The Prussians immediately passed to Kattsbach, to attack this general, who had occupied the river barrier at the head of the army of Count Daun, that he not only baffled the endeavours of the king to bring him to action, but, by posting himself on the heights of Heimersdorf, anticipated his march to Jauer. In vain the Prussian monarch attempted next day to turn the enemy on the side of the mountains, by Ponsen and Jagersdorf; the roads were found impassable to the ammunition wagons, and the king returned to the camp at Lignitz.

§ 8. While he remained in this situation, he received advice that four and twenty thousand Russians, under Count Czernichew, had thrown bridges over the Oder at Aurn, where they intended to cross that river; and he concluded the enemy had formed a design to close him in, and attack him with their joint forces. Daun had indeed projected a plan for surprising him in the night, and had actually put his army in motion for that purpose; but he was anticipated by the vigilance and good fortune of the Prussian monarch. That prince, reflecting that if he should wait for his adversaries in his camp, he ran the risk of being attacked at the same time by Lacy on his right, and by the enemy in front, of which he had lowered his position, in order to disconcert their operations; and, on the fourteenth day of the month, marched to the heights of Pasaiendorf, where he formed his army in the front of that fortification. On the 21st of the month, that Laudohn was in full march advancing in columns by Becowitz, he divided his army into two separate bodies. One of these remained on the ground, in order to maintain the posts against any attempts that might be made by Count Daun to succour Laudohn; and that this service might be the more effectually performed, the heights were fortified with batteries, so judiciously disposed as to impede and overawe the whole Austrian army. The king having taken this precaution, wheeled about with sixteen battalions and thirty squadrons, on the 22nd of August, to fall upon Laudohn as he should advance; but that general knew nothing of his design, until he himself arrived at the village of Pusowitz, when he learnt that the assault was imminent. The sun was in its first dawning, and a thick fog gradually dispersing, the whole detachment of the Prussian army appeared in order of battle, in a well chosen situation, strengthened with a numerous train of artillery, placed to the best advantage. Laudohn was not a little startled to find himself cast off in his own snare; but he had advanced too far to retrace; and therefore making a virtue of necessity, resolved to stand an engagement. With this view he formed his troops as well as he could, in three ranks, in view of the smoke and dust of the gunpowder, and the tumult of the approaching Prussian army. The king rode along the line to animate the troops, and superintended every part of the charge; having passed through the most dangerous parts of the battle to such a degree that his horse was killed under him, and his clothes were shot through in several places. The Austrians maintained the contest with great obstinacy until six in the morning, when they gave ground and were pursued to the Katschabach; beyond which the king would not allow his troops to prosecute the advantage they had obtained. At noon, however, it was perceived that Count Daun would succeed in his attempt to advance against them from Lignitz. The general had actually begun his march to fall upon the Prussians on one side, while Laudohn would attack on the other; and he was not a little surprised to find they were decamped; and when he perceived a thick cloud of smoke at a distance, he immediately comprehended the nature of the king’s management. He then attempted to advance by Lignitz; but the troops were disposed in such a manner as to prevent the general from marching, and to impede his advance at Pasaiendorf, to dispute his march, were so advantageously disposed, as to render all his efforts abortive. Laudohn is said to have lost in the action above eight thousand men, killed, wounded, and taken, including eighty officers, with twenty-three pair of colours and eighty-two pieces of cannon; over and above this loss, the Austrian general suffered greatly by desertion. The Prussians obtained the victory at the expense of one general, with nine hundred men killed, and twelve hundred wounded. Immediately after the action the victory marched to Parchwitz; while Daun detached Prince Lowenstein and General Beck with the reserve of his army, to join Prince Czernichew, who had encamped the day before at an intrenched camp, and was intimidated by the defeat at Lignitz, that he forthwith passed that river, and Prince Lowenstein retired on the side of Jauer. By this bold and well conducted adventure, the Prussian monarch not only escaped the most imminent hazard of a total defeat from the joint efforts of two strong armies, but also prevented the dreaded junction of the Russian and Austrian forces. His business was now to open the communication with Bethlen and thus break Prince Henry, whom he joined at Neumark. The prince, after Laudohn was obliged to relinquish the siege of Breslaw, had kept a watchful eye over the motions of the Russian army, which had advanced into the neighbourhood of that city; and without all doubt would have bombard ed it from some commanding heights, had they not been prevented by Prince Henry, who took possession of these posts, and fortified them with redoubts. The king having freed Breslaw from the neighbourhood of his enemies, and being strengthened by the junction with his brother, left a considerable detachment under the command of General Boltz, to protect the country against the Russian invaders; while he himself proceeded to Schwedt, which was blocked up by the Austrian forces under the command of the Mareschal Count Daun. In his march he fell upon a separate body under General Beck, made two thousand prisoners, and engaged in the destruction of several squadrons. This achievement had such an effect upon the enemy, that they raised the blockade, and retreated with some precipitation to the mountains of Lidshut.

§ 9. While the king thus exerted himself, with a spirit altogether unexamined, in defending Silesia, General Hulsen, who commanded his troops in Saxony, was exposed to the most imminent danger. Understanding that the army of the empire had formed a design to cut off his communications with Torgau, he quitted his camp at Munsen, and marched to Streih. The enemy having divided their forces into two bodies, one of them, on the twelfth day of August, attacked an advanced post of the Prussians; while the other attacked another. He learnt to save Hulsen’s camp, and prevent him from taking any step for the relief of his battalions, who maintained their ground with difficulty against a superior number of the assailants. In this emergency the Prussian general ordered his cavalry to make a circuit round a rising ground, and, if possible, charge the enemy in flank. This order was executed with equal vigour and success. They fell upon the imperial army with such impetuosity, as drove their batteries and hussars before each other in instantaneous confusion. A considerable number of the enemy were slain, and forty-one officers, with twelve hundred men, made prisoners. By this advantage, which was obtained at a very small expense, General Hulsen opened for himself a way to Torgau, whether he instantly retreated, or taken that the whole army of the imperialists was advancing to cut off his communication with the Elbe. This retreat furnished the enemy with a pretext for claiming the victory.

§ 4. After all these heroic endeavours of the Prussian monarch and his officers, his fate remained in such a desperate situation as seemed to press approaching ruin: for though in person he commanded a numerous and well-appointed army, he found it absolutely impossible to drive the Russians out of Saxony, without the aid of the different detachments from the three separate armies of his adversaries. Bodies of Austrian troops secured the country of Lusatia; the Russians traversed the part of Silesia, and made inroads even into Brandenburg. The imperial army was stationed in Saxony, confronting the Swedish army, meeting with no opposition, advanced into the heart of Pomerania; so that the king was not only threatened on every side, but all correspondence between him and his hereditary dominions was at this juncture intercepted.

§ 5. His adversaries, having been hitherto baffled by his activity and resolution in their designs upon Silesia, now meditated a scheme, the execution of which he could not but feel in the most sensible manner. The Russian army being on its retreat from Silesia, Count Czerniechow was sent with a strong detachment into the March of Brandenburg; while a numerous body of Austrians advanced into Lusatia, proceeded to the same country from Saxony, with instructions to join the Russians at the gates of Berlin. The Prussian general, Hulsen, finding himself too weak to cope with the army of the empire in Mosina, had fallen back to this extremity, where he was joined by the first sumptuous articles of capitulation of the French, which, being refused, they surrendered themselves prisoners of war. In favour of the city the foreign ministers there residing interposed their mediation with such zeal and activity, that in a very short time the inhabitants were indulged with the free exercise of their religion, and immunity from violence to their persons and effects. The enemy promised that the Russian irregulars should not enter the town; before the great armies appeared. At their approach the Prussian generals retreated, leaving three weak battalions in the place, in hopes they might be the means of obtaining some sort of terms for the city. They made no resistance, however; but after the first sumptuous articles of capitulation of the French, which had been their best resource; and in danger of being driven into his hereditary country of Brandenburg, which was unable either to maintain, or even to recruit, his army. The enemy, on this occasion, made a great effort against the grand Austrian army, under Count Daun, who had passed the Elbe at Torgau, and advanced to Eulentburg, from whence however he retreated to his former camp at Torgau; and the king chose his situation between this last place and Schultza, at Langeseuchen, where his horses attacked a body of horse under General Breslano, and made four hundred prisoners. The right wing of the Austrians being at Grosseuth, and their left at Torgau, the Prussian king determined to attack them next day, which was the third of November. His design was to march through the wood of Torgau by three different routes, with thirty battalions and fifty squadrons of horse, and left wing of the licentious soldiery of Markrene to Neuden; the second, by Pechkutz to Elsnack; and the third, consisting of cavalry, to penetrate by the wood of Wildenhain to Vogelsang. On the other hand, General Zieten was directed to take the great Leipzig road, with thirty battalions and seventy squadrons of the right; and, quitting it at the ponds of Torgau, to attack the villages of Spant and Grosseuth. The king's line, in its march, fell in with a corps of Austrians under General Wolziger, which was in the forest of all the above, and another more considerable body, posted in the wood of Wildenhain, likewise retreated to Grosseuth, after having fired some pieces of artillery; but the dragon's of St. Leon, being engaged between two bodies of infantry, were either killed or taken. By two in the afternoon the king had penetrated through the wood to the plain of Neiden, from whence another body of the enemy retired to Torgau. The Elector of Saxony, on small arms declared that General Zieten was already engaged. The Prussians immediately advanced at a quicker pace, and passing the morasses near Neiden, mellowed to the right in three lines, and soon came to action. Dorn had chosen a very advantageous situation; his right extended to Gersowich, and his left to Zinne; while his infantry occupied some eminences along the road of Leipsic, and his front was strengthened with no less than two hundred cannon. Upon a comparison of forces, the Prussians had the advantage on an extent of ground, which terminated in hillocks to wards the Elbe; and against this the king directed his attack. It had already given his troops to understand, that the Prussian army was in such a situation, they must either conquer or perish: and they began the battle with the most desperate impetuosity; but they met with such a warm reception from the artillery, small arms, and in particular from the Austrian carabiniers, that their grenadiers were shattered and repulsed. The second charge, though enforced with incredible vigour, was equally unsuccessful: then the king ordered his cavalry to advance, and they fell upon some regiments of infantry with such fury as obliged them to give way. These, however, were compelled to retire, in their turn, before about seventy battalions of the enemy, who advanced towards Torgau, stretching with their right to the Elbe, and their left to Zinne. While the Prussians dispersed their cavalry, and returned to the charge, the third line of Prussian infantry, under the general of the vineyard of Suptitt, and General Zieten, with the right wing, took the enemy in rear. This disposition threw the Austrians into disorder; which was greatly augmented by the disaster of Count Daux, who was dangerously wounded in the thigh, and carried off the field of battle. But the Prussians could not pursue their victory, because the action had lasted until nine; and the night being unusually dark, they hesitated in their design against Hanover. Their loss was considerable; for they lost the Elbe on three bridges of boats thrown over the river at Torgau. The victor possessed the field of battle, with seven thousand prisoners, including two hundred officers, twenty-one pair of colours, one standard, and about forty pieces of cannon. The carnage was very great on both sides: about three thousand Prussians were killed, and five thousand wounded; and, in the first attack, two general officers, with fifteen hundred soldiers, were made prisoners by the enemy. The king, as usual, exposed his person in every part of the battle, and a musket-ball grazed upon his breast. In the morning the King of Prussia entered Torgau; then he secured Meissen, and took possession of this celebrated city. The notification of this unexpected victory, his position was nearly the same at the opening of the campaign.

§ XIII. The Austrians, however, notwithstanding this chat decided to evacuate ground in the neighbourhood of Dresden; while the Prussians overtook them on the outskirts of cantonment in and about Leipsic and Meissen. As the Austrian general had, after the battle, recalled his detachment, General Landowk abandoned Landschut, which again fell into the hands of the Prussians, and the imperial army was obliged to retire into Franconia. The Swedes, having penetrated a great way into Pomerania, returned again to their winter-quarters at Stralsund; and the Russian general marched back to his way to the Vistula; so that the Confederates gained little else in the course of this campaign, but the contributions which they raised in Berlin, and the open country of Brandenburgh. Had all the allies been heartily bent upon crushing the Prussian monarch, one would imagine the Russians and Swedes might have joined their forces in Pomerania, and made good their winter-quarters in Brandenburgh, where they could have been supplied with materials from the Baltic, and been able to march in execution of their plan. But, in all probability, such an establishment in the empire would have given umbrage to the Germanic body.

§ XIV. The diet of Poland being assembled in the beginning of the same period, some of the diet, torn by the disputes between the partisans of France and the partisans of Prussia, and by the disputes between the partisans of, the diet, tore up a tumultuous manner, even before they had been chosen a marshal. The elector of Saxony, having brooked the abuse about the same period, seemed determined to proceed upon business. They elected Count Axel Ferson, their grand marechal, in opposition to Count Horn, by a great majority; which was an unlucky circumstance for the Prussian interest at Stockholm, insomuch as the same majority obstinately persisted in opinion, that the war should be prosecuted in the spring with redoubled vigour, and the army in Germany reinforced to the number of at least thirty thousand foot and horse. This circumstance made but little impression upon the Prussian monarch, who had maintained his ground with surprising resolution and success since the beginning of this campaign; and now enjoyed, in prosperous winter, which he is said to have termed his best auxiliary.

§ XV. The animosity which inflamed the contending parties was not confined to the operations in war, but broke out, as usual, in printed declarations, which the belligerent powers diffused all over Europe. In the beginning of the season the states of the circle of Westphalia had been required, by the imperial court, to furnish their contingent of troops against the King of Prussia, or to commute for this contingent with a sum of money. In consequence of this demand, some of the Westphalian estates had sent deputies to confer with the assembly of the circle of Cologne; and to these the king signified, by a declaration dated at Munster, that as this demand of money was extraordinary than contrary to the constitutions of the empire, should they comply with it, or even continue to assist his enemies, either with troops or money, he would consider them as having actually taken part in the war against him and his allies, and treat them accordingly on all occasions. This intimation produced little effect in his favour. The Duke of Mecklenbourg adhered to the opposite cause; and the Elector of Cologne co-operated with the French in support of it. The way of revolution for this partiality, the Prussians ravaged the country of Mecklenburg, and the Hanoverians levied contributions in the territories of Cologne. The parties thus aggrieved bad recourse to complaints and remonstrances. The duke's envoy at Ratisbon communicated a rescript to the imperial ministers, representing that the Prussian troops under General Werner and Colonel de Bellug, had distressed his country in the autumn by grievous exactions; that afterwards Prince Eugen of Wurttemberg, in the service of Prussia, had demanded an exorbitant quantity of provisions, with some millions of money, and a great number of recruits; or, in lieu of these, that the duke's forces should act under the command of Hanover. By way of retaliation for this partiality, the Prussians ravaged the country of Mecklenburg, and almost depopulated, by their oppressions, the dukedom, which would put a stop to these violent proceedings. This declaration was by some considered as the prelude to his renouncing his engagements with the house of Austria. As the imperial court had threatened to put the Elector of Hanover under the ban of the empire, in consequence of the hostilities which his troops had committed in the electorate of Cologne, his resident at Ratisbon delivered to the ministers who assisted at the diet a memorial, requesting that the emperor should be power, singly, to subject any prince to the ban, or declare him a rebel; and that, by arrogating such a power, he exposed his authority to the same contempt into which the Pope's bulls of excommunication were so justly fallen. With respect to the Elector of Cologne, he observed, that this prince was the first who commenced hostilities, by allowing his troops to co-operate with the French in their invasion of Hanover, and by celebrating with rejoicings at Ratisbon the advantages which they had gained at Warsaw; he therefore gave the states of the empire to understand, that the best way of screening their subjects from hostile treatment would be a strict observance of neutrality in the present disputes of the empire.

§ XVI. This was a strain much more affectual among princes and powers who are generally actuated by interested motives, than was the repetition of complaints, equally pathetic and unwavering, uttered by the unfortunate King of Poland, Elector of Saxony. The damage done to his capital by the last attack of the Prussian monarch on that city, affected the old king in such a manner, that he published at Vienna an appeal to all the powers of Europe, from the outcry and unpremeditated outrages which distinguished the course of his adversaries in Saxony. All Europe participated in the fate of this exiled prince, and sympathized with the distress of his country; but, in the breasts of his enemies, reasons of state and convenience overruled the suggestions of humanity; and his friends had but little chance of securing themselves in vain for the deliverance of his people.

§ XVII. From this detail of continental affairs, our attention is naturally recalled to Great Britain, by an incident of a very interesting nature, that occurred in the month of June, which, however, shall postpone till we have recorded the success that, in the course of this year, attended the British arms in the East Indies. We have already observed, that Colonel Coote, after having defeated the French general, Lally, in the field, and reduced divers of the enemy's settlements on the coast of Coromandel, at length cooped them up within the walls of Pondicherry, the principal seat of the French East India company, large, populous, well fortified, and secured with a numerous garrison, under the immediate command of their general. In the month of October Admiral Stevens sailed from Trincomalee with all his squadron, in order to its being detached, except five sail of the line, which, under the command of Captain Udall, he forced on land to block up Pondicherry by sea, while Mr. Coote carried on his operations by land. By this dispositions, and the vigilance of the British officers, the place was so hemmed, as to be completely distrest for want of provisions, even before the enemy could be enabled to take a regular position; and it was rendered all regular approaches impracticable. These being taken by the twenty-sixth day of November, Colonel Coote directed the engineers to patch up on proper places for erecting batteries, that should enable the French to flank the work of the garrison, without exposing their own men to any severe fire from the enemy. Accordingly, four batteries were constructed in different places, so as to overlook the enemy's quarters, and opened artillery on the eighth day of December at midnight. Though raised at a considerable distance, they were fired with good effect, and the besieged returned the fire with great vivacity. This mutual cannonading continued until the twenty-ninth day of the month, when the engineers were employed in raising another battery, near enough to effect a breach in the north-west counter-guard and curtain. Though the approaches were rendered some days a violent storm, which almost ruined the works, the damage was so repaired, a considerable post was taken from the enemy by assault, and afterwards regained by the French garrisons, through the intrepidity of the sepoys by whom it was occupied. By the twenty-seventh, the magazines and guns were exhausted within point-blank: a breach was made in the curtain; the west face and flank of the north-west bastion were rained, and the guns of the enemy entirely silenced. The garrison and inhabitants of Pondicherry were now reduced to an extremity of famine which would admit of no hesitation. General Lally sent a colonel, attended by the chief of the Jesuits, and two civilians, to Mr. Coote, with proposals of surrendering the garrison prizes of war, and demanding a capitulation in behalf of the French East India company. On this last subject he made no reply; but next morning took possession of the town and citadel, where he found a great quantity of artillery, ammunition, ammunitions, and military stores; then he secured the garrison, amounting to above two thousand Europeans. Lally made a gallant defence; and, had he been properly supplied with provision, the conquest of the place would not have been so easily achieved. He certainly flattered himself with the hopes of being supplied; otherwise an effect of his experience would have demanded a capitulation, before he was reduced to the necessity of acquiescing in the conqueror's terms, which might have thought it proper to impose. That he spared no pains to procure supplies, appears from an intercepted letter written by this commander to Monsieur Raymond, French resident at Pullicat.—The bill is no bad sketch of the writer's character, which seems to have a strong tincture of oddity and extravagance.

instance upon record. A rupture of this nature appears the more remarkable, as it happened to a prince of a healthy constitution, unaccustomed to excess, and far advanced beyond that period of life when the blood might be supposed to flow with a dangerous impetuosity.

§ XX. Thus died George II. at the age of seventy-seven, after a long reign of thirty-four years, distinguished by a very important character, and marked by a succession of vicissitudes of fortune. He was in his person taller than the middle size, well shaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high nose, and fair complexion. In his disposition he is said to have been hasty, prone to anger, and much addicted to the use of strong words.

The administration, under which his fortune, his fortune, was a step so likely to aggravate the disorder of the nation, so big with cruelty, ingratitude, and insolence, that it seems to deserve an appellation which, however, we do not think proper to bestow. An inglorious war was succeeded by the death of a people, which proved of short duration; yet in this interval England exhibited such a proof of commercial opulence, as astonished all Europe. At the close of a war which had drained it of so much treasure, and increased the public debt to an enormous burden, the great national interest was not one would hardly think the ministry durst have proposed, even before one half of the national debt was contracted. A much more unpopular step was a law that passed for naturalizing the Jews—a law so odious to the people in general, that it was soon repealed, at the request of that minister by whom it had been chiefly patronized.

An ill-concerted peace was in a little time productive of fresh hostilities, and another war with France, which Britain began to prosecute under unfavourable auspices. Then the whole political system of Germany was inverted. The King of England abandoned the interest of that house, which had so long been protected, and took into his bosom a prince whom he had formerly considered as his inveterate enemy. The unpriuipitous beginning of this war against France being imputed to the minister of the day, the conduct of that minister was fiercely assailed by the people, as seemed to threaten a dangerous insurrection. Every part of the kingdom resounded with the voice of dissatisfaction, which did not even respect the throne. The king found himself obliged to accept of a minister presiding over the people; and the measure was attended with consequences as favourable as his wish could form. From that instant all clamour was hushed; all opposition ceased. The enterprising spirit of the new minister, it is true, itself carried that spirit into the war; and conquest every where attended the efforts of the British arms. Now appeared the fallacy of those maxims, and the falsehood of those assertions, by which former ministers had established, and endeavoured to excuse, the practices of corruption. The supposed dissolution, which had been insisted on as the source of parliamentary opposition, now entirely vanished; nor was it found necessary to unmask means for securing a majority, in order to answer the purposes of the administration. England, for the first time, saw a minister of state in full possession of popularity. Under the auspices of this minister, it saw a national militia formed, and trained to discipline by the most regular spirit; the general machine of contrivance, contrived to secure a constant majority in parliament, was overturned, and the inventor of it obliged to quit the reins of government. Professed patriots, who had, in one particular instance, meted out punishment, and destroyed persons, in the name of the people, is now found necessary to unmask means for securing a majority, in order to answer the purposes of the administration. England, for the first time, saw a minister of state in full possession of popularity. Under the auspices of this minister, it saw a national militia formed, and trained to discipline by the most regular spirit; the general machine of contrivance, contrived to secure a constant majority in parliament, was overturned, and the inventor of it obliged to quit the reins of government. Professed patriots, who had, in one particular instance, meted out punishment, and destroyed persons, in the name of the people, is now found necessary. Nor did they murmur at seeing great part of their treasure diverted into foreign channels; nor did they seem to bestow a serious thought on the accumulating load of the national debt, which already exceeded the immense sum of one hundred millions.

§ XXI. In a word, they were intoxicated with victory; and as the king happened to die in the midst of their transports, asseconded by the final conquest of Canada, their good humour, their spirit, and the general magnificence of encomiums. A thousand pens were drawn to paint the beauties and sublimity of his character, in poetry as well as prose. They extolled him above Alexander in courage and heroism, above Twelve in magnificence, in clemency, Antoninus in piety and benevolence, Solomon in wisdom, and St. Edward in devotion. Such hyperbolical eulogiums served only to throw a ridicule upon a character which was otherwise respectable. The two unver-sities vied with each other in lamenting his death; and each published a huge collection of elegies on the subject: nor did they fail to exalt his praise, with the warmest expressions of affection and regret, in the compliments of condolence and congratulation which they presented to his successor. The same panegyric and pathos appeared in all the addresses with which every other subject in the kingdom approached the throne of our present sovereign; insomuch that we may venture to say, no prince was ever more popular at the time of his decease. The English are naturally warm and picturesque; and in generous natures, although not those of any other passion run not. The sudden death of the king was lamented as a national misfortune by many, who felt a truly filial affection for their country; not that they implicitly subscribed to all the exaggerations which had by the liberally poored forth on his character; but because the nation was deprived of him at a critical juncture, while involved in a dangerous and expensive war, of which he had been personally the chief mover and support. They knew the burden of royalty devolved upon a young prince, who, though heir-apparent to the crown, and already arrived at years of maturity, had never been admitted to any share of the administration, nor made acquainted with any schemes or secrets of state. The real character of the new king was very little known to the generality of the nation. They dreaded an abrupt change of measures, which might have rendered useless all the advantages obtained in the course of the war. As they were ignorant of any plans they dreamed of, of the ministry, which might fill the kingdom with danger and confusion. But the greatest shock occasioned by his death was undoubtedly among our allies and fellow-subjects, who, by his death, were deprived of their prop and patron, at a time when they could not pretend of themselves to make head against the numerous enemies by whom they were surrounded. But these obstinate and apprehensive nations, like mice before the rising sun; and the people of Great Britain enjoyed the inexpressible pleasure of seeing this foes repaired in such a manner, as must have ample fulfilled the most sagacious wishes of those who undertook good works.

§ XXIII. The commerce of Great Britain continued to increase during the whole course of this reign; but the increase was not the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the necessities of government, the growing expenses of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legislature to hamper trade with manifold and grievous impositions: its increase, therefore, must have been owing to the natural progress of interest, and the sure and certain advantages that arise from the lowest line or limit beyond which they will not be able to advance: when the tide of traffic has flowed to its highest mark, it will then begin to recede in a gradual ced, until it reaches the same limits as before: War, which naturally impedes the traffic of other nations, had opened new sources to the merchants of Great Britain; the superiority of her naval power had crushed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce; so that she now supplied, on her own terms, all those foreign markets at which, in time of peace, she was undersold by that dangerous competitor. Thus her trade was augmented to a surprising pitch; and this great augmentation alone enabled her to maintain the war at such an enormous expense. As this advantage will cease when the French are at liberty to re-establish their commerce, and prosecute it without molestation, it would be for the interest of Great Britain to be at continual variance with that restless neighbour, provided the contest could be limited to the operations of a sea-war, in which England would be always invincible and victorious. The writers of the humane and were freely and fully exercised in this reign. Considerable progress was made in mathematics and astronomy by divers individuals; among whom we number Sanderson, Bradley, and Newton, and the two Briosi. Philosophy became a general study; and the new doctrine of electricity grew into fashion. Different methods were discovered for rendering sea-water potable and sweet; and divers useful hints were communicated to the public by the learned Doctor Stephen Hales, who directed all his researches and experiments to the benefit of society. The study of alchemy no longer prevailed; but the art of chemistry was perfectly understood, and assiduously applied to the purposes of sophistication. The clergy of Great Britain were generally learned, pious, and exemplary. Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, and Conybeare, were pronounced the first ministers of the church who had long signalized himself by the strength and boldness of his genius, his extensive capacity, and profound erudition, at length obtained the mitre. But these promotions were granted to reasons of state convenience, and personal friendship, rather than as rewards of extraordinary merit. Many other ecclesiastics of worth and learning were totally overlooked. Nor was ecclesiastical merit confined to the established church. Many instances of extraordinary genius, unattached to any visible denomination, appeared among the dissenting ministers of Great Britain and Ireland: among these we particularize the elegant, the primitive Foster; the learned, ingenious, and penetrating Leland.

§ XXV. The progress of reason, and free cultivation of the human mind, had not, however, entirely banished those ridiculous sects and schisms of which the kingdom had been formerly so productive. Impositions and fanaticism still hung upon the skirts of religion. Weak minds were seduced by the delusion of a superstition styled Methodism, raised upon the affection of superior sanctity, and maintained by pretensions to some intimations in the mysteries of the faith. Many of the lower ranks of life were infected with this species of enthusiasm, by the unwarued endeavours of a few obscure preachers, such as Whitfield, and the two Wesleys, who propagated their doctrine to the most remote and least instructed parts of the nation. Many of these preachers, in order to raise their sabbaths, and to enable their own brethren to acquit themselves of their sole prop and patron, at a time when they could not pretend of themselves to make head against the numerous enemies by whom they were surrounded. But all these sects and apprehensions vanished like mist before the rising sun; and the people of Great Britain enjoyed the inexpressible pleasure of seeing this foes repaired in such a manner, as must have ample fulfilled the most sagacious wishes of those who undertook good works. his intention of prosecuting works of public emulation; they obtained a settlement under a parliamentary sanction in England, where they soon made a considerable number of proselytes, before their principles were fully discovered and explained.

§ XXVI. Many ingenious treatises on metaphysics and morality appeared in the course of this reign, and a philosophical spirit of inquiry diffused itself to the utmost extremities of the united kingdom. Though few discoveries of importance were made in medicine, yet that art was well understood in all its different branches, and many of its professors distinguished themselves in other provinces of literature. Besides the numerous essays on Eden and Bute, the library of London contributed to the improvement of surgery, which was brought to perfection under the auspices of a Cheshireman and a Sharpe. The advantages of agriculture, which had long flourished in the country, as large, in oil and grain, were increased nearly to the most remote and barren provinces of the island.

§ XXVII. The mechanic powers were well understood, and judiciously applied to many useful machines of necessary and domestic use; particularly the building and construction of all that perfection which they were capable of acquiring; but the avowance and oppressions of contractors obliged the handicraftsmen to exert their ingenuity, not in finishing his work well, but in affording it cheap; in purchasing bad materials, and performing his task in a hurry; in concealing flaws, substituting solid for solidity, and sacrificing reputation to the thirst of lucre. Thus, many of the English manufacturers, being found slight and unservicable, grew little distinguished; thus the art of producing them more perfect may in time be totally lost at home. The cloths now made in England are inferior in texture and fabric to those which were manufactured in the beginning of the century; and a sound judgment may be pronounced upon almost every article of hardware. The razors, knives, scissors, hatchets, swords, and other edge utensils, prepared for exportation, are generally ill tempered, half finished, flawed, or botched; and the muskets, which are sold for seven or eight shillings a-piece to the exporter, so carelessly and unconscientiously prepared, that they cannot be used without imminent danger of mutiny and rupture, which were formerly mistrusted. A merchant man upon the coast of Guinea, in the neighbourhood of the British settlements, who has not been wounded or maimed in some member by the bursting of the English firearms, can leave the field at his pleasure; and the expense of character and humanity, will naturally cease, whenever those Africans can be supplied more honestly by the traders of any other nation.

§ XXVIII. Genius in writing spontaneously arose; and though neglected by the great, flourished under the culture of a public which had pretensions to taste, and piqued itself on encouraging literary merit. Swift and Pope we have mentioned on another occasion. Young still lived, and went abroad to attend to the business of his estate. Mr. Thomson, the poet of the seasons, displayed a luxuriancy of genius in describing the beauties of nature. Akenside and Armstrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the ephemeral did not disdain the advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epomand of Wilt. The public acknowledged a considerable share of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and Wordsworth. Numerous theatrical arts had that excellence. The Tragedy of Macbeth, and the Husband of Hoddle, are the only comedies of this age that bid fair for reaching posterity. The exhibitions of the stage were improved to the most exquisite entertainment by the talents and management of Garrick, who greatly surpassed all his predecessors of this and perhaps every other nation, in his genius for acting; in the sweetness and variety of his tones, the irresistible magic of his eye, the fire and vivacity of his action, the elegance of attitude, and the whole panoply of expression. Quite excelled in dignity and declamation, as well as in exhibiting some characters of humour, equally exquisite and peculiar. Mrs. Cibber breathed the whole soul of female tenderness and passion; and Mrs. Fritchard displayed all the dignity of distemper.

That Great Britain was not barren of poets at this period, appears from the detached performances of Johnson, Masoii, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wortons; besides a garder of other original production in verse, which was chiefly devoted to the graces of lyric poetry, and acquired the applause of their countrymen. Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher sphere of life, embellished by the nervous style, superior sense, and extensive erudition of a Cooke; by the elegance, and the polished muse of a Lyttelton. King shone unrivalled in Roman eloquence. Even the female sex distinguished themselves by their taste and ingenuity. Miss Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; Mrs. Lennox signalized herself by many successful efforts of genius, both in poetry and prose; and Miss Reid excelled the celebrated Rosalina in portrait-painting, both in miniature and oil, a curious art in which she was a most proficient. The same vates was transfused into the novels of Filding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life, with equal strength, humour, and propriety. The field of history and biography was cultivated by many writers, among whom we distinguish the copious Guthrie, the circumstantial Ralph, the laborious Carter, the learned and elegant Robertson, and above all, the ingenious, penetrating, and witty young Hume, who among the first writers of the age, both as an historian and philosopher, Nor let us forget the merit conspicuous in the works of Campbell, remarkable for censure, intelligence, and precision. Johnson, inferior to none in philosophy, philology, and political science, distinguished himself in the field of poetry, and classical learning, stands foremost as an eturiist, justly admired for the dignity, strength, and variety of his style, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he investigates the human heart, tracing every interesting emotion, and so naturally and touching the passions of the side of virtue was successfully pursued by Richardson in his Pamela, Clarissa, and Grandison; a species of writing equally new and extraordinary, where, mingled with much superstition, we find a sublime system of ethics, an amazing knowledge and command of human nature. Many of the Greek and Roman classics made their appearance in English translation; and many of the trophies, which were destroyed in the first view; the characters, of the celebrated literary men among these we place, after Pope's Homer, Virgil by Pitt and Warton, Horace by Francis, Polibius by Hampson, and Sophocles by Franklin. The war introduced a variety of military treatises, translated by a host of translators, who were natives of Europe. Conscious of the want of a national language; and a free country, like Great Britain, will always abound with political tracts and lucrations. Every literary production of merit, calculated for amusement or instruction, that appeared in any country or of the reign of Christendom, was immediately imported, and naturalized among the English people. Never was the pursuit after knowledge so universal, or literary merit more regarded, than at this juncture, by the body of the British nation; but it was honoured by no attention from the crown, and little indulgence did it reap from the liberality of particular patrons. The reign of Queen Anne was propitious to the fortunes of Swift and Pope, who lived in all the happy pride of its unbounded empire. The peace from courts and preferment, possessed a moderate benefit in the country, and employed his time in a conscientious discharge of his ecclesiastical functions. Thomson, with the most benevolent genius, and a tender mind, the most ingenuous heart, and the most exalted breast, maintained a perpetual war with the difficulties of a narrow fortune. He enjoyed a place in chancery by the bounty of Lord Talbot, of which he was divested by the succeeding chancellors of his country. He enjoyed a pension from Frederick Prince of Wales, which was withdrawn in the sequel. About two years before his death, he obtained, by the interest of his friend Lord Lyttelton, a comfortable place; but he did not live to taste the blissings of easy circumstances, and died in debt. None of the rest whom we have named enjoyed any share of the royal bounty, except W. Whitehead, who succeeded to the place of head at the death of Cibber; and some of them, whose merit was the most universally acknowledged, remained exposed to all the storms of indigence, and all the stings of mortification. While the queen lived, some countenance was given to learning. She conversed with Newton, and corresponded with Leibnitz. She took pains to acquire popularity; the royal family on certain days dined in public, for the satisfaction of the people: the court was animated with a freedom of spirit and vivacity, which rendered it at once brilliant and agreeable. At her death that spirit began to languish, and a total stagnation of gaiety and good humour ensued. It was succeeded by a sullen calm, an ungracious reserve, and a still rotation of insipid forms.

§ XXIX. England was not defective in other arts that embellish and amuse. Music became a fashionable study, and its professors were generally caressed by the public. An Italian opera was maintained at a great expense, and well supplied with foreign performers. Private concerts were instituted in every corner of the metropolis. The compositions of Handel were universally admired, and he himself lived in affinity. It must be owned at the same time that Gemmum was neglected, though his genius commanded esteem and veneration. Among the few natives of England who distinguished themselves by their talents in this art, Green, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the most remarkable.

§ XXX. The British soil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life; in humour, character, and expression. Hayman became eminent for historical designs and conversation pieces. Reynolds and Ramsay distinguished themselves by their superior merits in portraits; a branch that was successfully cultivated by many other English painters. Wootton was famous for representing live animals in general; Seymour for race horses; Lambert, and the Smiths, for landscapes; and Scot for sea pieces. Several spirited attempts were made on historical subjects, but little progress was made in the sublime parts of painting. Essays of this kind were discouraged by a false taste, founded upon a reprobation of British genius. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practiced by Grignem, Baron, Ravenet, and several other masters; great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of sculpture or statuary were raised by Rysbrach, Roubiliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cherished by the elegant taste of Burlington, soon became a favourite study; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom. Ornaments were carved in wood, and moulded in stucco, with all the diligence of execution; but a passion for novelty had introduced into gardening, building, and furniture an absurd Chinese taste, equally void of beauty and convenience. Improvements in the liberal and useful arts, will doubtless be the consequence of that encouragement given to merit by the society instituted for these purposes, which we have described on another occasion. As for the royal society, it seems to have degenerated in its researches, and to have had very little share, for half a century at least, in extending the influence of true philosophy.

We shall conclude this reign with a detail of the forces and fleets of Great Britain, from whence the reader will conceive a just idea of her opulence and power.
